Unscrupulous and profit-minded dispensary operators have taken advantage of the absence of uniform rules, opening storefronts anywhere they can and selling marijuana to unqualified patients.

Two years ago, drug agents raided Cody's house in Jamul and uprooted his tiny garden.

"They took 'em – three lousy plants," said Cody, 32, who was paralyzed in a 1991 motorcycle crash. This year, he harvested his modest crop weeks before it matured for fear of losing it to another bust.

It was no secret that most of the law enforcement community opposed the medical use of marijuana when the issue landed on the state ballot in 1996.

Lesser known, however, is the detailed and coordinated assault many federal, state and local officials conducted once it passed.

In the past decade, police departments in dozens of California cities have joined federal drug agents in more than 100 raids on medical marijuana farms, cooperatives and dispensaries.

After a July sweep across San Diego County, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and San Diego County District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis used a news conference to issue a warning to dispensary operators: Close or face the consequences. They all closed, and the local marketplace for medical marijuana dried up almost overnight.

Three San Diego County supervisors are so strongly opposed to Proposition 215 that they voted to sue the state to try to overturn medical marijuana laws rather than implement them. Oral arguments in the case, which was driven by Supervisors Bill Horn, Dianne Jacob and Pam Slater-Price, are scheduled to begin this month.

Ten states have joined California in passing medical marijuana legislation, and public opinion polls show that respondents favor medical use of marijuana by 3 to 1.

Yet no one has come up with a way to resolve the impasse between states and the federal government, which can impose criminal penalties for what the states have made legal.

"It's a study in politicians evading the will of voters, which they do not agree with," said Mark Bluemel, an attorney who has defended medical marijuana patients. "We have San Diego being among some rogue counties that refuse to obey this law."

But Horn, chairman of the county Board of Supervisors, said the state has put cities and counties in an impossible position.

"I'm not going to enact a state law that's in violation of federal law until I hear from a judge that it's legal," he said. "I'm not necessarily challenging the will of the people."

State politicians also contributed to the failure to implement Proposition 215. It took seven years to get clarifying legislation through the statehouse and signed into law by the governor.

When Senate Bill 420 finally went into effect on Jan. 1, 2004, it established statewide guidelines outlining the number of marijuana plants a patient could legally grow and directed county health departments to issue identification to qualified patients so police would know when drug use was legitimate and when it was being abused.

But by a measure of nearly 4 to 1, California cities have chosen to outlaw pot dispensaries rather than to regulate them. In communities such as San Francisco, Santa Rosa and Santa Cruz, which have all embraced Proposition 215, elected leaders say the dispensary model has worked fairly well.

Government officials didn't waste any time reacting to the passage of Proposition 215.

Hours after polls closed Nov. 5, 1996, former state Attorney General Dan Lungren, now a congressman from Gold River in Northern California, sent a memo to every district attorney, sheriff and police chief across the state.

The three-page letter laid out what would become the standard for dealing with Proposition 215. It advised police and prosecutors to judge marijuana cases on the basis of whether suspects could reasonably cite medical need as a defense at trial – a legal position called an affirmative defense – rather than simply letting them go if their paperwork was in order.

"We were confronted with both the underlying law (prohibiting marijuana) and the proposition," Lungren said in a recent telephone interview. "We were trying to inform law enforcement officers what would be proper conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0091493

Two weeks later, Lungren and the attorney general of Arizona, which had also passed a medical marijuana initiative, warned their counterparts across the country to be wary of the rising medical marijuana movement.

On Dec. 6, local, state and federal officials convened a strategy session in Washington to deal with the Arizona and California propositions. The meeting focused on ways to undermine the voter-approved initiative, including going after physicians who recommended the drug, establishing a national group to fight legalization of marijuana and calling a special election to repeal the law in California.

Records of the session contend that medical marijuana supporters seek to "legitimize illicit drug use through 'medicalization' approach" and take the effort nationwide.

Three days later, another memo from Lungren's office to federal drug enforcement officials clarified that local police officers could arrest people suspected of breaking federal law.

Medical marijuana proponents complain that government officials deliberately undercut Proposition 215 as soon as it passed.

"Once they came up with affirmative defense as a legal interpretation, it was game, set and match," said Patrick McCartney, a medical marijuana activist and freelance journalist who has compiled an extensive history on the government response to the growing political movement.

"If law enforcement who were so inclined could arrest and prosecute qualified medical marijuana users, then what did voters vote on?" McCartney wondered.

Legal scholars question the federal government's role in medical marijuana debates within individual states. Several believe U.S. drug agents should enforce federal laws but also respect state rights.

However, the Drug Enforcement Administration has recruited local agencies to join task forces that continue to raid dispensaries and cooperatives.

"The California medical marijuana law created an exception to California law, but could not do so for federal law," said Erwin Chemerinsky, a constitutional law professor at Duke University. "I wish federal authorities would use their discretion to respect the California initiative, but they clearly have not done so."

Gerald Uelman is a Santa Clara University law professor who is awaiting an appellate decision on a medical marijuana lawsuit he is fighting on behalf of the city and county of Santa Cruz. Those two governments have led many of the efforts to implement Proposition 215.

Uelman said federal authorities "crossed the line in their effort to impose their agenda" on state officials.

"This is still an issue where the politicians are behind the curve, in terms of the will of the voters," he said. "That's true across the board, not just in California."

Jessica Reeves lives in a Hillcrest studio and usually relies on friends to get the marijuana she needs to relieve her constant pain. Sometimes she drives to dispensaries in Riverside County or in Los Angeles that have not yet been raided.

Two years ago, the 29-year-old medical assistant contracted necrotizing fasciitis, the flesh-eating bacteria. Doctors saved her life, but she lost much of her right arm.

Nineteen operations later, Reeves said smoking pot is the only thing that helps her live a near-to-normal life.

"When I turned 18, I voted for Proposition 215," she said. "I didn't know 10 years later that I would need it. Now I can't get it because they closed all the dispensaries down."

Ex-gang Member In Jail For Drugs (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 7, 2006

Bailey barely off parole for role in 5-year-old's drive-by death in 1996

Add one more to the growing list of gang members convicted in the drive-by shooting of a 5-year-old Lonsdale girl who are back in trouble with the law.

Jessie Rondale Bailey, 31, had been off the parole hook for his role in the May 1996 slaying of Brittany Shenice Daniels only a few months when he started racking up new charges.

DOJ_NMG_0091494

But the stakes for Bailey got a sudden boost last week with his arrest on a federal indictment alleging four drug sales, including two involving more than 50 grams of crack cocaine.

He faces a minimum 20-year prison term and as much as life if convicted.

Bailey appeared before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton on Monday on that indictment. Noting Bailey's prior murder conviction, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck asked Guyton to keep Bailey behind bars pending a trial.

Defense attorney Phil Lomonaco did not disagree, and Guyton approved Winck's request.

Bailey's criminal woes are not limited to federal court. He faces four counts of aggravated assault in Knox County General Sessions Court and has drug charges pending before a Knox County grand jury.

In the aggravated assault cases, Bailey is accused of threatening three women and a baby with a gun on Aug. 26.

"(Bailey) pointed a big gun with a curved ammo clip towards the victims, one of whom was holding her 6-month-old son, and yelled, 'This is my block,' placing the victims in fear of death or serious injury," the warrant stated.

Knoxville Police Department officer Rachel Bachorek and others responded to the corner at the intersection of Martin Luther King Jr. Avenue and Chestnut Street, but Bailey allegedly fled.

Bachorek wrote in a separate warrant that she found six Ecstasy pills in Bailey's ashtray when she finally stopped him.

Bailey was convicted in 1999 of facilitation to commit second-degree murder in the gang-related drive-by shooting death of Brittany, who was playing on a sidewalk in Lonsdale when three carloads of East Side gang members opened fire on a courtyard crowded with people.

He also racked up a felony drug conviction. He got a package plea deal, ordered to serve eight years for both crimes. With jail credits, he was freed after having served about a third of that time, records show.

He began racking up new charges last year, records show. KPD officers Doyle Lee, Donald Scott Clark and Sgt. John D. Shelton nabbed him in July 2005 with 222 Xanax pills and 325 Soma pills in his possession, warrants allege.

Then, in April, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Todd Lee and KPD officer Bruce Conkey began building a federal drug case against Bailey, records show.

The federal indictment alleges Bailey sold cocaine on April 26. Two days later, he allegedly sold more than 50 grams of crack, the indictment alleges. On May 2, he again sold more than 50 grams, then another five grams or more the following day, the indictment alleges.

He joins former East Side gang members Melvin "Little Melvin" Davis and Robert D. Campbell as participants in the fatal drive-by who have wound up back in trouble.

Lopez 'ashamed' Of Schwartz Case Role (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, November 7, 2006

A former Pima County prosecutor who was once engaged to former murder suspect Bradley Schwartz says no words are adequate to describe how "remorseful, ashamed and embarrassed" she is about the events leading up to her possible disbarment.

Last November, the State Bar of Arizona filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez, 38, saying she had engaged in criminal conduct that "reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects."

The bar alleges Lopez not only was indicted in September 2002 on prescription drug fraud charges along with Schwartz, but she continued having a relationship with Schwartz despite being ordered not to, and lied about it.

Schwartz is now serving a life sentence for conspiracy to commit murder in the October 2004 slaying of his former medical associate, Dr. David Brian Stidham.

Monday was the first day of a two-day hearing before Bruce G. Macdonald, a hearing master who must file a report with the Arizona Supreme Court's Disciplinary Commission. Macdonald will decide if the complaint against Lopez is valid and, if necessary, what punishment is appropriate.

At best, Lopez could be placed in a diversion program or on probation. At worst, she could be disbarred.

DOJ_NMG_0091495

Lopez, who now works as a defense attorney, told Macdonald that although she believes all lawyers should conduct themselves with the "highest degree of integrity," she also believes a distinction should be made between mistakes made in one's personal life and those made in one's professional life.

"I will agree I've done things in my personal life that I'm ashamed of, but I've always tried to conduct myself in my professional life in a way that I can be proud of," Lopez said.

The mistakes she's made have "nothing to do with" helping her clients or her respect for the criminal justice system, she said.

At the same time, Lopez said she wishes she had the words to express her deep remorse and shame.

"Anything I say would just fall short," she said.

Lopez admitted she allowed Schwartz to write two prescriptions for Vicodin in her name in the summer of 2001, and that she picked up one of the filled prescriptions — using her insurance to pay for it.

She further acknowledged that she lied to DEA agents about her relationship with Schwartz when they initially questioned her.

Lopez insisted that although she knew it was a crime to lie to the DEA, she didn't lie to protect her job or career.

Instead, she said, she lied to protect Schwartz.

It wasn't until May 2004 when they broke up for the last time, Lopez said, that she began to consider her needs above Schwartz's.

Schwartz and Lopez, who resigned from the Pima County Attorney's Office one month before being indicted, entered plea agreements with federal prosecutors to have the charges dismissed if they completed community service and stayed out of trouble.

Schwartz was arrested, accused of Stidham's murder, before he completed his diversion program — in part because Lopez went to the authorities to tell them Schwartz had often spoken of having Stidham killed.

The charges against Lopez were dismissed on Nov. 1, 2004, after she, her attorney and her pretrial services officer told U.S. Magistrate Judge Bernardo Velasco she had been fully compliant with everything that had been asked of her.

However, Lopez admitted Monday that was not true — she continued to see Schwartz during a 6 1/2-month time frame when she wasn't supposed to.

In fact, the couple got engaged two months before the "no contact" order was lifted.

State Bar attorney Bill Culbertson repeatedly asked Lopez how much contact she had with Schwartz during that time frame.

Lopez couldn't be specific, she said, but it was regular contact and included overnight visits and religion classes.

"Too much contact, sir — I don't know," Lopez said at one point.

Lopez also acknowledged it was during this time frame that Schwartz was "ranting and raving" about his desire to see Stidham dead.

During one conversation, Lopez admitted, she told Schwartz he shouldn't hire a drug addict to carry out the slaying because of the potential for blackmail.

Lopez insisted she was just trying to convince Schwartz how "ridiculous, outrageous and insane" the whole topic was.

When Culbertson asked Lopez if it was true she didn't call pretrial services about the threats, an emotional Lopez replied, "I could've phoned, faxed, said something in person or e-mailed, but I didn't do it and I should have, yes sir."

Under cross-examination by her attorney, Mark Harrison, Lopez said she and two friends discussed Schwartz's threats and discounted them.

"There was absolutely no way, absolutely no way on this Earth, those threats were going to come to fruition — they were just the ugly rant-ings of a man obsessed," Lopez said.

When pressed as to why she told Velasco — and later the State Bar — that she had been compliant with his orders when she had not been, Lopez said it didn't occur to her because eight months had passed since the order had been lifted.

In addition, it was a stressful time for her.

"I was thinking about the murder. Brad was in custody. I was thinking about how horrible the family must be feeling and I was thinking about finally being done with my community service and being able to move forward," Lopez said.

DOJ_NMG_0091496

Harrison spent much of his cross-examination asking Lopez to describe her background, her relationship with Schwartz and how the events of the past few years have affected her life.

Lopez worked her way through college and the UA law school on scholarships, grants and loans, and is the sole support of her two children.

Since the bar complaint was filed, Lopez said, she has lost a defense contract with the county, a law partner and two-thirds of her business.

She's deeply in debt, getting psychiatric help and participating in the State Bar's Members Assistance Program, which helps lawyers deal with substance-abuse issues, stress, depression and family or money problems.

She's also being sued by Stidham's widow.

Lopez acknowledged she was arrested in July on suspicion of driving under the influence after a crash but said her doctor has told her she suffers from post-traumatic stress syndrome, not alcoholism.

Lopez said her doctor is working with her to address why she became so captivated by someone like Schwartz.

Lopez said she wasn't trying to shift the blame to Schwartz.

"I'm blaming myself for involving myself with someone like him," she said.

Culbertson is expected to wrap up his case with three law-enforcement officers. Harrison said he intends to call Velasco and Pima County Superior Court Judges Kenneth Lee and Michael Cruikshank.

Early Morning Detroit Blaze Destroys Businesses, Apartments (DEN)

By Oralandar Brand-Williams

Detroit News, November 7, 2006

DETROIT --The Detroit Fire Department is investigating a two-alarm fire that destroyed several businesses and apartments and produced more than a $1 million in damage near Lahser and Grand River on the city's northwest early Monday morning.

The National Response Team from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and ATF special agents from the Detroit Field Division were called in to assist the Detroit Fire and Arson Squad in their investigation, according to the ATF.

"We are involved because of the dollar amount of the fire. We don't look at this suspicious or not," said Vera Fedorak, an ATF spokeswoman in Detroit. "The Detroit Police Department asked us for assistance."

The blaze was reported by a resident around 1 a.m. The building contained four businesses and several store fronts that were unoccupied. Six apartments on the second floor of the building were occupied.

There was no deaths reported in the blaze.

You can reach Oralandar Brand-Williams at (313) 222-2027 or bwilliams@detnews.com. You can reach Oralandar Brand-Williams at (313) 222-2027 or bwilliams@detnews.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Paulson Adviser In Line For Treasury Position By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said he intends to nominate Anthony Ryan, a senior adviser to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, to serve as assistant secretary of the Treasury for financial markets.

Mr. Ryan, who was one of Mr. Paulson's first hires at Treasury, will have primary responsibility for managing Treasury's debt-market portfolio, such as the 30-year Treasury bond. The position has been vacant for a year since Timothy Bitsberger left to join mortgage giant Freddie Mac.

If confirmed, Mr. Ryan will help fill out Mr. Paulson's domestic finance team. Last month, Robert Steel, a former executive at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., was sworn in as Mr. Paulson's top financial-policy adviser. Also rounding out the group is Emil

DOJ_NMG_0091497

Henry, assistant secretary for financial institutions, who focuses on banking and insurance issues, as well as helping coordinate Treasury's hedge-fund review.

Mr. Ryan, 43 years old, has spent 20 years in the financial-services industry. Prior to joining Treasury, he was a partner at Grantham, Mayo, Van Otterloo & Co. LLC, a Boston-based investment firm that manages $121 billion for corporate clients, public entities, endowments and others.

Next Up: House Leader Races (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

While control of the House won't be determined until tonight at the earliest, contested leadership elections already are brewing on both sides of the aisle.

For the GOP, much of the current leadership's fate rests on today's outcome, as the chances of retaining their current posts become more vulnerable with each seat lost. Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio) are guaranteed a challenge, as are Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.).

House Democrats remain committed to holding their Caucus elections on Nov. 16, but House Republicans are increasingly likely to postpone their scheduled Nov. 15 elections even if they hold on to House control.

Here is the rundown of leadership races on both sides of the aisle:

Republicans

Speaker: If Republicans defy expectations and retain the majority, Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) has reiterated in recent weeks that he intends to run again for an unprecedented fifth term for the top job. Hastert is the longest serving Republican Speaker in history, and while he has been criticized by the rank and file for how he and his top aides managed the fallout from the scandal sparked by former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), he still enjoys a significant reservoir of goodwill from his colleagues.

However, long before the Foley story broke, an increasing number of House Republicans were doubtful that Hastert, who suffers from health problems including diabetes, would serve out a full Congress. Boehner is a likely candidate, but the Ohioan is seen as unlikely to mount a challenge to Hastert, rather waiting for him to exit the House on his own terms.

If Hastert opts to retire, the field could be wide open, with Boehner a likely frontrunner.

Majority/Minority Leader: If for no other reason than that he took over mid-Congress, Boehner is the most likely current Republican to stay in leadership in the 110th Congress.

Rank-and-file Members frequently have cited Boehner's February elevation to the post as the reason to give him another round at the leadership table. Affable and widely credited for shaking up the top-down leadership style trademarked by his predecessor Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Boehner is in a strong position to hold onto his job. Even in the minority, Boehner could be difficult to defeat, although he will be challenged for the post.

Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (Texas) is mulling a bid if Republicans lose the House. Similarly, Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), the chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, will run for Minority Leader only if Republicans lose the majority.

With the floodgates beginning to open, more Members with leadership ambitions could jump into the race, breaking the field wide open.

Majority/Minority Whip: No one has announced a bid against Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.), but most House Republican sources believe Blunt will be challenged regardless of what happens today. Blunt lost his bid for Majority Leader to Boehner earlier this year, and has largely kept his head down since, focusing on fundraising and maintaining the majority through a packed campaign schedule.

Blunt remains liked by his colleagues, and by most accounts he and Boehner have put rivalries aside, but he is viewed as vulnerable if the House Republican Conference pushes for more drastic shake-ups in the leadership slate. GOP Reps. Todd Tiahrt (Kan.), Mike Rogers (Mich.), Zach Wamp (Tenn.) and Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) announced earlier this year that they would run for the post if Blunt had been elected Leader.

DOJ_NMG_0091498

All four Republicans continue to be seen as potential leadership candidates, but none have shown any indication they will run. House GOP sources also said Monday that Rep. John Shadegg (Ariz.), who also launched an unsuccessful bid for Majority Leader, is increasingly viewed as a potential Whip candidate if Republicans lose the majority. Cantor was the strong favorite in January, but House Republican sources doubt that Cantor would ever mount a direct challenge to Blunt, who has played a mentor role to the third-term Virginian.

If the field opens up, the popular Cantor could be recruited by his colleagues to step into this — or any other — leadership race.

Republican Conference chairman: Long before the House Republican majority was in doubt, it was clear that Conference Chairwoman Pryce would face a challenge for the 110th Congress. For now, Pryce has said she will run for the post again if she can survive today's challenge from Democratic candidate Mary Jo Kilroy, although some House Republicans are doubtful Pryce will run for the Conference position again.

Rep. Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.) has been plotting a bid for Conference chairman for the past several months and is increasingly viewed as the favorite in this race. Conference Vice Chairman Jack Kingston (Ga.) also is expected to attempt a step up the Conference ladder, and sources have suggested that House Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) also could make a bid.

Republican Conference vice chairman: Rumored candidates to succeed Kingston include GOP Reps. Kay Granger (Texas) and Mark Kirk (Ill.). Conference Secretary John Doolittle (Calif.) could make a bid for a higher Conference position, but he is not viewed as a top-tier candidate in any race. Rep. John Carter (Texas) has been actively seeking the Conference secretary slot.

Win or lose the majority, the Conference team is expected to have an entirely new slate.

Republican Policy Committee chairman: Unless Putnam makes a bid for another leadership position, this will not be a competitive leadership race. Putnam has earned high marks from his colleagues, and he is another Republican regularly dubbed a rising star in the party.

If he wants to remain at the Policy Committee, he should be safe. If Putnam is out, Reps. Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.), Phil Gingrey (Ga.) and Darrell Issa (Calif.) are all potential contenders as they all waged bids earlier this year when Shadegg vacated the post to run for Majority Leader. House GOP sources also have said that Rep. Michael Burgess (Texas) is another Member to watch for this post.

National Republican Congressional Committee chairman: This leadership race has been well under way for most of the 109th Congress as current chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) is term-limited. Right now it is a three-man race, with Reps. Pete Sessions (Texas), Tom Cole (Okla.) and Phil English (Pa.) vying to head up the campaign committee as they head into a presidential election year. There is no clear favorite in the race.

Democrats

Speaker: Should Democrats win control of the chamber, it is widely expected that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) would be elevated to the Speaker's office, which would make her the first woman to hold the post.

Elections for the Speakership typically are ceremonial, with Members generally voting along party lines, but should Democrats hold only a slim majority in the chamber in January, the party's leadership may need to enforce unity among maverick Democrats to guarantee a victory. Candidates for the Speakership must receive a majority of the votes cast, which does not include absences or "present" votes, to win the post.

Majority/Minority Leader: A Democrat-run House would bring a simmering fight for the Majority Leader's office to a boil leading to the scheduled Nov. 16 leadership elections.

Although conventional wisdom gives Hoyer, as the party's current No. 2 leader, a claim to the Majority Leader's post, Rep. John Murtha (Pa.) surprised colleagues in June when he announced that he would also seek the office.

While Murtha shelved his public campaign within days — chastised by disgruntled Members who argued a divisive leadership race would distract the Caucus from the November elections — and Hoyer has remained reserved about his own ambitions, the would-be contest has continued as both lawmakers hit the road to campaign for fellow Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0091499

While the Maryland lawmaker, who has served as Whip since 2002, significantly out-paced Murtha in the final weeks, visiting 39 districts and raising his tally for the cycle to 80 districts in 32 states, Murtha has been credited with raising considerable funds for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee through a series of letters focused of his opposition to the Iraq War.

Hoyer also has contributed heavily to fellow Democrats, however, doling out more than $4.3 million to candidates and incumbents, as well as $3.8 million to the DCCC.

If Democrats don't take control of the House, it is unclear whether any lawmakers would challenge Pelosi for Minority Leader.

Majority/Minority Whip: Although Caucus Chairman Clyburn is the only candidate to announce his bid for the Majority Whip's office before Election Day, he's expected to have company in the race.

Among the potential contenders is DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who has said he will not seek another term in his current post.

While Clyburn already has begun rounding up support for the would-be race, Emanuel has refused to address his own aspirations, other than to state that he wants to spend more time with his young family, a proposition made difficult by the extensive travel required by his current DCCC post.

Nevertheless, the Illinois lawmaker is expected to seek a leadership office, and many Democrats have suggested he should be rewarded for his efforts if the party wins control of the chamber.

But should Emanuel opt for another post — or even rescind his decision and accept a second DCCC term — Rep. Diana DeGette (Colo.) could enter the race instead.

DeGette, the current Chief Deputy Minority Whip, has demurred from discussing a potential leadership bid.

If the GOP retains the House, Hoyer could try to stay in the Minority Whip post, though he might have to beat the above-mentioned candidates to do it.

Democratic Caucus chairman: The House Democratic Caucus also would see leadership changes in a Democratic majority, with Rep. John Larson (Conn.), the current vice chairman, likely to ascend to the top post unopposed.

The Connecticut lawmaker won an unexpected victory earlier this year in a three-way contest, defeating Rep. Jan Schakowsky (Ill.) and Joe Crowley (N.Y.).

Democratic Caucus vice chairman: By contrast, the competition to fill a vacant vice chairmanship already has drawn a number of candidates, with more expected to enter the would-be race this week.

Rep. Xavier Becerra (Calif.) announced in late-July that he would campaign for the post, winning an endorsement from his fellow Hispanic Democrats and actively seeking support from other House lawmakers.

In addition, Rep. Mike Ross (Ark.) issued a letter in late-September expressing his interest in the post, while urging fellow Members not to commit to other candidates.

Also considered potential contenders are Crowley and Rep. Hilda Solis (Calif.), although neither has publicly declared their interest.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman: Although many House Democrats have said they would like to see the DCCC chairman retain his post for another cycle, Emanuel's declarations that he will retire from the campaign committee after one term has stirred the interest of a handful of would-be replacements.

Among the likely contenders — some who have even called for Emanuel to serve a second term, while none have acknowledged seeking the post themselves — are current DCCC lieutenants Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (Fla.), Chris Van Hollen (Md.) and Artur Davis (Ala.) as well as Rep. Kendrick Meek (Fla.), who chairs the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation.

Unlike other leadership posts, the DCCC chairmanship is an appointment made by Pelosi and is not subject to approval by the Caucus.

A Mess Of Spending Measures Awaits (RC)

By Emily Pierce

DOJ_NMG_0091500

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

Regardless of which party emerges victorious today, the current Republican majority still must find a way to fund the government, at least through the winter holidays, as well as finish other year-end business during the lame-duck session, which begins next week but is destined to last well into December.

In order to give themselves some breathing room after what is expected to be a bruising Election Day for the GOP, one of the first orders of business in both chambers next week is likely to be the passage of a continuing resolution that would allow Congress to punt the issue of fiscal 2007 appropriations until the first full week in December.

CRs keep the government running at current-year funding levels in the absence of new spending bills. As of now, nine of 11 spending bills have yet to be enacted, and the current CR expires Nov. 17.

"We just have limited time," House Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) said last week. "With elections late and Thanksgiving early, that only gives us one week for [internal] leadership elections, if that's when they occur. ... To me, it seems it may be time for a retrospective or introspective look."

GOP leaders plan to make at least a passing attempt to complete the remaining nine spending bills as stand-alone measures, rather than cobbling them together into a massive omnibus appropriations measure — a necessity if Congress wanted to finish up within one week.

But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) finally acknowledged last week that Congress will have to extend its lame-duck session into December after taking a two-week break for Thanksgiving. That gives Congress more time to take up at least a few more of those appropriations bills in regular order.

Indeed, the Senate plans to take up the military construction and Veterans' Affairs appropriations bill next week, Senate GOP aides say.

Senate passage of at least one more appropriations bill is necessary to create a vehicle for any omnibus bill, noted Frist budget aide Bill Hoagland. While the House has passed 10 of its appropriations bills, the Senate has passed only two — both of which were signed into law.

Hoagland said the Senate's spending bills are ready for floor action and that "with cooperation [from Democrats], I believe you could do at least three the first week back."

The Senate's lack of appropriations work so far this year caused Cantor to express skepticism that the two chambers can complete the remaining bills individually "in two to three weeks' time."

"The president has expressed strong interest in making sure we don't go the omnibus route. ... Easy for him to say," he said. "Is the Senate going to be able to go along with that? I mean, we're ready" on the House side.

But Senate Republican aides predicted that if Democrats win control of the House, Republicans in that chamber may feel so demoralized that they'll want to punt all appropriations issues to the 110th Congress.

"It just depends on what kind of mood they'll be in," said Hoagland. "If the House is so dejected, ... you're probably talking about another CR" through next January.

Depending on the outcome of the elections today, Democrats could be emboldened by their expected gains in both chambers and make new demands on both spending bills and other measures, Republicans warned.

"If Democrats take over — God forbid — they're going to be so eager to put everything under their control that they're not going to want to do anything," predicted one Senate GOP leadership staffer.

Even if Democrats don't win control of at least one chamber, the current situation in the Senate still will make it difficult to move any legislation. "We are still in charge, but we don't have 60 votes," said the staffer. "Nothing that requires 60 votes will get done."

Neither chamber's Democrats have hinted about what they would or would not do in a lame-duck session.

Besides spending bills, Congress left town with a to-do list of other issues that won't necessarily change if control of either chamber flips from Republican to Democratic.

Those agenda items include extending several middle-class tax cuts that are set to expire at the end of the year, preventing a cut in Medicare physician payments from taking effect and renewing the business research and development tax cut.

DOJ_NMG_0091501

All three items have bipartisan support in both chambers, but attempts to add more controversial measures to those "must-pass" bills could derail them.

"There will be plenty of things folks will want to do, but the system will only be able to stand so much," said one senior Senate GOP aide. "We'd still like to get it all wrapped up by Thanksgiving, but in the Senate, we are apprehensive about the appropriators and the House being able to get all the work done on time."

In addition, the Senate is looking at completing action on a Vietnam trade deal and a U.S.-India nuclear technology pact, the aide said.

Senate Republicans said they also may make another run at approving the controversial nomination of John Bolton to be United Nations ambassador. His consideration by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has been held up by embattled Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who is at serious risk of losing his re-election bid today.

Chafee has remained mum on his intentions on the Bolton nomination if he wins or loses, but Democrats on the panel have threatened to filibuster his nomination if it makes it to the Senate floor. Bolton's temporary appointment to the post expires at the beginning of the 110th Congress, which is set to start on Jan. 3, 2007.

Board Decision Makes It Clear: Hire The Vet (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

A federal board has reaffirmed the government's obligation to show a preference for military veterans in hiring, even when federal agencies use a special program designed to quickly fill jobs with applicants who have a high grade-point average.

The decision by the Merit Systems Protection Board, which hears appeals in federal personnel disputes, is a setback for the Outstanding Scholar program, which permits agencies to bypass regular civil service hiring procedures, and for the Office of Personnel Management, which had petitioned the board to reconsider its rulings from last year.

The dispute points up some of the underlying tensions in federal employment policies. Since at least the Civil War, Congress has shown its appreciation for military service by granting a hiring preference to veterans who seek civil service jobs. The government also has tried to provide remedies for racial discrimination, a goal of the Outstanding Scholar Program.

Kerry B. McTigue , general counsel at the OPM, said government lawyers are studying last month's decision and whether to file a federal court appeal.

The American Legion, a veterans service organization with 3 million members, welcomed the board's decision. "The American Legion doesn't want to see the veterans' preference laws ignored when federal agencies use special hiring procedures, such as the Outstanding Scholar program," said Peter Gaytan , director of veterans affairs and rehabilitation for the Legion.

As a general practice, veterans who meet minimum qualifications for a federal job have 5 or 10 points added to their numerical rating when competing for civil service positions.

But two veterans, David Dean and Matthew S. Olson , filed suits contending they were wrongfully passed over for jobs and that non-veterans were hired instead through the Outstanding Scholar program.

The program, which permits agencies to use streamlined methods to hire applicants with high grade-point averages or class standing, was created as a supplemental hiring process as part of a 1981 consent decree known as Luevano.

The decree grew out of a civil lawsuit brought by a group of minority job applicants who contended that they failed a written civil service test because it was biased. In recent years, critics have faulted the Outstanding Scholar program for moving away from its original purpose and for not necessarily helping improve diversity in the federal workforce.

In its decision, the merit board said the program cannot be relied upon to avoid fair and open competition for federal jobs when veterans' rights are at stake.

"Luevano did not authorize use of the Outstanding Scholar program to override veterans' preference," the board decision said.Mark Your Calendars

Forums to help federal employees and retirees select a health-insurance plan to meet their needs will be held this month in Montgomery and Fairfax counties.

DOJ_NMG_0091502

Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) are sponsoring the forums in cooperation with the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association.

Speakers will provide an overview of the 2007 Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which is open for enrollment Nov. 13 to Dec. 11. Representatives from health-insurance companies also will be on hand to answer questions.

The Van Hollen forums are scheduled for Monday, Nov. 13, 7:30 p.m. to 9 p.m., at the Universities at Shady Grove in Rockville, 9630 Gudelsky Dr., Building II; and for Tuesday, Nov. 14, 10 a.m. to 11:30 a.m., at the Holiday Park Senior Center in Wheaton, 3950 Ferrara Dr. For additional information, call 301-424-3501.

The Davis forum is scheduled for Wednesday, Nov. 29, 10 a.m. until noon at the Fairfax County Government Center, 12000 Government Center Pkwy., in Fairfax. For additional information, call 202-225-1492.

OTHER NEWS:

Greenspan Unconcerned About Housing (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan said yesterday that home sales and prices may continue to slide for some time, but the broader U.S. economy appears poised for a rebound.

"It looks as though the worst is behind us" in terms of the effect of the housing slump on economic growth, he told financial advisers at a conference in Washington organized by Schwab Institutional, a division of Charles Schwab & Co.

"We're obviously going through a significant slowing period, which as best as I can judge is quite likely to be temporary," said Greenspan, 80, who retired in January after more than 18 years leading the world's most influential central bank and whose words are still closely monitored in financial markets.

U.S. economic growth slowed sharply, to a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate, in the July through September period, largely because of a steep drop in home construction. Home sales and prices have also fallen recently in many markets.

Greenspan, a private consultant, said the housing downturn has "a way to go" before it hits bottom, but its effect on the rest of the economy should abate in the months ahead.

Other U.S. industries are enjoying healthy profits, consumer spending has remained solid and "the global economy is in extraordinarily good shape," he said. "Things don't look bad."

Greenspan made his comments during an hour-long question-and-answer session. Since leaving the Fed, he has created a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates LLC, started work on a memoir and made various appearances before paying audiences. During his last year as Fed chairman, Greenspan often said he did not see a national housing bubble, but rather "froth" in some markets. At the conference yesterday, however, he attributed much of the recent housing boom to a "speculative surge" caused by global financial conditions that pushed mortgage rates down to very low levels until the last year.

Greenspan said he could not predict when home sales would begin rising again or when home prices would stabilize. He said of prices, "it's hard for me to believe that they can stabilize at the level they are now because we had too much of a speculative surge. We have to lose some of that."

Greenspan said nothing about current Fed policy, but he defended the central bank's actions during his tenure, disagreeing with one former colleague about whether the Fed fueled speculative investment in housing by holding interest rates too low for too long in recent years.

The Fed cut its benchmark short-term rate from 6.5 percent at the beginning of 2001 to a four-decade low of 1 percent in mid-2003, providing cheap credit to support consumer spending through a recession and the initially weak recovery. The Fed held that rate steady until June 2004, before raising it steadily to 5.25 percent this past June.

Richard W. Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, said in a speech Thursday that because of faulty price data during this period, the Fed's benchmark short-term rate, adjusted for inflation, was cut to a level that "turned out to be lower than what was deemed appropriate at the time, and was held lower longer than it should have been."

DOJ_NMG_0091503

The Fed's policy "amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets," Fisher said. Now, he added, the correction in the housing market is "inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country" and complicating the Fed's task of containing inflation.

Greenspan disputed such criticism, saying the recent housing boom resulted not from Fed cuts of short-term interest rates, but rather from global financial conditions that lowered long-term mortgage rates worldwide. "In retrospect, I know of nothing we would have done differently," Greenspan said of Fed policy during those years.

Greenspan also said globalization had helped dampen inflationary pressures during his years as Fed chairman, as low-wage workers in China, India and the former Soviet Union started providing low-cost goods and services to the world's market economies. But he said that transition "is a one-shot event, not a permanent change" that will hold down price pressures indefinitely.

Eventually, he said, inflationary pressures will revive, making life more difficult for his former colleagues at the Fed.

Several Signs Point Toward Robust Stock Resurgence (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK — Bolstered by a fresh wave of takeovers and buyouts, blue-chip stocks Monday snapped a six-session losing streak ahead of the midterm elections as investors grew confident that stocks still offer value.

News of deals in the hotel, restaurant, pharmaceutical and trucking sectors sparked a rally that sent the Dow Jones industrials soaring 120 points to 12,106.

The Dow's resurgence may be signaling that its recent slump was just a normal pause after a heady three-month rally that saw it crack its old record set in January 2000, top 12,000 for the first time and close at an all-time high of 12,163.66 on Oct. 26.

“The deals are telling us that investors still see real value in the market,” says Todd Leone, trader at Cowen & Co. “They've been a very big catalyst.”

The attention now turns to today's congressional elections, says Bruce Bittles, chief investment strategist at Robert W. Baird. Rather than emphasize the possibility that the market may be nearing a top, Wall Street has been more vocal in pointing out the reasons why stocks are likely to regain upward momentum.

•Election cycle is bullish. History shows that stocks tend to go up in the third year of the four-year presidential cycle, notes Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America. While he doesn't expect the broader market to post anything near the average returns of 23.1% it has in similar third years dating back to 1946, he still expects stocks to grind higher.

Even if the Democrats capture one chamber of Congress from the Republicans, stocks should still fare well, Quinlan says. “With no change at the White House, there is a feeling of predictability and continuity regarding Washington,” he says.

•A season for gains. Stocks have historically posted their best gains in the October through April period, notes Price Headley, chief analyst at BigTrends.com. Year-end portfolio rebalancing, new money inflows into 401(k)s and fresh cash invested by funds contribute to this seasonal phenomenon.

•Fear of selling too early. Bittles says money managers fear missing out on late-year gains. “The only thing that can really upset the market is if the economy tanks, and I don't see that,” he says.

Since the Dow's high, stocks have been buffeted by economic reports that could be signaling a sharper slowdown than expected. The government said third-quarter growth came in at a weaker-than-expected 1.6% annual rate. Wal-Mart, the nation's biggest retailer, warned that sales this month would be flat.

But investors have “a lot more confidence in the economy” than data and consumer confidence surveys show, says Howard Silverblatt, senior index analyst at Standard & Poor's. “Optimism is back,” he says.

Dow Industrials Rally 119.51 Points Before Election Investors Celebrate Conclusion Of Tumultuous Political Season, Hope 'Pricing In' Was Right By PETER A. MCKAY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091504

The stock market snapped a six-day losing streak as bargain hunters swooped in to buy shares. A spate of merger talks, a pullback in natural-gas prices and the approaching end of a tumultuous election season also raised investors' mood.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 119.51 points, or 1%, to 12105.55, its biggest point and percentage gains in a month. In just one trading session, the blue-chip indicator recouped about two-thirds of its losses over the previous six days and now stands 13% higher on the year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 1.1%, or 15.48 points, to 1379.78, ending a three-day pullback up 10.5% on the year. And the Nasdaq Composite Index rose 1.5%, or 35.16 points, also its first gain after three days of losses, to 2365.95. It is up 7.3% on the year.

David P. Prokupek, chief executive of Geronimo Partners in Denver, said his asset-management firm lately has been unwinding bearish bets using options contracts that were intended to guard against losses in its stock portfolio. He said it was likely other Wall Street firms were doing the same yesterday, following a market pullback that represented exactly the sort of rainy day they had anticipated.

Mr. Prokupek said markets over the past several weeks have "priced in" expectations that the Democratic Party will gain a majority in the U.S. House of Representatives, while Republicans will retain control of the Senate in voting today. Any deviation from that scenario, however, could lead to a strong market reaction in the days ahead.

Companies in a number of industries, including health care, restaurants and gold mining, announced mergers. Such activity often puts investors in a good mood. Some start betting that other takeover targets might get snatched up; others broadly interpret risk-taking by deal-making executives as a cue to become more aggressive in their own investing.

Natural-gas prices were down because of unseasonably warm weather in much of the U.S. December futures fell 5%, the biggest drop since mid-October. Natural-gas contracts fell 39.4 cents to $7.49 per million British thermal units.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks and bonds rose. The 10-year note rose 2/32 point, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.711%. The 30-year bond rose 9/32 to yield 4.795%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.29 yen from 118.01 yen. The euro rose to $1.2723 from $1.2717.

Stocks Jump On Flurry Of Equity Buyouts (WP)

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 6 -- Wall Street roared back Monday, erasing last week's losses after private-equity buyout deals involving such companies as Four Seasons Hotels and OSI Restaurant Partners revived investors' belief that stocks still have room to run.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 119.51, or 1 percent, to 12,105.55, closing once again over the benchmark 12,000 level. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 15.48, or 1.13 percent, at 1379.78, and the Nasdaq composite index advanced 35.16, or 1.51 percent, to 2365.95.

The gains came a day ahead of the U.S. midterm elections, though the prospect of a power shift in Congress didn't seem to unnerve investors.

Investors shrugged off a moderate rise in the price of crude oil. Last week, a price increase prompted by attacks on facilities in Nigeria helped push stocks lower. Although those fears receded after the violence was less widespread than feared, an OPEC official said further production could be needed this year. Light, sweet crude was up 88 cents at $60.02 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The private equity deals announced Monday were worth about $20 billion. Interest in private equity has increased, with public companies facing higher costs for regulatory compliance. In addition, many private equity firms see opportunity in taking a company private, making changes and reaping the windfall if a company again goes public.Movers

Four Seasons increased $18.63, to $82.50, after the luxury hotel chain received an offer to be taken private for $3.7 billion.

OSI Restaurant , owner of chains such as Outback Steakhouse, rose $7.32, to $39.75, after agreeing to be acquired by a private investor group for about $3 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0091505

Abbott Laboratories fell 17 cents, to $47.47, after agreeing to acquire Kos Pharmaceuticals for about $3.7 billion in a bid to expand its cholesterol drug holdings.

Kos surged $26.97, to $77.06.

XM Satellite Radio Holdings rose $1.78, to $13.17, after its third-quarter loss was narrower than expected.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 102.86, to 8819.62.

American Stock Exchange index rose 17.71, to 1992.07.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 10.35, to 763.08.Volume

NYSE: 2.53 billion shares, up from 2.44 billion on Friday. Advancers outnumbered decliners 3 to 1.

Nasdaq: 1.93 billion shares, up from 1.85 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 9 to 4.Commodities

Crude oil for December delivery: $60.02, up 88 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $625.80 a troy ounce, down from $626.90 on Friday.

'Takeover Monday' Eases Slowdown Fears (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera In New York, Bernard Simon In Toronto And Roger Blitz In London

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

A takeover wave worth more than $15bn swept through global markets on Monday, boosting stock indices as big deals by investors such as Bill Gates and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts eased fears of a slowdown in merger activity.

The flurry of activity – dubbed "Takeover Monday" by analysts – was led by a $3.7bn bid by Mr Gates and Prince Alwaleed, the billionaire Saudi investor, for Four Seasons Hotels, the Canadian chain.

Other big deals – including a €4bn takeover by KKR and Goldman Sachs of the lift-truck unit of Germany's Linde and the $3.2bn sale of the OSI restaurant chain to Bain Capital and Catterton Partners – were led by private equity groups.

The main exception was a $3.7bn offer by Abbot Laboratories, the drugmaker, for Kos Pharmaceuticals, its rival.

The growing influence of buy-out funds, which have dominated recent activity thanks to their huge cash resources and favourable debt markets, has led to fears over the privatisation of large portions of the global economy and the amount of debt taken on by private equity groups.

But equity investors put those worries to one side and welcomed the raft of deals, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average 100 points higher to 12,105.55 – its biggest one-day rise in a month. The broader S&P 500 and the technology-focused Nasdaq index also rose more than 1 per cent.

The takeover offers for Four Seasons and OSI, owner of Outback steakhouses, were supported by the companies' managements and founders. The trend has marked much of recent buy-out activity, raising concerns among corporate governance experts that the interests of companies' managements might clash with shareholders' rights to get the highest possible price.

The proposed Four Seasons deal would trigger a $288m payment to Isadore Sharp, chairman and chief executive, who opened the first Four Seasons hotel in 1960. He said the deal would provide "continuity and stability for owners, customers and employees for the long term".

Prince Alwaleed and Mr Gates are already Four Seasons shareholders through their respective investment companies, Kingdom Hotels and Cascade Investment. Mr Sharp and his family control 65 per cent of the votes through multiple voting shares.

The two billionaires were reported by a Microsoft website monitor two years ago to have collaborated on plans to expand Microsoft's operation in Saudi Arabia and on Saudi humanitarian projects.

Mr Gates has hosted the prince at his Washington home, where they discussed shared investments such as Four Seasons.

The three groups have offered $82 cash for each limited voting share, or a 28.4 per cent premium over Friday's closing price. The shares, listed in Toronto and New York, rose about 30 per cent to slightly above the offer price.

Merger Market Arrives At 'good Spot' (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091506

Monday looked like the day of the deal again, for this week at least, as a wave of mergers and acquisitions swept Wall Street, enveloping half a dozen U.S. companies.

Among the highlights, luxury hotel chain Four Seasons said it received an offer to be bought for $3.7 billion; Outback Steakhouse operator OSI Restaurants said it is selling itself for $3 billion; and biotech firm Kos said it agreed to a $3.7 billion takeover.

While none of those fall into the blockbuster category, they come on top of an avalanche of deals announced this year and virtually ensure that 2006 will be the busiest period for takeovers since the end of the '90s bull market.

Just four trading days into November, there have already been $28.3 billion worth of U.S. deals this month, bringing the tally of announced deals in 2006 to 9,461 worth $966.9 billion, says FactSet Mergerstat. That nearly tops all of last year, and you'd have to go all the way back to 2000 to find a busier year so far, Mergerstat says.

"The merger market is in a good spot right now," says Robert Filek of PricewaterhouseCoopers.

Monday's deals had a little bit of everything. Several were a continuation of the trend for companies to go private in the current version of what used to be known as leveraged buyouts. A private equity firm with Bill Gates as an investor offered to buy Four Seasons for $82 a share, sending the stock up 29% to $82.50. OSI saw its shares gain 23% to $39.75 on a $40-a-share offer from a private equity firm.

Many of the others, though, were takeovers for strategic reasons, such as Abbott Labs buying Kos in a deal worth $78 a share. Audio semiconductor maker PortalPlayer's shares fell 1 cent to $13.35 on news it is being bought by Nvidia for $357 million, or $13.50 a share. Swift Transportation stock jumped 24% to $29.84 after the trucking company said it received an offer to be bought by its former CEO for $2.2 billion, or $29 a share.

This is all part of a broader M&A boom this year in which:

•Private equity is playing a bigger role. Firms that buy public companies and take them private with hopes of selling them later at a profit accounted for a quarter of the deals based on dollar value, says Dealogic, up from 14% last year and just 3% in 2000.

•Megadeals are blooming. The number of buyouts valued at $1 billion or more has hit 174 this year, 5% more than all of 2005 and the most since 212 in all of 2000, says Mergerstat. "It's been the year people have decided if they're going to do a big deal, this is it," says Mergerstat's Kurt Kunert.

•Cash is swelling. Many of the buyouts are being done with cash: 70% of the 22 mergers announced around the globe Monday were for cash, says Sara Moeller, professor of finance at Wake Forest University. That's partly due to private equity firms, which pay cash, but it shows corporate buyers are confident the deals will succeed, she says.

•Banks are eager to lend. Only 1.7% of commercial loans were delinquent or charged off in the first quarter, says PricewaterhouseCoopers. That's below the 2% rate in first quarter of 2005 and well below the recent peak of 5.9% in the third quarter of 2002.

But as hectic as the recent merger activity is, it still falls short of the banner year of 2000. Merger activity tends to pick up when stocks rally, and it's unlikely that stocks will boom like they did in 2000, says Hemang Desai, professor of accounting at Southern Methodist University: "I can't imagine that kind of activity again."

Yellen: Income Gap Poses Risk (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 7, 2006

U.S. income inequality has risen to such a level that "there are signs that (it) is intensifying resistance to globalization, impairing social cohesion, and could, ultimately, undermine American democracy," San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank President Janet Yellen said Monday.

In language rare for a central bank official, Yellen suggested that high priority be given to improving education, tax credits and other aspects of the social safety net, despite the cost in dollars and possible impact on economic efficiency, according to the text of her lecture at the University of California, Irvine.

DOJ_NMG_0091507

“Inequality has risen to the point that it seems to me worthwhile for the U.S. to seriously consider taking the risk of making our economy more rewarding for more of the people,” Yellen said.

Separately Monday:

•Former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan said that while the housing market has not hit bottom, “The worst is behind us.”

Greenspan also told a Washington meeting organized by financial services firm Charles Schwab that he is “reasonably confident” the nation will not slide into recession because businesses appear strong.

•Chicago Fed President Michael Moskow said inflation remains too high, even with slower economic growth, suggesting the Fed might have to raise rates again if price pressures do not moderate.

The Fed boosted short-term rates 17 times from mid-2004 to mid-2006. It has held rates at 5.25% since August. While the economy has slowed significantly, inflation is still running above the Fed's 1% to 2% comfort range.

Yellen's remarks focused on a longer-term economic trend: the growing U.S. income and wealth gap. She noted that during the past three decades, much of the gain from U.S. economic performance had gone to the people at the top of the income ladder.

From 1973 to 2005, real hourly wages of those in the highest 10% income bracket rose 30% or more, with big gains in the top 1%. Those in the bottom half of the scale saw 5% to 10% gains. The pattern altered a bit in the past decade, when people near the bottom actually saw faster gains than those in the middle, and the top continued to prosper.

Yellen attributed the growing gap to the higher premium for education, changes in technology and globalization. Controversies regarding executive pay “quite naturally raise concerns for the public and contribute to feelings of dissatisfaction,” she said.

Yellen said inequality is higher in the USA than in other industrial nations and the safety net less generous.

Bush Campaigns, Dems Assail Status Quo (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 7, 2006

On the eve of midterm elections, Democrats criticized Republicans as stewards of a stale status quo while President Bush declared, "we're closing strong" in a final drive to preserve GOP control of Congress.

"They can't run anything right," countered former President Clinton, taunting Republicans about the war in Iraq, the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and even the scandal involving the House page program that complicated GOP efforts to win two more years in power.

Bush campaigned on Monday from Florida to Arkansas and Texas. But the day brought one more reminder of his poor standing in the polls when Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist skipped the presidential rally in Pensacola, Fla., to make a speech of his own hundreds of miles away.

Bush made no mention of the evident snub in public, but not so his aides. "Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice, versus 8,000 or 9,000 people" expected for the president's speech, said Karl Rove, the White House's top political strategist.

Some late polls suggested momentum was swinging the Republicans' way, and Ken Mehlman, the party chairman, told allies the surveys summoned memories of 1998, when the GOP lost seats but held power.

Democrats steadfastly refused to say so in public, but some Republicans signaled privately they expected to lose more than 15 seats, and control of the House with them.

Among GOP-held open seats, those in Arizona, Colorado, New York, Ohio and Iowa seemed likeliest to fall. Republican Reps. John Hostettler, Chris Chocola and Mike Sodrel of Indiana; Charles Taylor of North Carolina; Curt Weldon, Don Sherwood and Melissa Hart of Pennsylvania; and Charles Bass of New Hampshire were in particularly difficult re-election struggles.

Democrats also boasted of several election targets in New York, where Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic candidate for governor, were expected to win landslides at the top of the ticket.

DOJ_NMG_0091508

Easily two dozen more Republican seats were in jeopardy, including one in Texas that may not be settled until next month. There, Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla and former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, a Democrat, were the leading contenders in an eight-candidate field. A run-off between the two top vote-getters would follow if no one won a majority on Tuesday.

In contrast, only a few Democratic incumbents appeared in jeopardy, including Reps. John Barrow in Georgia; Melissa Bean in Illinois and — in a race that bore no impact on the broader party struggle — William Jefferson in Louisiana. Jefferson, ensnared in a federal corruption investigation, faced a likely runoff on Dec. 9, possibly against fellow Democrat Karen Carter.

After months of pursuing the Republicans, Democrats declined to say they would catch them.

"From the Iraq war to the economy to how the Congress does its work, the American people want a different direction — and that's what Democrats offer," Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the head of the House Democrats' campaign committee, said Monday.

"We have never said we're going to take control of the Senate. We have said we're on the edge. That's where we are," said Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., chairman of the Senate Democrats' organization.

Democrats needed to gain six seats to win control of the Senate. GOP Sens. Mike DeWine in Ohio and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania appeared in deepest trouble, Sens. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Conrad Burns in Montana somewhat less so.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, in line to become the first woman speaker in history if Democrats win, was in Washington after a weekend of campaigning for candidates in Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

Neither Bush nor Clinton, the president and ex-president, was on Tuesday's ballot, but both campaigned energetically toward the finish line.

In Bentonville, Ark., where he campaigned for Asa Hutchinson, the party's gubernatorial candidate, Bush said Republicans had late momentum because they were stressing that Democrats would raise taxes if they gained power.

"The Democrats want to raise taxes when you're born, when you're working, when you retire and when you die," Bush said in Florida as his audience laughed appreciatively. "In other words, the Democrats' philosophy is this: 'If it breathes, tax it. And if it stops breathing, find their children, tax them."

Campaigning in Missouri, Democratic senatorial candidate Claire McCaskill said it wasn't so. She was in a supermarket meeting voters when one shopper asked her whether she wanted to raise taxes.

"There's nothing to that allegation," she replied. "We're going to cut taxes for the middle class."

She added that previous tax cuts "that just help the very wealthy should be retargeted to the middle class."

As he has repeatedly, the president attacked Democrats for their position on the war in Iraq.

"Oh, they've got some ideas. Some of them say, 'get out right now.' Some of them say, 'get out at a fixed date,' even though the job hasn't been done. One of them said, 'let's move our troops to an island some 5,000 away.'"

Clinton, the former president, provided the rebuttal to that charge from a stage in Rochester, N.Y..

"On this 'stay the course in Iraq' deal, they say we're the cut-and-run crowd," he said. "These people don't look like cut and run to me," he said, gesturing at Eric Massa, a House candidate and Navy veteran, and former Sen. Max Cleland, a triple amputee from war wounds suffered in Vietnam a generation ago.

The campaign's final hours brought fresh evidence of the enormous cost.

Spending by the two national parties surged in the final week as Democrats and Republicans invested in television commercials designed to sway the outcome in more than 60 House races and 10 Senate contests. In all, the two parties have spent about $225 million thus far in campaign activities independent of the candidates themselves.

Candidate A No-show At Bush Rally (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, FLA. — The schedule for the GOP's Florida "victory rally" said that President Bush would be introduced to the crowd by the party's nominee for governor, Charlie Crist.

The president was there, but Crist was not. And the White House signaled its unhappiness.

DOJ_NMG_0091509

With Bush doing poorly in opinion surveys, some Republican candidates have indicated that they did not want to appear with him at election season events.

Crist's campaign said that was not the case this time. It said the candidate had no need to spend his final campaign day in conservative Pensacola, the site of Monday's rally.

Still, Karl Rove, Bush's chief political strategist, made a snippy remark to reporters about Crist's decision to appear in other cities instead.

"Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice, versus 8,000 or 9,000 in Pensacola," Rove said.

He overestimated the size of the Pensacola crowd by several thousand.

Crist is Florida's attorney general. If elected governor, he would replace Bush's brother Jeb, who is retiring due to term limits.

A spokesman for Crist's opponent said voters should consider the canceled appearance to be "a snub."

"Despite how much [Crist] has in common with President Bush, President Bush isn't very popular right now," said Josh Earnest, a spokesman for Democratic nominee Jim Davis. "Sensing that this race is getting a lot closer, I think Mr. Crist decided that he didn't want to take a political risk."

Still, Bush on Monday enthusiastically endorsed Crist, who has been leading Davis in most opinion polls.

"He's experienced, he's compassionate and he'll work hard on behalf of all the citizens of this important state," Bushsaid.

Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), whose candidacy was discouraged by GOP leaders and who is trailing badly in opinion polls in her bid to unseat Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson, also appeared at the Pensacola rally. Bush did not mention Harris, who appeared well before him.

Bush also spent his last hours before election day campaigning in Arkansas for a struggling Republican gubernatorial candidate, Asa Hutchinson. The president ended the day in Dallas supporting Gov. Rick Perry, who succeeded Bush in 2001.

With the president having campaigned almost exclusively for House and Senate candidates, his shift on the final day to campaigning for those seeking state offices suggested he had touched base in most of the districts where his presence would help, rather than hinder, Republican candidates.

Crist Snubs President On Election Eve; Davis Calls To 'The Disgusted' (FLSUNSEN)

By Mark Hollis

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, November 7, 2006

ST. PETERSBURG -- Republican Charlie Crist and Democrat Jim Davis ended their 18-month campaigns for governor Monday amid a flap over Crist declining to campaign with President Bush.

Crist fended off criticism on election eve from both the White House and Democrats for not appearing with the president at a Republican rally in the Panhandle. Crist visited eight other cities, including a stop with U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a possible 2008 Republican presidential contender.

Davis seized on the Crist-Bush controversy and made it a theme of his final day of campaigning, which included rallies with union members, black Democrats and even a push into Florida's politically conservative Panhandle.

Both candidates hop-scotched around the state on chartered aircraft, telling supporters they sensed victory coming their way.

"I want you to get out and work your heart out," Davis, a Tampa congressman, told about 100 supporters at a Jacksonville union hall. "Tomorrow is the day we're not only equal in the eyes of God, but in the eyes of one another."

Crist also relied on an upbeat message, telling 200 supporters in Jacksonville, "I feel victory. But I want to do more than feel it. I want to deliver it for you tomorrow night."

But it was irritation shown by the White House and pestering by Democrats over Crist's snub of the president in Pensacola that captured media attention. Crist's spokesman said Sunday the candidate was skipping a rally there because he needed to spend his final day of campaigning elsewhere in the state, including vote-rich South Florida.

On Monday, speaking to reporters in Texas, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove mockingly questioned what kind of alternate rally Crist would put together that would rival the crowd Bush was expected to attract in Republican-heavy Pensacola.

DOJ_NMG_0091510

The White House had to hastily recruit outgoing Gov. Jeb Bush to introduce his brother, having already distributed schedules saying Crist would play that role.

"Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice versus 8,000 or 9,000 people" in Pensacola, said Rove, the president's top political strategist.

Crist told supporters he still backs the president.

"We're delighted that he came to Florida," Crist said before waving signs with supporters at the corner of Oakland Park Boulevard and Federal Highway in Fort Lauderdale. "But it's important for me to get all over Florida."

Pensacola's market is among the most Republican, and campaigning there has been a priority for Crist. It's the heart of a region that is home to many active and retired military members. After the 2000 election, when Florida's vote was disputed for 36 days, Bush picked Pensacola for his maiden voyage to the state as president -- the one place he was certain to be enthusiastically welcomed. Now polls show widespread dissatisfaction with him statewide.

Davis took notice during his campaign stops. "Now that the president is so unpopular, Charlie refuses to stand side by side with him," he said. "It says when the going gets tough, Charlie won't stand up."

Buoyed by polls that show the governor contest to be close and knowing turnout is the key to victory, Davis in recent days stepped up his appeal to moderate Republicans and voters who have no political affiliation.

On Monday, he made stops in Panama City and Pensacola, only hours after the Bush appearance. Davis' running mate, Air Force Reserve Col. Daryl Jones, a former fighter pilot and state senator from Miami-Dade County, has spent time in the area trying to woo the votes of military retirees.

In their closing pitches to voters, Crist and Davis strayed little from their well-honed stump speeches.

Crist, the state's attorney general and a former state senator, promised voters lower taxes and property insurance rates, while warning that Davis would not deliver either.

Davis urged voters to send him to Tallahassee as a reformer. While pounding Crist for running a campaign supported by special interests, Davis opened welcoming arms to "the disgusted, the disillusioned and the mildly curious Republicans and Independents" looking for change in Washington and Tallahassee.

Both campaigns expected to have phone-bank and sign-waving operations in full swing until polls close tonight.

At frequent stops, Crist and Davis urged supporters to keep pushing for votes. Many of their supporters indicated they were feeling good about their candidates' chances.

Several union leaders, for instance, said during a Davis visit to Jacksonville that while their organizations traditionally support the Democratic nominee, they are working harder for Davis.

"It's different this time," said Minerva Faire, secretary of the North Florida Central Labor Council. "We feel it's within our reach. Congressman Davis is a working family man and that makes a big difference."

Crist's backers were equally enthusiastic.

"When you have a good candidate, people respond," said Ernesto Gonzalez, an Orlando architect standing near Crist during the Republican's stop there. "We all want lower taxes and cheaper insurance. With the right leadership, maybe it happens."

Bush Stumps (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, Fla. - The closer the election came to the finish line, the more President Bush's aides battled the perception he was doing his party as much harm as good and was unwanted in many districts.

On Monday, Bush jetted to a conservative corner of Florida's Panhandle, about as far as he could get from the state's three in-play House districts. To the White House's embarrassment and irritation, Republican Charlie Crist, whom Bush came to help in his bid to succeed the president's brother as governor, decided at the last minute to skip the chance to be by the president's side.

DOJ_NMG_0091511

In a speech bracketed by raucous foot-stomping to country music and an explosion of metallic red-white-and-blue confetti, Bush won cheers for applauding Saddam Hussein's conviction, lambasting Democrats on the war on terror and accusing the opposition party of plotting to raise taxes.

"The Democrat philosophy is this: If it breathes, tax it, and if it stops breathing, find its children and tax them," Bush shouted.

Next up was Arkansas, where Republican Asa Hutchinson remained well behind in his race to keep that governor's mansion in Republican hands. Still Bush was upbeat.

"You know, I knew we were going to finish strong," Bush told supporters gathered in an airplane hangar with Air Force One parked outside. "I knew that we were going to come roarin' into Election Day because we've got the right position on taxes, we've got the right position on what it takes to protect you from attack."

Finally, Bush was calling it a wrap Monday night in Texas. It was somewhat of a sentimental stop for the president, taking him to his home state and specifically to Dallas, where Bush has headlined rallies the night before most elections.

It was still remarkable that, with so many Republicans around the country facing too-close-to-call races and with GOP majorities in the House, Senate and the nation's statehouses in jeopardy, Bush decided to spend capital on GOP Gov. Rick Perry, who hardly needed the president's assistance to get re-elected.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush's travels on Monday to races more on the periphery of this high-stakes midterm campaign represented the president honoring "long-standing promises" to his brother, Hutchinson and Perry.

But Bush's final five-day sprint to Election Day took on little of the urgency of the last days before the 2002 midterm election, or certainly the close of his own re-election race two years ago.

He's been starting later in the day and finishing by bedtime, with just one stop on Saturday and two on Sunday - all in smaller, very GOP-friendly areas. The last three nights, he even slept in his own bed in Crawford, Texas.

Republican leaders say that the president's get-out-the-vote push in GOP strongholds was helping. The free media coverage that accompanies a presidential visit was keeping his party from having to spend precious dollars in those districts. And some new polls showed a lift in Republican enthusiasm for voting.

"The president's travels are part of the difference," Snow said.

White House aides mocked Crist's choice to duck the Bush rally, which they only learned about on Sunday morning - too late to change the printed schedules that had Crist introducing the president at the rally.

Crist chief of staff George LeMieux said the conservative Pensacola area was so firmly in his camp, and so hard to get to, that it made more sense to campaign elsewhere in the state. Said Crist: "I'm glad he's come to our state, but I've got to get around Florida."

Still, Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser, suggested that reporters see whether Crist would be able to hastily assemble anything like the Pensacola event, which drew about 7,000.

Bush ignored the flap. "I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist to be governor of the state of Florida," he said.

With Crist as a no-show, Bush was joined on stage by a host of Florida Republican officeholders and candidates - but not by Republican Rep. Katherine Harris. She has run a much-panned Senate race that has had her Republican elders cringing and both the president and retiring Gov. Jeb Bush largely avoiding her.

Attack Of The Hacks (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Has there ever been a more negative, dispiriting election? Is there any hope and optimism left in this country, or is our political culture based on nothing but seething dislike and sour resentment?

Democrats and Republicans sought to win voters with the same basic message: You may not think much of us, but at least we're better than the other guys.

Anyone who owns a television or a radio already knows that candidates and parties in this midterm smackdown spent tons more on negative political ads than on positive ones. Every contest seemed to feature a scoundrel vs. a knave, a hack vs. an idiot, a doofus vs. a dolt.

DOJ_NMG_0091512

In fact, politicians use so many negative ads because they work. UCLA psychiatry professor Marco Iacoboni described for the Associated Press his research from the 2004 presidential campaign. Using magnetic resonance imaging, he found that when test subjects were initially shown pictures of their favored candidates, an area of the brain associated with empathy lit up. But after the subjects had been exposed to negative ads about their candidates, that same area of the brain failed to respond. Politicians have known this for a long time.

The depressing nature of this endless campaign went beyond negative ads, however. Examine the messages that were delivered by the two parties and then try to find a reason to be filled with hope about the future.

The Republican Party was saddled with an unpopular president who led the nation into an unnecessary and unwinnable war, mocked traditional American notions of justice and privacy, reasserted the powers of an imperial presidency, and generally showed himself willing to disregard objective facts if they were not to his liking. That wasn't much for Republican incumbents to work with.

Still, the party did manage to come up with a coherent message: We might be making a mess of things, but if you vote for the Democrats they'll raise your taxes and let terrorists threaten your family.

The Democratic Party had the advantage of having been out of power during the whole Iraq misadventure, which gave every Democratic candidate an even simpler message to transmit to voters: Look, I'm not George W. Bush.

In terms of politics, that was smart. But "not George Bush" doesn't qualify as much of a vision for America's future. At some point, it can't be enough just to list all the problems the Republicans have created or failed to address. What are the solutions?

It's no wonder that so many voters call themselves independent these days. And no wonder that so many candidates stood out from the pack this year by highlighting the ways in which they departed from the party line -- Republicans who openly questioned the war, or Democrats who spoke about faith and family values.

Americans deserve more from their political leaders than they got this year. The party that gets to define the next era in America will be the party that has a more compelling, forward-looking story to tell than what we heard this year, which was, in a nutshell, "Those other guys are so lame."

Vote Republican, America Is At War: Bush (AFP-Y)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, November 7, 2006

President George W. Bush made his final plea to voters ahead of knife-edge congressional elections, telling them to vote Republican if they want America's full protection.

Bush, on a final three-state swing of a campaign dominated by the war in Iraq, branded Democrats as soft on the "war on terror" and also predicted Republicans would crush their rivals' hopes of seizing back control of one or both chambers of Congress.

But he suffered one final campaign trail indignity, as the Republican candidate to succeed the president's brother Jeb as Florida governor snubbed him at a rally, apparently wary of Bush's low poll ratings.

Despite polls showing public discontent over his management of the Iraq war, Bush delivered a hard-hitting warning to voters, staking out political ground on national security that helped him win past campaigns.

"As you go to the polls remember if you want your taxes low vote Republican," Bush said at a rally in Pensacola, Florida.

"As you go the the polls, remember we are at war and if you want this country to do everything in its power to protect you and at the same time lay the foundation of peace for generations to come, vote Republican."

Bush again taunted his rivals with the death sentence handed down to former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein on Sunday, saying it was vindication for the US invasion in 2003.

"My decision to get rid of Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better for it," he said, as the crowd burst into a chant of "USA! USA!"

"The only way we will not win is if we leave before the job is done," he said. "If you listen for the plan from the Democrats, there isn't one."

DOJ_NMG_0091513

But the low opinion poll ratings which have dogged Bush during the campaign were highlighted again when Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist skipped an appearance with Bush in the state which handed him the presidency after a protracted recount drama six years ago.

He quickly made clear he did not bear Crist a grudge.

"Tomorrow you get to vote for a new governor, and I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist" and praising him as "experienced" and "compassionate."

But Bush's political guru Karl Rove was not impressed.

"All I know is that yesterday morning they apparently made a decision that rather than being with the governor and the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last minute decision to go to Palm Beach," said Rove.

Asked whether this reflected Bush's low popularity, Rove replied: "Let's look at the comparison, let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice versus eight or nine thousand people in Pensacola."

Bush was later to head on to Arkansas and Texas, to wrap up a 10-state campaign blitz buoyed by signs his Republican party was picking up steam in the final hours.

One Republican who did not snub Bush here was Katherine Harris, the former senior Florida official reviled by Democrats for her role in the dramatic recount controversy.

But though Harris addressed the crowd, she was not seen alongside Bush, frustrating photographers clamouring for a shot of them together.

Harris trails badly in a statewide Senate race to Democrat Bill Nelson, after what many analysts decried as a chaotic campaign.

Several national polls in the final hours of the campaign showed a narrowing of the race, prompting Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman to proclaim voters were discovering new "enthusiasm" for Republicans.

A Washington Post and ABC television poll showed likely voters favoring Democrats to Republicans by 51 percent to 45 percent. In an October 22 survey, the Democrats had led 55-41.

The non-partisan Pew Research Center found a 47-43 lead for Democrats among likely voters, down from 50-39 two weeks ago.

A new USA Today/Gallup survey published Monday showed Democratic challengers ahead in Senate races in Montana, Rhode Island, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

A poll for McClatchy newspapers and MSNBC meanwhile suggested Republicans had also come from behind in Rhode Island and Montana, to lead or tie Democrat opponents.

GOP Hopefuls Absent From Bush Rally (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Lipman, Deana Poole, Brian E. Crowely, And SV Date

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA — Florida voters head to the polls today to pick a new governor and at least two new members of the Cabinet, as well as to help decide whether President Bush will face an unfriendly Congress for his final two years in office.

To support his party's candidates in Florida, Bush wrapped up a 10-state campaign tour Monday in Pensacola. But the state's top Republican candidates were conspicuously absent from the presidential rally, which drew about 7,500 people.

The only statewide candidate to attend the event featuring the president and his brother Gov. Jeb Bush was U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris. But Harris, who trails far behind in the polls in her bid to unseat Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, did not appear on stage with them.

While the president was in Pensacola, Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor, was visiting the Lox Around the Clock bagel shop west of Delray Beach.

Republicans Bill McCollum, who is seeking to succeed Crist as attorney general, and incumbent Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson were campaigning along the Interstate 4 corridor. Tom Lee, the GOP candidate for chief financial officer, also was not in Pensacola.

DOJ_NMG_0091514

Their Democratic opponents - Alex Sink (chief financial officer), Skip Campbell (attorney general) and Eric Copeland (agriculture commissioner) - had appeared with Nelson, gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis, former President Clinton and former Sen. Bob Graham at a rally Saturday in Miami.

Crist's absence drew sarcastic remarks Monday from Davis and even from the president's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

"Charlie Crist has been campaigning standing up with George Bush this entire campaign," Davis told nearly 200 cheering supporters at a Pensacola church. "Next to the insurance industry, George Bush has probably raised more money for Charlie Crist than anybody else. But now that the president is so remarkably unpopular, once again, Charlie Crist refuses to stand up.

"Charlie Crist may have forgotten that you are part of Florida. I will never forget."

Rove also questioned Crist's decision to skip the appearance.

"Rather than being with the governor and the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last-minute decision to go to Palm Beach," Rove told reporters in Texas. "Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice versus 8,000 or 9,000 people in Pensacola."

Crist said he was not snubbing the president. Appearing with Bush "is always a great opportunity," he said, "but it's much more important to me to get to all the cities."

Asked whether he was concerned about his future relationship with the White House, Crist said, "No, it's a great relationship."

The McCollum and Bronson campaigns said the president's declining approval ratings had nothing to do with their absences.

"If you look at the statewide numbers, they say that the I-4 corridor and up to Jacksonville are important to shore up," Bronson said. "If it had been around the Orlando-Tampa area where we could have still made the stop, we'd have been more than happy to be with the president."

Bush did not mention the absences and urged the crowd to vote for all GOP candidates for statewide office.

Bush said of Crist: "He's experienced, he's compassionate and he'll work hard on behalf of all the citizens of this important state. And while you're in there voting for Charlie, vote for Katherine Harris for the United States Senate."

White House spokesman Tony Snow also downplayed the absences of Crist and the Cabinet candidates.

"You've got to keep in mind, these events are not only important for revving up Republicans who are in the vicinity, but people all around the country are now looking at these speeches and looking at these events, and they're getting a sense of the energy of the crowds," Snow said.

During his speech, Bush concentrated on low taxes and terrorism.

"If you want your taxes low, vote Republican," Bush said. "And as you go to the polls, remember we're at war. And if you want this country to do everything in its power to protect you, and at the same time lay the foundation of peace for generations to come, vote Republican.

"Some of the folks in Washington think they've already figured out the results. That's what happened in 2004. Some of them up there started listening to the prognosticators and started picking out their offices in the west wing. Then the people in Florida voted and people around the country voted, and the movers weren't needed."

Bush was joined on stage by his wife, Laura, U.S. Rep. Jeff Miller of Pensacola, U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez and a few state legislators. Harris, who was actively discouraged from running for the Senate by the governor, White House advisers and other key state and national Republicans, spoke to the crowd about an hour before the president arrived.

During Bush's appearance, Harris and her husband, Anders Ebbeson, stood among the crowd. Asked why Harris wasn't on stage, spokeswoman Jennifer Marks said, "It's not a matter of where you sit, but where you stand on the issues."

Crist spent his day touring the state, with stops in St. Petersburg, Tampa, Orlando, Jacksonville, Delray Beach, Fort Lauderdale, Miami and Cape Coral.

Davis began his final, marathon campaign day with a visit to a longshoremen's union hall in Jacksonville. Davis urged about 200 dock workers to go to the polls today and take their friends with them. He urged them to ignore Republicans' boasts of tax cuts.

"Anybody in this room get a tax cut? No. Because you all don't have your own lobbyists," Davis said.

DOJ_NMG_0091515

In Tallahassee, Davis, who was trailing by about five points in polls conducted by Republicans and Democrats, took a shot at Crist's remark that he couldn't be in Pensacola because he needed to be "in Florida."

"So I'm running against a fellow who doesn't know when the FCAT is given, doesn't know who his member of Congress is and doesn't know Pensacola is part of Florida," Davis said.

Crist explained that he meant he needed to be in "peninsular Florida."

In Orlando, Crist said he was "excited" about today's election. "I'm ready for the conclusion, and I'm sure the voters are, too. It's a long race, it's challenging and it's fun."

Crist took his own shot at Davis, telling supporters: "If they want their taxes cut, they ought to vote for Charlie Crist. If they want higher taxes, they ought to vote for Jim Davis. The choice is crystal clear."

Crist was joined in Jacksonville by U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a likely 2008 presidential candidate who predicted that if Crist wins, "it puts him on the national stage, particularly in the ranks of Republican leaders."

Besides attending the rally, Harris stopped at Pensacola's Coffee Cup Restaurant, a popular local diner known for its grits.

After working the crowd, she gave a brief version of her usual stump speech, criticizing Nelson's stances on taxes, traditional values and immigration.

For Nelson, the final day before the election was a trip down memory lane as he met with about 60 longtime supporters in the Melbourne building that once housed his junior high school - the scene of Nelson's first political speech, when he was elected student body president in the eighth grade - and then stood waving a sign on street corners in Melbourne, Cocoa and Orlando.

Nelson said that if he is reelected, he plans to speak out more on national affairs and try to formulate bipartisan solutions to Social Security, energy conservation, education and the war in Iraq.

Nelson said he would not run for president but left open the suggestion he would welcome being a vice presidential candidate.

Bush Ends 10-state Blitz To Keep A GOP Congress (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

DALLAS -- President Bush last night wrapped up a 10,000-mile, 10-state campaign blitz, but now he can only wait to see whether he will have a friendly House and Senate to help him push through his agenda over his final two years in office, or a Democratic majority that will fight him at every turn.

Before about 10,000 screaming supporters gathered at Reunion Arena for his last rally of the midterm congressional campaign, the president predicted that Republicans will keep control of both houses.

"We're closing strong because we're right on the issues," Mr. Bush said. "For the next 2½ years, I'm going to sprint as hard as I can to make this country great."

Mr. Bush spent the last two weeks of the campaign cycle trying to turn out the Republican base, visiting states he won in 2004. But many election strategists say dispirited conservatives may not go to the polls today, and Democrats say they are poised to take control of the House, and possibly the Senate as well.

Still, several new polls showed that the race for control of Congress may be narrowing, and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman proclaimed that voters are discovering new "enthusiasm" for Republicans.

In his final campaign swing, the president stoked that enthusiasm at events attended by a total of more than 75,000 Republicans. At events in Montana, Nevada, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Florida, Arkansas and Texas, Mr. Bush urged supporters to get out the vote.

"I thank you for what you have done to help these candidates, and I thank you for what you're going to do for the next 24 hours. You're going to pick up the phone, you're going to make the phone calls, you're going to turn out your friends and neighbors, and we're going to win," he said to cheers from supporters in Florida.

In an odd twist -- showing the difficulties Republicans face this year as polls show voter dissatisfaction with Mr. Bush and the war in Iraq -- the man who had invited the president to Pensacola, Fla., did not show up. Florida gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, who holds an eight-point lead on his challenger in the most recent poll, said he skipped the event because he needed to campaign in other parts of the state where his support was weak.

Here in Texas, Mr. Bush headlined a rally for the man who succeeded him as governor of Texas, Rick Perry. But his final stop of this campaign will likely turn out to have been overkill: Mr. Perry leads his closest challenger by 16 percentage points in the latest poll.

At every stop on the road, Mr. Bush extolled the achievements of the Republican-controlled Congress: Tax cuts, low unemployment, steep reductions in the deficit. He also hit hot-button conservative issues -- defining marriage as between a man and a woman, lambasting Democrats for stalling his judicial nominations, and touting Republicans' strength on national security.

"We're closing strong in this election because the American people have finally figured out our tax cuts work, and the Democrats are going to raise your taxes," the president said in Arkansas.

As the Bush administration's top officials fanned out across the country in last-ditch efforts to ramp up Republican voters, Democrats also called out their own top guns in the final days. Former President Bill Clinton, who made 30 campaign stops in 15 states in October, stumped Sunday for Democratic candidates in Maryland and yesterday for Virginia Senate candidate James H. Webb Jr.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who said he is considering a presidential run in 2008, campaigned for Tennessee Senate candidate Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., as well as for candidates in Missouri, Maryland and Pennsylvania. Even House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, absent from the campaign trail for weeks, attended rallies for candidates in Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

But Republicans countered with their own stars, including former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who campaigned for Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, Michigan gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Virginia Sen. George Allen. Arizona Sen. John McCain, also expected to run for president in 2008, campaigned for Tennessee Senate candidate Bob Corker and for Mr. Allen.

President Who Sees In Absolutes Awaits Voters' Definitive Answer (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, Fla., Nov. 6 -- These are trying times for President Bush. On the last day of the last campaign that will affect him directly, he came here as a favor to his brother on behalf of the Republican candidate for governor. Only the Republican candidate for governor skipped the event. Too busy, he said, to be with the president of the United States.

So it goes these days. Bush shrugged it off and delivered a robust speech, firing up a crowd of Republicans and defiantly predicting victory. Any doubt he may harbor, he kept to himself. Any feelings of regret are locked tight inside. The rest of the world may see an unpopular president in the midst of an unpopular war. But Bush soldiers on. He does not publicly stew as other presidents have. He powers through event after event as if he were still the leader the country rallied behind after Sept. 11, 2001.

To his critics, it sometimes seems as if Bush lives in his own world, oblivious or unwilling to accept the shifting reality around him. His is a world of absolutes. "I view this as a struggle of good versus evil," he said the other day about the war with terrorists. To Bush, that is strength, not weakness -- the certitude of conviction, the power of principle. He's "the decider" in a business afflicted by equivocation and thumb-sucking.

Few deciders have gone through such a period in which the decisions seemed so out of their hands. He told North Korea not to test nuclear weapons, but Pyongyang detonated a bomb anyway. He tells Iran to stop pursuing nuclear weapons, only to have Tehran thumb its nose. He orders generals to find a way to stabilize Iraq, but bombs and bullets claimed more U.S. lives in October than in any other month in two years.

Now the voters are the deciders, and it's a verdict Bush can no longer influence. They will decide whether to give him back a Congress that stands by him more often than not or to turn over at least one house to the opposition to force change. Bush insists he's not worried. But at least one person who saw him in private a few days ago interpreted his body language to mean that he did not think Tuesday will be a great day for him.

DOJ_NMG_0091517

Bush woke up Monday at his ranch in Crawford, Tex., and was briefed by strategist Karl Rove on the shifting races. Rove told reporters later that of 20 recent polls in critical places, 16 had moved in the Republican direction and three were flat. "I knew we were going to finish strong," Bush said here.

Bush is not a nervous election-eve politician, obsessively poring over precinct-by-precinct reports, but he can be edgy or impatient and understands what is on the line, according to associates. As he embarked on his last day on the trail, Laura Bush came along, a calming presence during moments of pressure.

The president and his staff were offended by the last-minute snub by Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate to succeed term-limited Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. The White House scheduled the stop here in the conservative Panhandle as a favor to Jeb Bush entirely for Crist's benefit. But Crist decided to go elsewhere in the state. The White House schedule Monday morning still listed Crist as introducing the president.

Rove did not hide his consternation: "Rather than being with the governor and the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last-minute decision to go to Palm Beach. Let's look at the comparison. Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice versus 8,000 or 9,000 people in Pensacola."

The president was left with a rainy-day rally here for no one. The local congressman does not face a competitive race and the Bush brothers are estranged from Rep. Katherine Harris, the GOP Senate candidate, who polls show losing in a rout. Harris was given a three-minute speaking slot more than an hour before the president arrived and was not on stage during his appearance. Bush mentioned her only once in passing.

At times, Bush appears confounded by the political problems confronting him. He is absolutely certain that, as he puts it, "they're coming after us," meaning terrorists, but does not understand why many others do not see it with the clarity he does. "I am in disbelief that people don't take these people seriously," he told National Review and other conservative outlets last month.

That conversation provided a glimpse into Bush's aggravation and isolation. One participant, Lawrence Kudlow of CNBC, told Bush that he has supported the war but was discouraged and looking for hope.

"I need some good news, sir," Kudlow said.

"Yes, I do, too," Bush said.

"I really do," Kudlow repeated.

"You're talking to Noah about the flood," Bush said. "I do, too."

Bush seeks solace in history, certain that he will be vindicated, much as Harry S. Truman was unpopular in his day but is revered today. And Bush expresses exasperation that he cannot find a tangible yardstick to point to victory in Iraq.

"I don't know what Harry Truman was feeling like, or Franklin Roosevelt," he told the conservative journalists. "I'm sure there were moments of high frustration for them. But I do know that at Midway, they were eventually able to say two carriers were sunk and one was damaged. We don't get to say that. A thousand of the enemy killed, or whatever the number was. It's happening; you just don't know it. And there's no scorecard."

The elections, at least, come with a scorecard. But Bush has not maintained a particularly hectic pace. Whereas he hit 15 states in the final five days before the 2002 midterm elections, he visited 10 in the same period this year. He dropped off the trail for 24 hours over the weekend to celebrate the first lady's 60th birthday and their 29th anniversary.

When he went back out, he stuck to conservative areas without major races. That's because Crist is not the only Republican eager to keep a distance from a president with a 40 percent approval rating -- just the only one impolitic enough to snub him after inviting him on election eve.

Bush's last stops were chosen out of loyalty to allies rather than any effort to make a difference in a tossup race. He flew to Bentonville, Ark., for Asa Hutchinson, a former administration official running for governor, then to Dallas for Gov. Rick Perry. Neither race is close; Hutchinson trails by 17 points, and Perry leads by 14.

Bush's stump speech the past few weeks has underscored a with-us-or-against-us worldview. Democrats and some Republicans opposed warrantless surveillance of telephone calls of people with suspected ties to terrorism, objecting to unchecked executive power and arguing that officials should still get warrants from a secret intelligence court. Likewise, Democrats and initially some Republicans opposed redefining Geneva Conventions protections for prisoners and permitting harsh interrogation, preferring more traditional practices.

DOJ_NMG_0091518

In the version Bush offers campaign audiences, that boils down to the Democrats not wanting to fight terrorists at all. Democrats, he said in Missouri, "oppose listening in on terrorist conversations" and "oppose letting the CIA detain and question the terrorists who might know what those [next] plots are." As for Iraq, he said in Texas, if Democrats get their way, "the terrorists win and America loses."

One way or the other, someone loses Tuesday. Bush and Rove have remained outwardly confident in the face of the polls in part because they have so often prevailed over conventional wisdom. If polls were right, then John F. Kerry would be president, they tell doubters. Both bristle at the idea that the Washington elite has already counted them out.

Still, Bush advisers understand the odds against them. They have written off 10 or 12 "scandal seats," where ethical lapses have dominated. Democrats need 15 to take over the House, so victory in just a few tossup races would be enough. If that happens, the White House argument is likely to be that Republicans lost because of isolated corruption cases, not broader discontent with Bush or the war.

What Bush would do then becomes the next question. He arrived in Washington promising to be a uniter, not a divider, but the political polarization in the country is worse than when he took over. As recently as last month, his spokesman said that if nothing else, Bush wants to use his last two years to "detoxify" Washington -- and then Bush headed out to the campaign trail to warn that if Democrats win, "America loses."

How would he reconcile these competing instincts? The desire to be a healer and the surety that his way is the right way? The decider will have to decide.

Gubernatorial Candidates Scramble For Votes In Final Hours (HC)

By Julie Mason And Gary Scharrer

Houston Chronicle, November 7, 2006

The four major candidates for Texas governor made their final pitches to the voters today, with Gov. Rick Perry getting a personal boost from President Bush and independent Carole Keeton Strayhorn blitzing the state with Bush's former press secretary and the president's former Medicare chief.

Democrat Chris Bell campaigned in Amarillo, Dallas and Austin before returning to his home in Houston, where he will vote today) and await election returns.

Independent Kinky Friedman rallied in Temple.

In his last event of the campaign season, Bush touched down in Dallas for a rally with Perry, telling an estimated 10,000 people at Reunion Arena that ``You elected us to get things done."

``Let me put it to you this way," Bush told the cheering crowd. ``Everything I learned, I learned here in Texas."

Joined by local Republican officials and statewide officeholders, including Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst, Bush said, ``When you get in there to vote for Rick, make sure you vote for Dewhurst as well."

Strayhorn held airport news conferences in Harlingen, San Antonio, Houston and Dallas with her four sons, including Scott McClellan, the former White House press secretary, and Mark McClellan, who, until recently, was Bush's administrator of the Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services.

``A couple of his (Bush's) senior advisors think there's a better candidate for governor," Mark McClellan said.

Scott McClellan likened Strayhorn's style to the ``uniter, not a divider" theme that Bush used in his first presidential race.

``We think that spirit is what this campaign is all about - setting aside partisan politics and doing what's best for Texas," he said.

Also touring with Strayhorn were Brad McClellan, her campaign manager, and his twin brother, Dudley. Strayhorn's sons have campaigned with her throughout her political career, beginning in 1972 when she ran for the Austin school board.

At the various stops, the comptroller also was joined by Democratic and Republican officeholders to emphasize her cross-party message.

``We are going to prove the pundits wrong," she said of recent media-sponsored polls indicating she will finish third as Perry is reelected.

Bell and Friedman made similar comments about the voter surveys.

DOJ_NMG_0091519

Bell urged Democrats who have been flirting with Strayhorn or Friedman to come home to their party.

He acknowledged the difficulty of a Democrat regaining the governor's office after 12 years, but he said there's also an advantage in running against ``one of the least popular governors in the history of Texas."

``I'm the only one now in a position to take him out," he added.

In Dallas, where Bell was born, he campaigned with his father, Peter Bell, 83, a former Republican.

``If they (voters) just get to know him, he's a beautiful man," the elder Bell said of his son.

Friedman rallied about 100 voters in Temple at the office of Tejano star Little Joe Hernandez. He said he will be joined on election night by former Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura, the former wrestler who rode a wave of voter turnout to an upset victory as a Reform Party candidate in 1998.

``I think we're going to surge a lot stronger than the pollsters and the politicians and the pundits have predicted," said Friedman, for whom recent polls have predicted a fourth place finish with about 11 percent of the vote.

As Friedman was talking about the ``very strange coalition" supporting him, about 20 uniformed students from Holy Trinity, an area Catholic school, showed up.

The candidate vying to be the first Jewish governor of Texas gave the students a history lesson about one of his heroes, Father Damien, a Belgian Catholic missionary who ministered to lepers in Hawaii during the late 1800s.

President Bush raised a record $194 million for Republican candidates this year, but his diminished popularity nationally has limited his value in tightly contested races.

Instead, the president has stuck to largely conservative areas where his handlers believed he could make a positive difference. In two other stops today, Bush addressed rallies in Arkansas and Florida.

Today, the president and first lady vote at their local polling place in Crawford before heading back to Washington, where they plan to watch the election results at the White House.

Slightly more than 1 million people voted early in person or by mail in the 15 most populous counties, a slight increase over the 2002 gubernatorial election.

The number of early voters increased in several suburban, Republican-dominated counties, including Fort Bend and Montgomery (outside Houston), Williamson (outside Austin) and Collin and Denton (in the Metroplex), while early voting in Travis and Hidalgo counties, two Democratic strongholds, was down.

Secretary of State Roger Williams has predicted that 36 percent of the state's 3 million-plus registered voters will cast ballots, the same percentage as voted in 2002.

Bush Warns Against Presuming Democratic Victories (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, November 7, 2006

DALLAS -- After nearly six mostly tumultuous years as president, George W. Bush has come home to Texas to cast his own lone vote on a day when his party's national fortunes hang in the balance.

On Monday, the last day of his final political campaign that could effect his presidency, Bush brandished the unrelenting optimism which he has carried to his own personal battle for his party's control of Congress for months.

Bush also carried the added burden of his own unpopularity as president, with the war in Iraq having taken a toll on the president after nearly four years of combat. A Republican candidate for governor snubbed the president's appearance in Florida during an eleventh-hour, day-long campaign tour for governor's races in three states.

"Some folks in Washington think they've already figured out the results," said Bush, warning against presuming any Democratic victories on Tuesday. "That's what happened in 2004… Some of them started listening to the prognosticators and started picking out their offices in the West Wing. Then the people… voted… And movers weren't needed."

In Florida, where the president joined his younger brother, retiring Gov. Jeb Bush, for their final campaign appeal as president and governor, their own party's candidate for governor skipped a rally with thousands of people in Pensacola staged for the party's candidates in the Sunshine State. It was overcast outside the civic center where the president spoke, and the candidate's absence hung like a pall over the rally inside.

DOJ_NMG_0091520

Republican Charlie Crist, running for governor in Florida, insisted that last-minute scheduling and a desire to concentrate his efforts in seven other cities across the state, was behind this sudden cancellation.

Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, said somewhat ruefully: "All I know is that yesterday morning they apparently made a decision that, rather than being with the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last-minute decision to go to Palm Beach."

Some insisted that yet another Republican had decided to seek some distance from the president in a year when many of the GOP's members of Congress and candidates have campaigned with reminders of how they disagree with Bush, with his job-approval hovering below 40 percent.

Karen Thurman, Florida Democratic Party chairman, said: "Charlie Crist and President Bush say, 'stay the course,' but clearly Charlie Crist has 'cut and run' from the president today."

Susan MacManus, professor of political science at the University of South Florida, suggested that Crist {ndash} favored to win the governor's race {ndash} has drawn support from independent voters and even some Democrats, and these swing voters also tend to be late-deciding. The view of Crist standing alongside Bush might not serve well as their final image, she agreed.

Crist did make time Monday for an appearance with Arizona Sen. John McCain, eyeing the Republican nomination for president in 2008, and was introduced as part of the party's "next generation" of leaders.

Yet Rove insisted that he had found cause for optimism in the final days of the midterm congressional elections. The results of many polls have revealed trends favoring Republican candidates, insisted Rove, architect of Bush's campaigns for president and chieftain of the midterm campaigns.

"Last week, for example, on one day we had some 20-odd polls," Rove said on the runway at an airport near Waco, Tex., as he prepared to head out with Bush for election-eve campaigning.

"Wherever the candidate was, their comparable position versus the previous day's tracking or the previous week's poll, like in a group of say 20-some-odd, you'd have 16 of them approve, three of them stay flat," Rove said. When "you see that in races from the West Coast to the Northeast, Senate, House and governor, then it presages something."

For months, Bush, First Lady Laura Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and party leaders have fanned out on their own, campaigning in more than 200 cities for the GOP's candidates. On Monday, the president and first lady walked hand-in-hand onto stages for the closing day's rallies.

The president, promising lower taxes and stronger national security if Republicans win on Tuesday, unleashed the same criticism of Democrats as tax-happy and weak at war that he has voiced for months.

"The Democrats' philosophy is this… if it breathes, tax it," Bush said, shirt-sleeves rolled to his elbows. 'Remember, if you want your taxes low… vote Republican…And, as you go to the polls, remember we're at war."

In Florida, the state that handed Bush the presidency after a 36-day court battle over the disputed 2000 election there, the president spoke of the local congressman asking him not to forget the people of the panhandle.

"I said, 'Congressman, how could I forget 'em?'" Bush said. "I wouldn't be president without 'em."

And in Florida, where the Bush brothers have campaigned side-by-side many times, this final campaign brought an emotional farewell.

"This'll be my last chance to introduce him as president of the United States while I'm governor," Jeb Bush told the crowd.

"Mr. President, brother George, thank you for the tax cuts in Washington that made it possible for our state to grow," he said. "Mr. President, brother George, thank you for supporting our military."

In Arkansas, the president campaigned for Asa Hutchison, the Republican candidate for governor who had served the Bush administration for four years, most recently as a senior Homeland Security official. The White House voiced a sense of obligation.

"We're closing strong," Bush said in Little Rock

And in Texas, Bush closed his campaign with a rally for Gov. Rick Perry, the Republican who succeeded Bush in the Lone Star State and could become Texas' longest-serving governor if he wins on Tuesday.

A Last Hurrah Of Sorts For Bush-Rove Partnership (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

DOJ_NMG_0091521

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, Fla., Nov. 6 — President Bush and his political partner, Karl Rove, ended it where they started it: in this sliver of Northwest Florida that arguably gave them their 2000 victory.

Like then, the two have utilized a symbiotic relationship in which, friends say, Mr. Rove, the president's chief political adviser, is both mastermind and supplicant, and Mr. Bush is both leader and follower.

While several members of the team that got Mr. Bush to the White House in 2000 are gone, Mr. Rove remains.

Mr. Rove helped to give Mr. Bush a winning strategy, first guiding him to the governor's seat in Texas, then to the White House. Mr. Bush brought Mr. Rove along on a remarkable journey to the pinnacle of the political world. They have won every election they have taken on together.

Mr. Bush, who is more involved in the nitty-gritty of politics than he lets on publicly, gave Mr. Rove the clearance to run the White House midterm elections plan according to his standard playbook, even as other Republicans began to question Mr. Rove's reputation for strategic brilliance and detach themselves from Mr. Bush and the Iraq war.

This year has not been easy on the two men, but in public at least, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove usually seem to be enjoying themselves. In the campaign's waning days, Mr. Rove emerged as the campaign jester of Air Force One, a role he has taken on in all of Mr. Bush's big campaigns.

On almost every leg of every trip, Mr. Rove appeared before the traveling group of journalists to alternately tease them or flatter them, all the while spinning scenarios pointing to yet another Republican victory in the face of forecasts to the contrary.

Thus, there last week was the man Mr. Bush calls "the architect" — and some liberal bloggers call an evil genius — walking into the Air Force One press cabin to distribute chocolate-covered caramels to the traveling reporters. His prediction for Election Day: "Victory, victory, victory."

Another day while dispensing candy to the press, he shouted, "Sweets for my sweets!"

Mr. Bush is reveling in being on the campaign trail too, rolling up his sleeves and going into arenas where audiences explode at lines that get polite applause from the more moneyed crowds he has addressed this year. An aide to Mr. Bush recalled how, just before taking the stage at a booming gymnasium in Le Mars, Iowa, the president turned to him and several others and said, "All right, boys, I have some new chestnuts for 'em tonight," adding, "They ain't seen nothing yet."

Despite several requests, the White House would not arrange an interview with Mr. Rove to discuss what is, in effect, his last big campaign for Mr. Bush. Indicating that he still plans on being relevant, along with Mr. Bush, two years from now, a White House aide said that Mr. Rove "disputes the premise."

Post-Tuesday Thinking

Indeed, what happens after Tuesday is something of a sore subject with several of Mr. Bush's advisers.

They refuse to discuss the possibility of life with a Democratic speaker of the House, presumably Representative Nancy Pelosi of California. And whenever the subject of the president's last two years come up, the aides make sure everybody knows that Mr. Bush intends to go out with a bang, not a whimper.

Asked Monday about plans for a possible Democratic-controlled Congress, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, repeated his standard refusal to discuss the topic, then added, "Here's the thing that you do need to know, which is that the president plans for a very active final two years of his presidency."

He added, "So the president is going to be very aggressive, and he's not going to play small ball."

Everywhere, though, there are reminders that Washington will soon begin to focus on 2008 — like, say, Wednesday. Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor in Florida, skipped out on an appearance in Pensacola with Mr. Bush, choosing instead to appear in Jacksonville with Senator John McCain of Arizona, a favored contender for the Republican presidential nomination should he run.

A person close to Senator McCain said that his advisers had checked with the White House last week to make sure there was no conflict and noted the events were two hours apart. The senator is expected to start his 2008 political strategy sessions on Wednesday.

And last Saturday, Mr. Bush beckoned a reporter, Nedra Pickler of The Associated Press, to his cabin at the front of Air Force One, to say goodbye. She is leaving her job as a White House correspondent to begin covering the 2008 campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0091522

Not-So-Sunshine State

Florida has been good to Mr. Bush over the years. Yet, there are signs of wear here, like elsewhere, and Mr. Crist is not the only Republican in the state with whom the White House has had its differences.

Representative Katherine Harris, the state's former Secretary of State and onetime Bush loyalist who was credited with helping to secure Mr. Bush's victory in 2000, is running for the seat held by Senator Bill Nelson, a Democrat.

But Ms. Harris and the Bushes — that includes the president's brother, Florida's outgoing governor, Jeb Bush, are no longer allies; she defied their wishes that she not run for the Senate seat, and, despite a lot of trying, they were unable to persuade anybody else to run.

When Mr. Crist backed out of the Pensacola rally, Ms. Harris was the most prominent Republican candidate on the state ballot this year in attendance. Yet she was not up on the stage with Mr. Bush, his wife Laura, Governor Bush and Senator Mel Martinez.

Asked before landing in Pensacola whether Mr. Bush was "excited" to campaign with Ms. Harris, Mr. Snow said flatly: "He wants Republican candidates to win."

If enough of them do not, it is going to be a very different world for him come Wednesday.

Tuesday May Bring Bush Worry Either Way (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 7, 2006

Running out of time and influence, President Bush faces a rough road in the twilight of his presidency regardless of who controls Congress.

The once-unshakable loyalty of congressional Republicans is weakening. After marching in lockstep with the White House for six years, GOP lawmakers are looking at the political calendar and thinking about their own futures rather than Bush's legacy in his last two years in office.

Republicans are in a sour mood, scarred by corruption scandals, held in low esteem by voters and divided over issues from deficit spending to immigration reform. Many GOP candidates shunned Bush in their campaigns, fearing he would hurt rather than help them.

With the end of the midterm elections and the opening of the 2008 presidential race, Republicans as well as Democrats will be telling the country how they would do things differently from Bush.

Already a huge headache, the Iraq war hangs over Bush as the dominant issue for the remainder of his presidency. Even before this year's elections, Republican senators — from Virginia's John Warner to Texas' Kay Bailey Hutchison — were questioning Bush's approach to Iraq, which this month will eclipse World War II in the length of U.S. involvement.

If Democrats should take the House or Senate, Bush's problems would only get worse.

Shut out of power for a dozen years and bitter at Bush for ignoring them, Democrats would demand a role in setting the nation's agenda and throw up roadblocks to the president's plans. Pressuring Bush on Iraq, Democrats would have subpoena powers to investigate the president's conduct of the war and to demand accountability.

The White House also could get snarled in Democratic-run investigations of issues ranging from Vice President Dick Cheney's secret energy policy deliberations to White House links with Republican corruption scandals.

"It won't be a happy place to work in the next couple of years," said John Podesta, who has firsthand knowledge about running a White House in troubled times. He was Bill Clinton's chief of staff during the tumultuous days of the Monica Lewinsky scandal and Clinton's impeachment.

"Whereas you had a kind of lapdog Congress in the past, you're going to have a significant challenge," Podesta said of Bush. "Even if the Republicans retain control, you'll see even more questioning on the Senate side."

With Democrats in charge, there would be little chance that Bush's prized tax cuts would be renewed. His drive to expand his executive authority and national security powers would be blocked.

Even with Republicans in control, Bush's agenda has been stalled, his blueprints for overhauling Social Security and immigration collecting dust.

DOJ_NMG_0091523

Time and history are not on his side.

"It seems like most presidents get less done in the last two years than they did in the earlier part of their term," said Charles Black, a GOP strategist with close ties to the White House. "Some of it is you don't have as much influence. People are paying attention to who might come next instead of who is there now."

Before they leave, presidents sometimes try to shape their legacy with foreign policy victories. Clinton desperately sought a Middle East peace agreement in the closing days of his presidency but failed. The Middle East offers scant hope for Bush, too. Trouble spots like North Korea and Iran look bleak.

Bush insists he has a lot to do and isn't slowing down. After the election, he plans to send Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to Capitol Hill to see what's possible in terms of overhauling the financially troubled Social Security and Medicare programs.

"The general approach is to be activist and tackle big stuff," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "You've got a very energized and motivated White House. We're going to see how Congress is in dealing with this. Maybe it's just wishful thinking but we may be approaching the point of mudslinging burnout."

Even if Democrats win, Bush still would have clout. As commander in chief, he is responsible for American forces. There isn't much talk about Congress cutting off funds for war.

Probably the most potent weapon in Bush's arsenal would be his veto pen and, almost certainly, a veto-sustaining minority if Democrats took the House.

He also would have the power of executive orders allowing him to make big moves without Congress' approval. Clinton used that authority, for example, to protect vast tracts of public land from road-building, logging and mining.

Democrats and Republicans alike suggest there are areas of possible agreement on issues such as alternative fuel sources and the No Child Left Behind education law that has to be renewed next year.

A key question is whether Democrats, Republicans and the White House decide it's in their political interest to get some things done.

"An awful lot can happen in two years," said Leon Panetta, a onetime Democratic congressman who became Clinton's chief of staff. "In many ways it can determine his legacy as president of the United States. If there's nothing but gridlock these last two years, mark my words: He's not going to have a very high place in history in terms of his presidency."

___

EDITOR'S NOTE — Terence Hunt has covered the White House for The Associated Press since the Reagan presidency.

Candidates Make Dash For Finish Line (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 — Exhausted candidates across the country delivered their final appeals on Monday, closing a campaign that will determine the balance of power in Washington for the next two years and render a judgment about President Bush and the war in Iraq.

Candidates, party committees and interest groups flooded voters with a flurry of late advertising and heavy spending on turn-out-the-vote operations on the last day of the most expensive, and one of the nastiest, midterm elections in American history.

Most independent analysts predicted a strong Democratic wave on Tuesday, but Republicans found a glimmer of hope in a handful of weekend polls that showed the percentage of voters saying they planned to vote for Democrats dipping slightly. And Democratic officials acknowledged that Senate seats they thought they had wrapped up — in Maryland, Montana, New Jersey and Rhode Island — were no longer sure things.

After months of attacks on the stump and on the airwaves about sex and race, scandal and war, candidates and parties turned most of their attention to closing the sale and driving their voters to the polls on Tuesday.

In Georgia, Representative Jim Marshall, one of fewer than a half dozen threatened Democratic incumbents, spent the day making phone calls to answer questions from undecided voters.

DOJ_NMG_0091524

The candidates in a tight race for a seat along Florida's east coast, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., the Republican, and Ron Klein, his Democratic challenger, spent the day trolling for votes in complexes for the elderly, talking about prescription drug benefits under the new Medicare program.

In the contest for an open House seat in Colorado's Seventh District, around Denver, Republicans contacted more than 50,000 households over the weekend by telephone and door-to-door canvassing.

Some 4,500 members of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as Acorn, donned bright red T-shirts were out campaigning in favor of ballot proposals to raise the minimum wage in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri and Ohio.

In Arizona, the actor Michael J. Fox appeared with two Democratic candidates to advocate lifting restrictions on stem cell research, an issue that has come to play a prominent role in several races around the country.

In Texas, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the Republican write-in candidate for the seat vacated by Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, closed a hectic day Monday night with a party in the affluent Clear Lake area of Houston. She scoffed at predictions made by some news outlets about her candidacy.

"They may have jumped the gun when they said two months ago that there was no way that Congressional District 22 would stay Republican," Ms. Sekula-Gibbs told the crowd, "but guess what, it's going to stay Republican."

Mr. Bush spent the day on the fringes of contests for the House and Senate, seeking to rally Republican voters in Arkansas, Florida and Texas. But Karl Rove, his senior adviser, expressed open irritation at the last-minute decision by Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor in Florida, not to appear with the president at a large and spirited rally in Pensacola, a development that underscored the reluctance of his own party's candidates to be too closely linked to Mr. Bush.

Mr. Bush, with his shirtsleeves rolled up and his wife, Laura, and brother Jeb, Florida's governor, at his side, told the crowd that Republicans were more devoted to the nation's security than were Democrats. He received some of his most sustained applause — mixed with chants of "U.S.A., U.S.A!" — when he reminded the crowd, "Saddam Hussein was convicted and sentenced to death."

Ending his day of campaigning in Dallas, he told thousands at the Reunion Arena, "We're closing strong because we're right on the issues," and exhorted volunteers to work the telephones and get voters to the polls.

In addition to contests for Congress, 36 governor's chairs and thousands of state legislative seats are to be decided. Polls indicate that Democrats could pick up as many as 10 governor's offices now held by Republicans without losing a single one now in Democratic hands.

Voters in 37 states will consider dozens of ballot initiatives on embryonic stem cell research, the minimum wage, same-sex marriage, abortion, the environment and other issues.

Democratic Party officials have sought from the beginning of the campaign to frame the election as primarily about Mr. Bush, and particularly about his conduct of the war in Iraq.

"We've always wanted this to be a national referendum," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, "and it's helping us from one end of the country to the other."

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said that most races would be decided on local issues and that party volunteers were knocking on an average of three million doors a day nationwide, part of the Republicans' so-called 72-hour strategy for turning out their voters.

Mr. Mehlman, however, introduced a cautionary note in contrast with confident predictions by Mr. Bush, Mr. Rove and Vice President Dick Cheney that Republicans would retain majorities in the House and Senate.

Asked about his party's prospects in the House, Mr. Mehlman said that although he saw signs of new hope that Republicans could retain control, "I believe it's going to be very close; I think it remains an uphill climb."

He sounded more confident about the Senate.

Independent analysts predict Democratic gains of 20 and 40 seats in the House, giving the party control for the first time since 1994. An analysis accompanying a Gallup Poll released over the weekend said that based on calculations from Congressional elections from 1946 to 2002, the Democrats were poised to gain 11 to 58 seats, with a gain of 35 the most likely outcome.

DOJ_NMG_0091525

More than 100 optimistic but anxious House Democrats took part in a party conference call Monday afternoon, getting an update on races and some guidance from Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, on how to proceed should Democrats prevail. According to participants, Ms. Pelosi told her colleagues that the first 48 hours after the election would be important in defining the party's image if they gained a majority and that Democrats should be united, show respect for diverse views and a willingness to work with Republicans and President Bush

A half-dozen Senate seats remained competitive, with both parties warily watching races in Rhode Island, Maryland, Missouri, Montana and Virginia.

All the last-minute spending and the spin, the door-knocking and the robocalling will have no effect on the estimated 25 percent of the electorate that has already cast votes, either by absentee ballot or at early voting stations.

California's secretary of state, Bruce McPherson, said that local elections officials issued 5.1 million absentee ballots and that he expected that 44 percent of all votes cast in the state would be cast by mail. Ohio elections officials won a court ruling that they could immediately begin counting tens of thousands of absentee ballots that were piling up in county clerks' offices.

Over all, about 42 percent of eligible voters are expected to cast ballots, which would be the highest percentage in any midterm election since 1982, said Curtis Gans, director of the Center for the Study of the American Electorate at American University and an expert on voter behavior. Mr. Gans said he based his estimate on the intensity of voter interest and the number of absentee ballots issued.

"Even the ugly campaign has not dampened their desire to come out," he said.

The barrage of negative advertising continued, but some candidates adopted an almost elegiac tone to their final arguments.

Representative James T. Walsh, a nine-term Republican from Syracuse who is facing a tough challenge, began running a television advertisement last weekend in which he wore a casual sweater and spoke directly to the camera.

"I think you know me," Mr. Walsh says in the commercial. "I think you trust me. I want you to know I share your frustration with the war. These are difficult times for America. We've got to stop the finger-pointing and the partisanship and address all our nation's challenges, both at home and abroad, together."

Bob Casey, the Pennsylvania Democrat who appears likely to unseat Senator Rick Santorum, a Republican, sits on the stoop of his home in Scranton, Pa., in his final advertisement and talks about binding up the wounds of the bitter campaign.

"After all the noise of this campaign year," Mr. Casey says in the spot, "I wanted to talk with you about what lies ahead. The only way we're going to work through problems like losing jobs to other countries, protecting Americans from terrorism or the war in Iraq is for Democrats and Republicans to start working together again."

Voting In A Neck-and-neck Nation (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The 2006 campaign, one of the nastiest battles and the most expensive ever for control of Congress, came to an end Monday amid indications that months of debate over Iraq, political corruption and the Republican dominance of Washington could produce the highest voter turnout in decades for a midterm election. Even as polls differed on whether voters were ready to hand Democrats a majority in the House or Senate, or both, a series of late surveys consistently showed extremely high levels of interest in the election.

In a national USA Today/Gallup Poll released Monday, 68% of adults said they were "absolutely certain" they would vote. That was the highest level of interest Gallup has recorded for a nonpresidential election in the half a century it has measured American opinion.

Likewise, a survey by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press showed a significantly higher level of interest than in the last two midterm elections — higher even than in 1994, when Republicans swept Democrats from power in Congress.

Iraq, the issue that has generated the sharpest conflicts between President Bush and the Democrats, continued to set off sparks on the campaign's final day.

DOJ_NMG_0091526

Leading Democrats urged Americans to demand a new direction on Iraq policy by ousting the GOP majorities in the House and Senate.

"The choice couldn't be more stark," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, told reporters. "Every vote cast for a Democrat is [a vote] for a new, smarter Iraq policy. Every vote cast for a Republican is a vote cast for staying the course."

Bush, accepting that gauntlet, portrayed success in Iraq as essential to protecting America's national security and insisted that Democrats had no plan to prevail there.

"Harsh criticism is not a plan for victory," Bush told an enthusiastic crowd of 5,000 in the Republican stronghold of Pensacola, Fla. "Second-guessing is not a strategy. We have a plan for victory, and part of that plan is to make sure that Republicans control the House and the Senate."

With all 435 seats in the House of Representatives and 33 Senate seats at stake, as well as 36 governorships, today's election could mark the sharpest turn in American politics since the Republican landslide in 1994.

*

GOP dominance at risk

Since that victory, fueled by a backlash against President Clinton's first two years in office, Republicans have controlled the House for 12 consecutive years and the Senate for all but about 18 months in Bush's first term.

Now polls show that voter discontent over Bush's direction, especially in Iraq, has carried the Democrats within range of capturing at least one chamber of Congress. Republicans took heart from several late surveys showing the GOP mobilizing more of its core supporters and shrinking its deficit among swing voters, much as the party did in the final weekend before its surprising gains in the 2002 election.

"Our party is heading into election day with strong momentum," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said in an e-mail to supporters Monday morning.

Still other polls painted a less-promising picture for the GOP. And most analysts on both sides agreed it would be extremely difficult for Republicans to prevent Democrats from securing the 15-seat gain they need to capture a majority in the House.

In the Senate, Democrats face a tougher climb. They need a gain of six seats to reach a majority, and that will require them to capture at least four of the five most closely contested Republican-held seats — in Rhode Island, Montana, Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri — without losing any seats they already hold.

Public opinion polls generally showed close races in all of those contests except Tennessee, where most surveys provided Republican Bob Corker a wider advantage over Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. Late polls showed Democratic challengers maintaining large leads over Republican Sens. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio.

A Democratic majority in either chamber could set the stage for two years of intense political conflict. Democrats would be likely to use the subpoena power that comes with majority control to aggressively examine Bush policies in Iraq and at home that they argue Republican lawmakers have failed to monitor.

Big Democratic gains would also disrupt the ambitions of Bush and Karl Rove, his chief political advisor, to build a lasting Republican electoral majority centered on an alliance of economic and social conservatives.

One of the hallmarks of Bush's presidency has been the passionate emotions he inspires in supporters and opponents, and that pattern shows every sign of generating a large turnout today.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate at American University in Washington, has predicted that voter turnout is likely to exceed the highest level of the last quarter of a century, which was reached in the 1982 election, when Democrats made sweeping gains in the House.

*

Getting out the vote

On Monday, both parties worked frantically to convert that interest into votes.

In Missouri, site of the neck-and-neck race between GOP Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill, Republicans said they had launched a larger get-out-the-vote drive than they did in the 2004 presidential election, when Bush won the state comfortably.

DOJ_NMG_0091527

"It's a juggernaut right now," said Paul Sloca, the spokesman for the Missouri GOP.

In Montana, where GOP Sen. Conrad Burns is battling Democrat Jon Tester in a tight race, the party has contacted about 300,000 voters by phone and home visits in little more than a week. That is roughly one-third of the state's population.

Nationwide, the Republican National Committee estimates its get-out-the-vote operation had contacted more than 29 million voters as of Monday.

Democrats and their allies mounted their own efforts. The Democratic National Committee touted a big increase in party voters participating in early balloting in Tennessee and widespread voter contact efforts in Arizona — site of three competitive House races — and in Iowa, where Democrats hope to hold the governorship and seize a vacant Republican House seat.

The AFL-CIO said that on Monday, 50,000 union volunteers were expected to make 2.5 million phone calls, knock on 1 million doors and speak with 1.8 million union members at work sites.

*

Democrats cry foul

As each side sought to mobilize its voters, Democrats complained that the GOP had made a barrage of computer-generated telephone calls that, in their view, constituted a last-minute dirty trick.

Democrats said that because the automated calls often started with an offer to share information about a Democratic candidate, some voters thought the candidate had placed the calls. Democrats said the effort was intended to generate anger toward their candidates by pestering voters with multiple calls in unwelcome bursts or late at night.

Attorneys for the House Democratic campaign committee also asserted that the calls violated FCC rules that require the sponsor of automated calls to be identified at the beginning of the message. A spokesman for the House Republican campaign committee acknowledged that it identified itself as the sponsor only at the end of its calls.

But Carl Forti of the National Republican Congressional Campaign Committee said the party's calls were within the law, and he denied that the committee phoned voters more than once a day or in the middle of the night. "These calls are meant to inform people, not annoy people," Forti said. "We've been doing phone calls like this for years. We clearly state we're making the calls at the end."

Adding to the tension in both parties was the release of seven national surveys since Saturday that sharply diverged in their portraits of the electorate.

In four of those — released by Fox News, Newsweek, Time and CNN — Bush's approval rating ranged between 35% and 38%, and Democrats led by at least 13 percentage points when voters were asked which party they intended to support today.

But in polls released by USA Today/Gallup, ABC/Washington Post and the Pew center, Bush's approval rating ranged from 38% to 43%, and the Democratic lead in the ballot stood at 4 to 7 percentage points.

That latter group of surveys inspired some anxiety in Democratic circles and cautious optimism among Republicans that they could avoid severe losses. The Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group in Washington, estimated late last month that individual candidates, the two parties and their allied groups would spend $2.6 billion in the election. That would make this the most expensive midterm election ever, with spending nearly 20% higher than in 2002.

*

ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

Times staff writers Janet Hook, Richard Simon, Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar and James Gerstenzang contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Viewers guide to election night

Even as Californians are still voting, the election's trends should be clear from other states. Here's how political pros will be watching the returns:

The battle for the House

Polls in Indiana close early, and all eyes will be on the fate of three endangered House Republicans there. If Democrats sweep these races, it could be the start of a big night for the party. If Republicans hold their losses to one seat, or keep all three, they'll be feeling better about the national picture.

DOJ_NMG_0091528

Attention will quickly shift to a cluster of Northeastern states — Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania. Several GOP incumbents, including such party stalwarts as Christopher Shays and Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut and Thomas M. Reynolds in New York, are at risk. To win the House, Democrats must defeat most of these Republicans.

In New Hampshire, six-term GOP Rep. Charles Bass faces a tough reelection fight. If he loses, it could be a sign of a national Democratic "wave."

Georgia presents the GOP with one of its few chances to gain a House seat. A Republican win over Democratic Rep. John Barrow would hearten GOP leaders.

As results come in from the Midwest, attention will focus on Ohio. Scandal has plagued the state GOP, creating multiple opportunities in House districts for Democrats. Their scenario for capturing the House depends in part on winning most of these seats, including the one given up by disgraced GOP Rep. Bob Ney.

If House control remains in doubt as polls close in the West, a handful of races in Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona will be in the spotlight. The contest for the Albuquerque-area seat held by Republican Heather A. Wilson is a likely bellwether of the national drift.

The battle for the Senate

Maryland and Virginia contests loom large. A loss by GOP Sen. George Allen in Virginia would be a huge step toward a Democratic-controlled Senate. Conversely, if Allen survives and Republican Michael Steele wins in heavily Democratic Maryland, Republican chances of maintaining its Senate majority would dramatically improve.

Democrats hope to have won four of the six seats they need for a Senate majority as votes are counted in the country's midsection. If that's the case, Missouri becomes the key battleground. The race between GOP incumbent Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill has been close from day one, and the result may not be known for hours.

Depending on the Missouri results, Senate control may hinge on Montana. For months, Democrats were confident they would beat GOP incumbent Conrad Burns, but the race has tightened and it could be one of the night's nail-biters.

Future Rests On GOP Incumbents' Outcomes (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 7, 2006

The fate of a clutch of endangered Republican incumbents, including some from states that heavily supported President Bush two years ago, will determine who controls the Senate for the rest of the Bush presidency. Both parties are spending millions of dollars in last-ditch efforts to influence those contests.

By contrast, few Democratic incumbents are in danger this year. Nearly every Democratic senator seeking re-election seems assured of another term, polls suggest.

Not so with Republicans.

Facing difficult re-election battles are Republican Sens. Conrad Burns of Montana, George Allen of Virginia, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

Furthermore, Republicans face a strong challenge in Tennessee for the now-GOP seat held by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Democrats also were hopeful for an upset victory over Arizona Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, where polls have shown a tightening contest in recent days between the incumbent and former state Democratic Party chairman Jim Pederson, a shopping mall developer.

Democrats need a gain of six seats to win back the Senate, which they last controlled in 2002. Republicans now control 55 seats in the 100-member chamber.

Republicans are facing headwinds that include an increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, a president with low approval ratings, voter disgust over a slew of congressional scandals and the historic pattern of midterm losses in the sixth year for the party holding the White House

"The political environment has been very tough for Republicans for many, many months," acknowledged Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who heads the Senate Republican campaign effort. "No question about it."

DOJ_NMG_0091529

Republicans picked up Senate seats in both the 2002 and 2004 elections. But strategists in both parties expect Democratic gains on Tuesday. Even if Democrats don't reclaim the Senate, they are clearly within striking distance of doing so.

And any pickup will increase their leverage in a chamber where strict rules dictate that 60 votes, rather than a simple 51-vote majority, are needed to advance any controversial piece of legislation or nomination.

With time running out, voter turnout has become the focus of both parties.

"The Bush team has been magnificent at turning out the vote in the last three elections. And this is their final challenge," said GOP strategist Scott Reed.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, on Monday said Democrats are "on the edge" of regaining the Senate, but declined to predict a Democratic takeover.

"Of the eight states where we have a chance to pick up seats, six are red (Republican)," Schumer told a news conference. "So it's a tough map." He said the biggest battlegrounds remain the border states of Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — seats whose present occupants are Republicans.

In the final days, "this is an election that is about the intensity of our base versus the intensity of their base," said GOP pollster and strategist Ed Goeas.

For Democrats, the Iraq war is providing most of the momentum. "It's generated their money, it's generated their activism." But on the Republican side, the threat of terrorism, taxes and fear of Democratic leadership of Congress are the big motivators, Goeas said.

Despite Democratic optimism over the possibility of a sweep on Tuesday, some party elders were cautious.

"There's a huge anti-Republican wave out there, but that wave's going to crash against a fairly stable, very stable, Republican political structure," said Democratic pollster and consultant Mark Mellman. "And so, it's a lot easier for Democrats to get votes than for Democrats to get seats."

"I have no doubt we're going to get a lot of votes, but getting seats is a harder nut to crack," Mellman said.

Nearly all the endangered Republicans would have to lose for Democrats to prevail. And Republicans were hopeful that Sen. Allen in Virginia and Republican Bob Corker in Tennessee would be able to win, citing a narrowing of the polls.

Democrats are fairly confident of picking up GOP seats in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

But their hopes of also picking up now-Republican seats in Missouri, Rhode Island and Montana were going down to the wire after a concerted GOP counteroffensive in those states.

Also, Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez in New Jersey found himself as probably the only Democratic incumbent on Tuesday's ballot locked in a tight fight. He faced a strong challenge from Republican Tom Kean Jr., namesake of a popular former governor.

As Campaign Clock Winds Down, Parties Press On (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Candidates made final appeals and party tacticians worked to boost voter turnout Monday as Americans prepared for potentially critical midterm elections.

Today's results will decide the fate of all 435 House seats, 33 Senate seats and governorships in 36 states and set the tone and agenda for the final two years of President Bush's second term.

The key question: whether Democrats can take advantage of national dissatisfaction with Bush and the war in Iraq to win the 15 seats they need to control the House of Representatives and six seats they need to take the Senate.

Republican leaders cited narrowing polls in Senate races in Montana, Rhode Island and Maryland as signs of an 11th-hour surge.

Bush finished the campaign before an estimated 10,000 people in Dallas, accusing Democrats of having no plan for the Iraq war. “We have a plan — stick with us, and the country will be better off," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0091530

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said he's confident. “I think there's a lot of energy on the Democratic side,” said Emanuel, an Illinois congressman. “As a kid from Chicago, I'm proud of the get-out-the-vote machine that we have put together.”

The final pre-election USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found Democrats favored over Republicans for Congress by 51%-44%. Polls in Missouri, Montana, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia found Democrats struggling to win the final Senate seat they need for control.

As candidates made a final sprint, both parties kicked in operations to get their core voters to the polls. Turnout should increase from 39.7% in 2002 and may exceed the most recent midterm high of 42.1% in 1982, according to Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate.

Gans does not expect this year's turnout to top the all-time benchmark of 47% in 1970.

Bad weather that might affect turnout was forecast for the Northwest and Southeast, with sogginess in Washington and western Oregon. Moderate to heavy rainfall is expected in Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina, and showers are predicted across Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania.

Both parties continued to pour money into close House and Senate races. This year's spending is expected to be $2.8 billion, according to the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks campaign money. That's a 27% increase from 2002.

On the campaign's final day, the two parties had their best-known campaigners continuing to barn-storm the country.

Bush used the last day of a 10-state tour to stump for GOP gubernatorial candidates in Florida, Arkansas and Texas. Bush has been focusing on places where he is popular. In Florida, GOP gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist did not attend Bush's rally for Republican candidates in Pensacola.

Crist said he considered the Pensacola area so firmly in his camp that it made more sense to campaign elsewhere in his race to replace Gov. Jeb Bush, who is leaving office due to term limits. White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove questioned the decision.

“Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice,” Rove said.

The White House said 7,600 people came to Bush's rally.

Bush planned today to vote near his ranch near Crawford, Texas, and return to Washington afterward.

In Rochester, N.Y., former president Bill Clinton campaigned for Democratic House candidates.

“We've got to get all ours out, and then you've got to hunt for people still standing on the diving board,” Clinton said. “And when you find one, tell them what the choice is. … Grab them by the hand and tell them it's time to jump off to a better future.”

US Senate Goes Down To The Wire (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON

In the Senate, it's too close to call.

On the eve of the 2006 midterm elections, a last-minute tightening in the polls of Senate contests from Montana to Rhode Island to Maryland has thrown some doubt into the calculations of pundits who had come to see a Democratic takeover as possible.

Many analysts - including conservatives - can see a clear path to a Democratic net gain of five seats in the 100-seat chamber, which would bring the partisan balance sheet to a 50-50 tie. That would effectively keep control in the hands of the Republicans, with Vice President Cheney casting tie-breaking votes in his role as president of the Senate.

But it was that elusive sixth seat that had kept many analysts from firmly predicting a change in control. Now, the last-minute volatility both in the nationwide polls gauging voter preferences and in individual races leaves the outcome even more in doubt.

"There tends to be a tightening at the end, when people begin to perhaps reappraise the preferences that they had early on," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Jersey. "New evidence comes in. People are reluctant to abandon old party allegiances."

DOJ_NMG_0091531

Politicians themselves can become brand names in their home states, and thus, voters in Rhode Island and Montana who once appeared set to throw out their two Republican senators Lincoln Chafee and Conrad Burns may be having second thoughts, judging by the tightening of polls there. Senator Chafee, a first-termer whose father was long-serving Sen. John Chafee, can count on some reserve affection for the Chafee name and for Lincoln's status as the Senate's most liberal Republican; Senator Burns, who was caught up in the Jack Abramoff scandal, also may be coming out the other end of that crucible.

"My sense is that Burns may have gone through his roughest patch a couple of months ago," says Dr. Baker. "Sometimes voters are willing to hold onto an incumbent despite the warts."

And sometimes they're not. With the national mood toxic toward the Republican-controlled Capitol, and analysts foreseeing a "wave" election likely to sweep the Democrats into power in the House, it may too much for the most vulnerable Republican incumbents to withstand.

Still, not only do Democrats have to win the Montana and Rhode Island seats to build a Senate majority, they must also succeed in traditionally Republican areas. Two GOP incumbents are also widely seen as heading for defeat - Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, and Mike DeWine of Ohio. If Burns and Chafee go down and no Democratic-held seats change control - a big "if" - the Democrats must win two out of the three "fire wall" seats, in Tennessee, Virginia, and Missouri.

Of those three, Tennessee seems the most difficult for Democrats to take. Rep. Harold Ford (D) has turned what should have been a Republican romp for former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R) into a tight contest. The incumbent, Senate Republican leader Bill Frist, is retiring, and open seats are usually harder to defend, but Mr. Ford's charismatic campaign style has made the race competitive. If he wins, he would be the first African-American senator from the South since Reconstruction.

Virginia and Missouri remain firmly in the tossup column going into Tuesday's vote. The Missouri race pits state auditor Claire McCaskill (D) against incumbent Sen. Jim Talent (R) - with a ballot initiative on stem-cell research possibly holding the key to the outcome. Senator Talent opposes a proposed state constitutional amendment allowing embryonic stem-cell research while Ms. McCaskill supports it. The issue could drive turnout, but it remains unclear who benefits more.

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen's troubled reelection campaign is the big surprise of the '06 midterms. Once thought to be a top contender for the 2008 presidential race, he could be facing the end of his political career. A series of stumbles that began in August, when Senator Allen called a volunteer for the opposing campaign "macaca," has made conservative Democrat Jim Webb competitive.

To Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, head of his party's Senate campaign committee, the fact that his party even has a shot at taking a majority is astounding. At the start of the cycle, he and Senate minority leader Harry Reid (D) of Nevada agreed that "if we can hold our own, we will be happy, and if we can pick up seats we'll be really happy," he told reporters last week.

Now, it's all over but the shouting. At a Monday morning rally at the Vienna, Va., subway stop, Allen was often drowned out by antiwar protesters shouting: "Get out of Iraq!," "The troops hate you," "Let's Go Webb," and "Macaca," as Allen supporters tried to drown them out with cries of "Allen! Allen!"

"It's a close race," said Allen. "Iraqis have to stand up ... the one thing we cannot do is leave Iraq a safe haven for terrorists."

Commenting on what has become one of the most negative campaigns in the nation, Allen said: "We have tried throughout the whole campaign to talk about ideas, issues. Instead, we've run into this sort of thing." He gestured to the shouting protesters, one of whom stumbles into the senator, nearly knocking him over.

"I know Virginia, and if you want to serve Virginia, you better know Virginia, and that is what we are going to see [in the vote] tomorrow," he said, exiting to the day's next event.

GOP: Back From The Senate Brink (HILL)

The Hill, November 7, 2006

While the Republican Party leadership in the House seems doomed to move into a well deserved minority, the GOP shows increasing signs of being able to hang on to the Senate, although perhaps by the thinnest of margins.

DOJ_NMG_0091532

Running up a down escalator of sinking Republican fortunes, skillful GOP consultants and strategists have managed to hold the races in Missouri and Virginia to single-digit leads either way and to catch up to large Democratic leads in Montana and Rhode Island.

Most of these four seats are still likely to go Democrat, but they need to win all four to get control and that appears, at this moment, to be a daunting task.

Generally, it is an iron law of politics that when an incumbent is under 50 percent, he is through, but with Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) at 49 percent in the latest Gallup poll and Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) hovering between 48 and 49, the chances that they could pick up the remaining point or two remain pretty good.

Why the reversal in Republican fortunes? Luck has a lot to do with it. Sen. John Kerry's (D-Mass.) outburst might well have cost the Democrats the Senate; and the timing, perhaps not so coincidental, of the Saddam Hussein death verdict also bolsters Republican fortunes.

But the real reason is more likely that GOP base voters, alienated by their party's inept leadership of both Houses of Congress, their scandals, and their inability to pass tax reform, Social Security reform or overall immigration reform took one look at the Democrats and decided to come home. In effect, they fast-forwarded to Election Day and were appalled at the prospect of a Democratic win. Recoiling from its implications, they began to return to the party fold in the nick of time.

Of course, winning one house will suit the Democratic purposes quite nicely — especially if it is the House of Representatives that they win. House rules will let the Democrats pass one-house bills until their hearts are content, using their majority to pass a wish list of campaign promises without any accountability, knowing for sure that their offerings won't make it past the Senate or the White House.

Control of the lower house will also give them the committee chairmanships and the subpoena power that goes with it that will let them wage a two-year campaign for the presidency.

In this sense, Election Day 2006 is really a down payment for the Democratic White House race in 2008. Winning one house will go a long way toward winning the entire game two years hence.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

See How They Run: An Election-Night Guide With Many Key Races In East, Midwest, Prevailing Party May Be Evident Early On By CHRISTOPHER COOPER (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Is a rout on the way for Republicans? Opinions vary on both sides of the question, which also may hinge on the definition of "rout." When asked to assess the state of play on election eve, White House spokesman Tony Fratto simply notes, "We're still in the game."

That may be the most realistic way to sum up the party's prospects. Up and down the ticket, Republican candidates are locked in so many close races that their hold on Washington and state capitals seems likely to slip, perhaps precipitously.

For Republicans, the most alarming losses could come in the House, where Democrats need a 15-seat net pickup to gain control and Republicans are defending about 50 vulnerable districts.

FOLLOW THE VOTE

See an hour-by-hour election-night schedule of poll closings1 in some key House races. Adobe Acrobat required2. • Election Quiz:3 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com4, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video5 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20066.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

7 • Review the results of the latest polls8 in hot Senate races, and see what the data could mean for the breakdown of seats in the chamber after Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0091533

• The Senate's Uncertain States:9 Interactive profiles of the demographics and candidates in hard fought Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Virginia.

• Battlegrounds Poll:10 Who's ahead in the most hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data. See the Zogby poll results11.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

12 • Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers13

• Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts14

• Chief Concerns: Who heads key committees if Democrats win the House?15

Though Republican prospects seem slightly brighter in the Senate, where six seats currently determine political control, enough of these races are now toss-ups to put the Democrats within striking distance. Judging from the polls, the over-under betting on Democratic pickups of Senate seats hovers at around five.

For political spectators, the bad news is this: Razor-edge contests can spark legal challenges and recounts that can take days to sort out. The good news: Many of the most important races are in the Eastern and Central time zones. If an angry tide is poised to swamp Republicans, it could be apparent before most political junkies call it a night. Connecticut, Florida, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York together hold 24 of the most competitive House seats in the country.

In the key races in those six states, the great majority of candidates are Republican incumbents. In the House, watch Indiana's Second District, where incumbent Republican Chris Chocola faces Democrat Joe Donnelly. Polling has shown a seesaw race for weeks. The campaign here may be an archetype for any political upheaval this year: Mr. Chocola has been a loyal Republican in a conservative-leaning district, supporting oil drilling in the Alaska wilderness, school vouchers and tax cuts. He won his district in 2004 with 54% of the vote, bested only by President Bush, who took 56% of the district. If revolution is in the air, it may well start in northern Indiana.

On the other hand, two races in the Northeast bear watching for early signs that voters may be willing to give some Republicans a pass. In Rhode Island, Sen. Lincoln Chaffee has staked his campaign on his early opposition to Mr. Bush's war policies, the source of much voter anger. This race is unusually volatile: after trailing in polls by double digits to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, Mr. Chaffee has surged lately to a slight lead.

Scandal also colors several races this year. In New York's 26th District, Rep. Tom Reynolds, who heads the House Republican campaign committee, is locked in a race he would probably have won handily only just months ago but for a once-obscure Florida congressman named Mark Foley. Mr. Foley abruptly resigned in September after reports he had sent sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage former House pages. It later emerged Mr. Reynolds had picked up clues about Mr. Foley's behavior, even as he had urged him to run for re-election.

Mr. Reynolds has apologized for his role in the scandal, and recent polls put him in a near dead heat with Jack Davis, a Democrat he easily defeated in 2004.

For Democrats, taking the Senate is the brass ring and likely contingent on winning seats in Montana, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri and Virginia. But Democrat hopes will likely be dashed if they can't carry Maryland, being vacated by a Democrat, and New Jersey, where incumbent Robert Menendez is in a close race. Though Mr. Menendez has held a mid-single-digit lead in recent polling, a stumble here could bring Democrat dreams of Senate domination to a swift end.

One of the most intriguing Senate races is in Virginia, where incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen has been trading punches with Democratic upstart James Webb in a contest that few had expected would be close.

A series of Allen missteps have put his once-secure seat into play. National Democrats have poured in money and manpower to boost Mr. Webb, President Reagan's Navy Secretary, who broke with his party over Iraq.

Polls over the weekend suggest Mr. Webb now has a slight lead.

In the open Tennessee Senate seat being vacated by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Democratic candidate Harold Ford has faded of late. But while Democrats might be able to afford losing that pickup and still capture control, they almost certainly need to take the Senate seat in Missouri, where Republican Sen. Jim Talent is locked in a razor-thin race with Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill.

DOJ_NMG_0091534

How thin? The average of several recent polls gives Ms. McCaskill a 1.4 percentage-point edge, well within the statistical margin of error.

President Bush carried the state in 2004, but Mr. Talent doesn't have the reputation as a hard closer. In winning the seat in a special election in 2002, he was five points up in the polls on Election Day, only to squeeze out a one-point win.

One more race may bear watching before calling it a night. In Idaho, the reddest of red states, with a Republican congressional delegation, state legislature and governor, Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jerry Brady has a five-point lead in the polls.

If voters turn against Republicans in Idaho, it could be a rough two years for them until 2008.

Write to Christopher Cooper at christopher.cooper@wsj.com16

Down To The Wire: Expect A Big Night For Democrats (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

With only a few hours remaining until the votes start being counted, there is little uncertainty about the fight for the House, except for questions about exactly which Republican incumbents will be lucky enough to survive.

Polls over the past few weeks have seen many Republicans who once held clear, if not overwhelming, leads scrambling to try to stay ahead. GOP strategists say that voters increasingly have been focusing on Iraq, and that the added attention has worked to the disadvantage of Republican candidates.

Republican chances for retaining the House have moved from small to smaller, and public and private polling now suggests a solid Democratic win. The majority's losses this year will be lower than during the wave elections of 1958, 1974 and 1994, but only because of structural factors: The way districts have been drawn and the relatively small number of Republicans holding Democratic districts effectively minimize potential Democratic gains.

Having said that, this fight still is taking place almost entirely on Republican turf. With Republican House seats such as Idaho's 1st district, Kansas' 2nd, California's 11th and even Wyoming's at-large in play, it's clear which party is on the offensive.

National polls continue to show the Democrats with an advantage on the generic ballot, though there is no agreement on its size. Is it 4 points, as the Pew Research survey found; 6 points, as The Washington Post/ABC News poll has it; or 20 points, as CNN's poll says? Obviously, those numbers could produce dramatically different national outcomes.

Still, even the most optimistic Republican insiders I can find seem to think a loss of 18 or 19 seats is inevitable, while others counter that a loss of more than 30 is more likely. Most GOP insiders would be ecstatic if the party held its losses to two dozen or less.

Democratic gains of anywhere from 25 to as many as 40 seats are possible. Last week, I went on record saying I expected a Democratic gain of 34 to 40 seats as the most likely range. That now strikes me as a bit high, but only at the low end. So, I am adjusting my House estimate/projection slightly, to a Democratic gain of 30 to 36 seats.

Of course, even more GOP seats could fall if all of the endangered Republicans lose and we see more than a couple of surprises.

The House results are likely to wipe out many moderate Republicans, who are taking the brunt of the wave because they represent Democratic-leaning or competitive districts.

Over in the Senate, things remain far less clear. While I have been widely credited with predicting a six-seat Democrat gain (and therefore control of the Senate), what I've written is that Democrats will net five to seven seats. I'd now like to widen that range to four to seven seats.

According to some polls, races in Maryland, Montana and Rhode Island have tightened, making the net outcome less certain. But I'm still expecting Democrats to win Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana and Rhode Island, and, less confidently, Virginia.

Two seats, Tennessee and Missouri, have looked tight for months, and they could go either way.

Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.) has run a good race, but he isn't facing a longtime incumbent, and he may not win the undecided voters the way other Democratic challengers will. All things being equal, that probably is enough reason to push the race to Republican Bob Corker.

DOJ_NMG_0091535

But a big enough national Democratic wave across the country — or maybe more accurately, an anti-Bush, anti-Republican wave — could sweep Ford to victory. I'd consider it a mild surprise, though.

In Missouri, Sen. Jim Talent (R) is locked in a tight race against Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, and most polling shows little daylight between the two candidates. I've seen polls with McCaskill ahead, and I've seen polls with Talent leading.

The prudent thing to do, of course, is to leave the race as a tossup, since either candidate could win. But, of course, I didn't do that in my most recent newsletter. I pushed the race toward McCaskill, since in "wave" elections, virtually all of the close races go to the party benefiting from the wave, and this year that is the Democrats.

In reality, I won't be surprised no matter who wins in Missouri.

GOP prospects seem to have faded significantly in New Jersey, and the better chance for a Republican upset now seems to be Maryland.

The outcome in the Senate remains cloudy, no matter how much I would like to be able to predict party control. I expect Democrats to gain at least four seats, and I'm more than a bit skeptical about the Republican "surge."

House Poised To Flip; Senate Teeters (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

Democrats, who have succeeded in expanding the midterm battleground deep into Republican territory, are poised to make gains in both the House and Senate when voters across the country go to the polls today.

But while there is little question that Democrats are well-positioned to win at least the 15 seats needed to take the House majority, the magnitude of their victory rests largely on their ability to win a number of what were once second-, third- and even fourth-tier contests.

In the Senate, late shifts in a handful of competitive races has put the Democrats' final math somewhat in flux after a monthlong intense focus on Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia as the states expected to decide control of the chamber.

Virginia and Missouri remain pure tossup contests, but momentum in Tennessee has appeared to shift toward Republicans in the closing week. Meanwhile, renewed focus on embattled Sen. Conrad Burns' (R) potential ability to eke out a victory over state Senate President Jon Tester (D) in Montana has slightly shifted the Senate map. Polls also have shown Sen. Lincoln Chafee's (R-R.I.) race for re-election tightening, but Democrats still are viewed as having the advantage there.

Democrats also are making a late push to pick up a GOP-held seat in Arizona while Republicans hold out hope for swiping a Democratic seat in Maryland.

In the House, expert eyes have been trained on the expanding field of top-tier races and the number of GOP incumbents who once were considered safe and are now in re-election dog fights.

Just after Labor Day, around 20 GOP-held House seats looked to be pure tossups. Today, more than double that number are considered tossups or are tilting toward a Democratic takeover.

Perennial targets such as GOP Reps. Jim Gerlach (Pa.), Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Heather Wilson (N.M.) are still fighting for their political lives in down-to-the-wire contests.

But Republican Reps. Gil Gutknecht (Minn.), Melissa Hart (Pa.), Marilyn Musgrave (Colo.), Richard Pombo (Calif.) and Jim Ryun (Kan.), all of whom were heavily favored to win re-election two months ago, all could be headed for defeat today. Democrats' ability to upset those Republican incumbents and others such as Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.), Anne Northup (Ky.) or even Mark Souder (Ind.) will determine just how big their likely majority will be.

In one of the most prominent examples of a late-breaking race for Democrats, Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) is now in grave peril when just weeks ago his re-election chances seemed fairly solid. A late surge by attorney Paul Hodes (D) was fueled by a massive national party ad buy against Bass.

Likewise, in Connecticut, Rep. Nancy Johnson (R) began the cycle appearing to have the best re-election chances of the state's three Republican House Members. Now, Johnson looks most likely to lose, and GOP Reps. Christopher Shays and Rob Simmons could go down as well.

DOJ_NMG_0091536

The Nutmeg State is just one place where Republicans appear poised to suffer multiple losses in today's balloting. Those losses appear concentrated geographically in New England, the Mid-Atlantic and the Midwest — most notably Indiana, Ohio, New York and Pennsylvania — but Democrats also have the potential of picking up multiple seats in Western states such as Arizona and Colorado.

Some Republicans, most notably Reps. Jean Schmidt (Ohio), Barbara Cubin (Wyo.), and state Rep. Bill Sali, who is running for an open seat in Idaho, have a problem in that they remain unpopular with some factions of their base — forcing the national GOP to spend millions to help save what ordinarily would be considered safe seats.

Also, Republicans seem destined to suffer heavy losses of open seats they currently control. GOP-held seats in Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Ohio and New York already appear to be gone. Likewise, seats in Idaho, Illinois, Minnesota, Nevada and Wisconsin are considered too close to give one party the advantage.

Among vulnerable Democrats, freshman Rep. John Barrow (Ga.) has emerged as the most likely incumbent to go down to defeat in today's balloting, but even so the race is a tossup. Barrow faces former Rep. Max Burns (R), the man he beat in 2004, in a redrawn district that only marginally favors Democrats.

Both parties claimed momentum heading into today's vote.

Democrats tried to focus their talking points on Iraq on Monday, with both campaign committee leaders holding separate media events to draw attention to the issue.

In a conference call with reporters, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) made his final attempt to frame the elections as a cycle where voters will choose a new direction over a "stay the course" strategy.

He also expressed confidence in his party's turnout and field operations.

"I think there's a lot of energy on the Democratic side," Emanuel said.

Republicans, meanwhile, continued the get-out-the-vote drumbeat, boasting that their superior turnout operation ultimately will trump the deficit they currently face in public polling.

In a memo Monday, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman noted that late polls have showed a narrowing gap in the Democrats' generic ballot advantage.

"The GOP's 72-hour program has reached 27 million volunteer contacts through Saturday, hitting 3 million voters this Saturday alone," Mehlman wrote. "By and large, this effort will have its impact on Election Day and will not show up in most public opinion polls."

Meanwhile, possible recounts aside, there are at least two races that will not be decided today and appear headed for all-but-certain runoffs.

In Louisiana, embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D) has drawn a dozen challengers in the all-party primary that will be held today. If no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, the top two vote-getters will face off in a December runoff.

Most observers believe Jefferson will make the runoff and state Rep. Karen Carter (D) appears positioned to be his most likely runoff opponent.

In Texas, Rep. Henry Bonilla (R) faces an all-party special general election, after the Supreme Court ordered the redrawing Congressional boundaries after the March primaries had taken place.

Six Democrats are challenging Bonilla today, with a December runoff if no candidate gets more than 50 percent of the vote, which appears likely.

Wealthy businessman Lukin Gilliland, former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez and former San Antonio Fire Department District Chief Albert Uresti are the leading Democratic contenders, with Gilliland considered the favorite of national party insiders to face off against Bonilla in the runoff.

Angry Campaigns End On An Angrier Note (WP)

By Jim VandeHei And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

As the 2006 campaign staggered to an angry close, national security and the Iraq war dominated the final-day debate of midterm elections in which national themes, not simply local choices, have framed the most competitive races. Democrats said a vote for them would force change in Iraq strategy, while President Bush led the GOP charge in warning that the opposition party cannot be trusted in a time of war.

DOJ_NMG_0091537

Dozens of too-close-to-call House and Senate races finished on a surly tone, as the traditional political strategy of shifting to a positive message at campaign's end gave way this year to a calculation that the best chance to tip the balance was through continued attacks over personal character and alleged corruption.

But strategists on both sides said yesterday that national security broadly -- and Iraq specifically -- are likely to determine control of Congress today. Unlike in the 2002 and 2004 elections, when Republicans held a decisive edge on national security, polls over the past year have shown the public losing faith in the war and the GOP, and Democratic candidates nationwide were using their last TV advertising dollars on spots critical of Iraq policy.

"I think, frankly, people don't believe the president anymore" when it comes to the war, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, echoing other party leaders, said in an interview. "We are telling people if they want to stay the course, vote Republican. If you want a change of direction, vote Democrat."

Bush, however, was betting that the Republican Party's historic advantage with voters in times when security issues are prominent will pay dividends again. "As you go to the polls, remember we're at war," he told thousands of GOP supporters in Pensacola, Fla. "And if you want this country to do everything in its power to protect you and at the same time lay a foundation for peace for generations to come, vote Republican."

Democrats confidently predicted that they will win control of the House and trim if not topple the GOP's Senate majority. Republican operatives, however, said there is mounting evidence that fears about the nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea, coupled with more generalized doubts about Democratic competence and fortitude on national security, have provided GOP candidates with much-needed momentum in the final days. GOP tracking polls, these strategists said, have shown a slight but steady uptick since Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), in what he called a botched joke, suggested that uneducated people end up fighting in Iraq -- a comment that infuriated top Democrats despite the 2004 presidential nominee's repeated apologies and explanations.

"All of those things remind people we are at war and the importance of the national security issue," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee.

There are more than two dozen House races and at least five Senate contests that both sides considered too close to call heading into Election Day. A series of public polls released over the past few days offers contradictory findings about the public's views nationally and in many key races, confounding strategists in both parties. Some surveys show Republicans gaining on the generic question of whom respondents plan to vote for, while others suggest that Democrats are pulling away. The most recent, from CNN, showed Democrats with a 20-point advantage on the generic ballot question, which asks people which party they prefer but does not offer a choice between specific candidates.

Whether Republicans will succumb to adverse trends or manage to at least partly blunt them will determine whether Democrats can win back the House or Senate or both -- all scenarios that could dramatically change the trajectory of Bush's final two years in office.

Regardless of the margins, officials in both parties are planning for the stiffest challenge yet to Bush's war policy when Congress returns for its lame-duck session next week. Lawmakers are also bracing for GOP leadership changes in the House and Senate and a new policy agenda that is not dictated by the White House. Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leader of House conservatives, has told colleagues that he plans to seek a top leadership position, congressional aides said.

Democrats, who lost control of the House in 1994, need a net gain of 15 seats to win it back. Republicans generally agree that the opposition is on track to do that, but they hold out hope that a superior voter-turnout effort will tip just enough races to preserve the narrowest of House majorities.

A top GOP strategist said yesterday that several GOP House members who appeared safe one month ago -- including Reps. Charles Bass (N.H.) and Melissa Hart (Pa.) -- are in serious jeopardy. If Bass and Hart lose, it could signal mass casualties for the GOP, other strategists say.

DOJ_NMG_0091538

Senior strategists in both parties said the GOP is virtually certain to lose 10 seats, mostly because of a variety of scandals. If these projections are correct, Republicans would have to win more than three-quarters of the 30 or so races that were tied heading into the final weekend.

Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg, who released a survey of 50 districts yesterday showing Democrats up 49 percent to 44 percent, said Republicans have closed the gap slightly, but not enough to save their majority. "I don't see any evidence of anything but a minor pushback of getting some of the most partisan Republicans re-engaged," Greenberg said. Using his poll, he predicted Democrats will win 30 to 35 seats "as a conservative estimate."

It will be much harder for Democrats to pick up the six seats needed to control the Senate. GOP Sens. Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Rick Santorum (Pa.) are far behind in state-based polling, but Republicans have a shot at winning the five other targeted GOP seats: in Missouri, Montana, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia. Republicans also have a chance to pick up Democratic seats in Maryland and New Jersey, though both are uphill efforts.

Three premier contests -- Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia -- have been in the tossup category for several weeks. Republicans said yesterday that they think Tennessee is the most likely of the three to remain in their hands. Democrats said a big turnout among black voters is Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.'s best chance for a narrow victory over former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker, who polls show has taken control of the race in recent days. In Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) is fighting for his political life against Democrat James Webb, while the race in Missouri between Sen. James M. Talent (R) and State Auditor Claire McCaskill is considered the tightest.

Two other races have given Republicans reason to hope that they can hold the Senate. In Rhode Island, Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R) has closed the gap in his contest against former attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse. But Chafee is running into one of the stiffest headwinds in the country, with only about a quarter of voters there approving of Bush's performance.

In Montana, weekend polls painted a conflicting picture of the battle between Sen. Conrad Burns (R) and state Senate President Jon Tester. One survey showed a tie, while another gave Tester a clear lead. Bush and Vice President Cheney campaigned there last week, but Tester has been getting help from popular Gov. Brian Schweitzer.

Campaign volunteers continued to make telephone calls and walk precincts in the most contested races in an effort to maximize voter turnout. A Washington Post-ABC News poll found that as of Saturday, 41 percent of registered voters said they had been contacted directly by a campaign or party, up from 29 percent two weeks earlier.

Of those who said they had been contacted, 29 percent said they had heard from Republicans, 20 percent said they had heard from Democrats and 41 percent said they had been contacted by both parties. Several officials said this comports with anecdotal evidence that Republicans have done a better job than Democrats of reaching voters in the final stretch.

"We've got to get our votes out," former president Bill Clinton said during a campaign stop for House candidates in New York. "There are still people who will go to the polls tomorrow not entirely sure of who they're going to vote for because, frankly, a lot of these people never voted for us before."

Kerry Gaffe Loses Independents For His Party (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Sen. John Kerry's gaffe that Americans who do not do well in school end up in Iraq has triggered deep doubts among some independent voters about voting Democratic in the elections, according to a new Pew poll.

The poll found that 18 percent of independent voters -- considered pivotal in today's congressional elections -- said they had "serious doubts about voting for a Democratic candidate" because of Mr. Kerry's comments last week.

For most of this year, polls have shown independent voters supporting Democrats by lopsided margins, but yesterday's Pew poll said the Republicans "have made major gains, in a relatively short time period, among independent voters."

Democrats now lead Republicans among independents by 44 percent to 33 percent, compared with 47 percent to 29 percent in mid-October, according to Pew's poll of 2,369 registered voters Wednesday through Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0091539

In a speech to students at Pasadena City College in California last week, Mr. Kerry said, "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

The Massachusetts liberal's remark was seen by critics and fellow Democrats as demeaning the educational levels of U.S. service members. It forced him to cancel all of his campaign appearances after apologizing for comments he called "a botched joke" about President Bush's intelligence.

While most voters (78 percent) said Mr. Kerry's remarks were "not a serious consideration," 19 percent of all voters thought otherwise, representing a potentially significant shift of "voting intentions" and raising speculation of further erosion among independents for the Democrats.

Five percent of the Democrats polled said Mr. Kerry's remarks could affect their votes as well, Pew said.

Pew said it found that "Republicans have become more engaged and enthused in the election than they had been in September and October. As a result, Republicans now register a greater likelihood of voting than do Democrats."

Overall, Democrats led Republicans by 47 percent to 43 percent among likely voters in the poll, a decline of three points for the Democrats and an increase of four points for the Republicans in the generic ballot survey.

Pew also found a sharp increase in voter approval of the economy, with 44 percent "rating it as excellent or good, compared with 36 percent who held that view in mid-October."

Polls Give GOP A Lift On Election Eve (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Republicans are counting on a late surge in the public-opinion polls to cut their expected losses as a record number of American voters are predicted to participate in today's midterm elections.

Democrats expressed concerns yesterday about recent polls that suggested a slip in support, but they are still widely expected to pick up a significant number of seats in both houses of Congress and deliver President Bush his first electoral setback since he was first elected in 2000.

"We are feeling very, very good about things," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Other Democrats are less ebullient. His House counterpart, Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), said he was "nervous" about the latest polls.

Democrats need a net gain of six seats in the Senate and 15 in the House to take control of Congress. Since 1994, Republicans have held the House without interruption and the Senate nearly so. At least four Republican-held Senate seats -- Virginia, Missouri, Rhode Island and Montana -- along with Democrat-held Maryland, are widely considered too close to call.

Republicans on Capitol Hill, meanwhile, were guardedly optimistic that this year's much-predicted Democratic "tidal wave" will fail to materialize. Still, Republicans await the results more anxiously than Democrats.

Many Republicans delighted in recent polls conducted by the Pew Research Center and by the Washington Post/ABC News that showed Democrats losing their considerable advantage in the final days of the election.

The campaign of Sen. Rick Santorum, the Pennsylvania Republican who is widely expected to lose his bid for a third term today, thanked Democratic opponent Bob Casey Jr. for bringing "San Francisco liberal Rep. Nancy Pelosi," the House minority leader, into the state this weekend to campaign with him.

"The fact that so-called 'moderate' Casey would welcome Pelosi and her extremist liberal record to Pennsylvania in the final days of a campaign shocked and motivated the Republican base," said campaign manager Vince Galko. He said her appearance helped Republicans set a record of more than 380,000 contacts with voters over a two-day period.

DOJ_NMG_0091540

The Republican majority in the House is widely considered to be at greater risk than in the Senate. More than 30 Republican-held seats nationwide are thought to be in jeopardy, including seats left open by scandal-plagued Republicans Tom DeLay of Texas, Bob Ney of Ohio and Mark Foley of Florida. There are no more than a handful of vulnerable Democrats.

Whatever the outcome of today's election, both sides are poised to complain of electoral shenanigans.

Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way, warned reporters of "glitches" and "skulduggery" that had already been documented that might suppress the vote.

"Beware of voter fraud," warned the Republican National Committee, which compiled reports from across the country of Democratic allies trying to register the dead, illegal or those who are already registered.

The DCCC yesterday accused the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) of spending $600,000 on "dirty tricks" in the form of late-night phone calls to voters disparaging Democratic candidates.

NRCC lawyer Donald F. McGahn II wrote the Democratic committee to say the disclaimers on the Republican calls are the same as those used by Democrats and noted several Democratic television commercials that were taken down over concerns about their veracity.

"Perhaps if you paid as much attention to your own client's political advertising as you apparently do my client's phone calls, the DCCC would have better luck in keeping its advertising on the air," Mr. McGahn wrote. "How are those spots in Indiana and Kentucky coming? Did you ever get those falsehoods on the air?"

Both sides have dispatched hundreds of lawyers into states expecting tight races and banked hundreds of thousands of dollars to fight any irregularities they suspect.

Yesterday, in the final hours of a long and bruising campaign, both sides made a final plea to voters. "We want to end the disgraceful lies and astonishing incompetence," promised Mr. Schumer, who said Democrats are "poised to win."

"But we're not spiking the ball until we get in the end zone. We need everyone to get their friends and families to the polls tomorrow," he wrote in an appeal to Democratic voters. "And we need a final fundraising push for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Every dollar you give today is another van we can rent to drive people to the polls tomorrow and another person we can deploy to keep watch for any voter suppression activities."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, pointed to Republican accomplishments.

"Under the House Republican watch, gas prices are low, the stock market is at all-time highs, and America has not been attacked since September 11th," he said. "From economic security to national security to border security, House Republicans have tackled tough issues. If the Democrats gain the House majority, Nancy Pelosi has made it clear they will raise taxes, coddle terrorists, and provide amnesty to illegal immigrants."

Sean Rushton, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice, noted widespread speculation that there will be an opening on the Supreme Court in the near future. Senate confirmation of any Bush nominee would be dramatically more difficult if Democrats control the chamber.

"For weeks, commentators have speculated that significant numbers of conservatives, alienated by overspending, the Iraq war, and other perceived GOP disappointments, will stay home on Election Day, giving one or both Houses of Congress to Democrats," he wrote yesterday on HumanEvents.com. "But for those who care about reforming the Supreme Court, sitting this one out may soon look like a mistake of historic proportions."

Replacing a liberal member of the high court "could be a once-in-a-lifetime chance for the 20-year movement to recast the court with a constitutionalist majority," Mr. Rushton said. "It would be a cruel twist indeed for conservatives to 'teach Republicans a lesson' next Tuesday, only to be taught a lesson themselves within months when the new Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy leads a Democratic majority against the most important Supreme Court nominee in decades."

Republicans Make Last-minute Push (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Edward Luce In Washington Dc And Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

The Republican party on Monday intensified last-minute efforts to motivate its supporters in the hope of defying widespread expectations of a strong Democratic showing in Tuesday's congressional midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0091541

Citing an ABC-Washington Post poll that showed the Democratic lead narrowing to as little as six percentage points from a double-digit margin last week, Republican strategists said their volunteers had made direct contact with 27m American voters during the election campaign – far more than the Democrats.

"We have made more voter contacts in 2006 than we did in 2004, which is remarkable given that this is a mid-term election, not a presidential election," said Dana Perino, a White House spokesperson.

However, electoral analysts said the superiority of the Republican fundraising and "micro-targeting" machines would be insufficient to breach the wide Democratic lead, which was still averaging 11 percentage points if all the polls of the past few days were taken into account.

"No party in American history has ever come back from this kind of polling deficit to win an election," said Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report, Washington's most closely read daily electoral analysis. "The Democrats are still on course to win the House of Representatives by a healthy margin."

Separately, in an interview with the Financial Times in Baghdad on Monday, Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador to Iraq, said that the outcome of the election would have no impact on the war strategy of George W. Bush's administration. Iraq has consistently featured as the most important concern – in addition to economic anxieties – among voters during the campaign. "The president has told them [the government of Iraq] not to pay attention to that," said Mr Khalilzad. "The president will be the commander in chief and the architect of US foreign policy regardless of the outcome."

The Democrats, who need to add 15 seats to their tally in the 435-seat House of Representatives to regain control for the first time in 12 years, are projected to gain between 11 and 58 seats by Gallup. They need to add six seats to their tally in the 100-member Senate to regain control, with polls showing them winning between four and six races.

On Monday Mr Bush visited Florida, Arkansas and Texas in his final campaign events. But in a sign of his continued unpopularity, Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor of Florida, was unable to show up to the rally. Dick Cheney, the vice-president, plans to spend today duck-shooting.

Parties Spend $225M On Target Races (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 7, 2006

National committees for the Republicans and Democrats have spent about $225 million for or against candidates, concentrating their resources in 10 Senate races and 66 House contests that could determine who controls Congress.

The data is based on a review of independent spending reports filed with the Federal Election Commission as of Monday. Republicans spent about $81 million in 53 congressional districts, mostly on television advertising opposing Democratic challengers. Democrats spent $64 million in 56 congressional districts, most of them represented by a Republican.

In Senate contests, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has trained its sights on seats currently held by Republicans in Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee, Virginia, Rhode Island, Montana and Arizona. Republicans are aiming for three Democratic-held seats in New Jersey, Maryland and Michigan.

The parties have spent little or no money in Pennsylvania, where Republican Sen. Rick Santorum has trailed Democrat Bob Casey Jr., for months.

The spending data illustrates the difficulties facing Republicans in this elections, where they have been forced to defend seats instead of aggressively seeking to defeat incumbent Democrats. Midterm elections in second-term presidencies are notoriously harsh on the ruling party. For Republicans, growing public antipathy toward the war in Iraq has made their hold on Congress even more tenuous.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in the House and six seats in the Senate to capture control of Congress. The last time Democrats had majorities in both chambers was 1994.

The spending for House seats has been mostly concentrated in the Ohio Valley. Ten Republicans are vulnerable in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky. Another 10 are fending off strong challenges in Pennsylvania and New York.

DOJ_NMG_0091542

Many independent groups, including labor, business and ideological organizations, are spending in some of the same contests that have attracted party money. The Missouri Senate race between incumbent Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill has attracted the most money, with parties and independent groups spending more than $20 million in the state.

The House race that has seen the most spending is a rematch between Pennsylvania Republican incumbent Jim Gerlach and Democrat Lois Murphy. Their district sits in southeastern Pennsylvania, nestled in the hills that run from the outer Philadelphia suburbs to the old industrial city of Reading. The National Republican Congressional Committee has spent $3.9 million, mostly in ads against Murphy, and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has spent $3 million against Gerlach.

Final Push Hefty Democratic Fund Raising Vies With Clout Of Incumbency Aggressive Money Machine Aims To Overcome Benefits Of Pork And Redistricting Mr. Shaw's Mobile Post Office By JEANNE CUMMINGS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- If Democrats win control of one or both houses of Congress in Tuesday's elections, they'll be able to thank an aggressive fund-raising strategy that has given them fuel to take advantage of voter dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq.

If the Republicans hang on, it will be largely because of two big advantages: the power to dole out government favors to constituents and their redrawing of districts to protect incumbents.

"It takes a tidal wave in order to swamp the levee that was built with redistricting," says Michael McDonald, a George Mason University expert on redrawing congressional lines. Election watchers are making a big deal of the more than 50 competitive seats in the House, Mr. McDonald says, but the unstated figure may be more important: nearly 90% of House incumbents are cruising to re-election.

ELECTION 2006

• Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

5 • Review the results of the latest polls6 in hot Senate races.

• The Senate's Uncertain States:7 Interactive profiles.

• Battlegrounds Poll:8 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

• Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers9

• Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts10

There are large and emotional issues that will help determine the election's outcome, including the economy and Iraq. But both parties are hoping that their tactical advantages will put them over the top.

Five days before Election Day, his feet propped up on a wooden desk, New York Sen. Charles Schumer was working the phones.

"Hi, David," he said, his voice bouncing off the walls of his closetlike office at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "We're right on the edge," he said. "We are closing in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. We're hoping you will send us something."

The senator cradled the phone as he opened a banana-taffy Halloween candy and nodded his head. "You can send up to $25,000," he said, pausing to measure the response. "How about half of that, $12,500?...You're a doll," he said, transferring the call to an aide who can bank the money before the final weekend TV blitz.

This time around, Democrats have played the money game more assertively than in any previous midterm election. Party leaders have mined donors for extra cash. They set explicit fund-raising targets for new candidates to win the party's backing.

DOJ_NMG_0091543

And they also raised donation targets for veteran politicians who want to become committee chairmen should Democrats win a majority.

The result: Fund raising by the Democratic congressional committees is running 30% ahead of the same period two years ago, according to a study by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan group that tracks political money. The Democratic party committees for the first time entered the final weeks of a campaign with nearly as much money in the bank as their Republican counterparts.

That has allowed Democrats to attack earlier, even to the point of backing conservative Republicans in primary races they thought would be more beatable in the general election. In the final weeks, Democrats have been able to defend themselves and attack weak incumbents. As the end of the campaign neared, the Democrats had about as much money set aside for voter turnout as their much-touted rivals.

On the other side of the ledger, Republicans have the power of incumbency. For decades, members of Congress have enjoyed an average 95% re-election rate. Since becoming the majority in 1994, Republicans have taken steps to reinforce that advantage. They've expanded the age-old practice of pork-barrel spending by increasing what's known as "earmarking," where members designate federal money for hometown projects. This year, Republican candidate Web sites routinely featured interactive maps showing the goodies the congressmen delivered.

The campaign slogan for Sen. Conrad Burns, a three-term Montana Republican, is "Burns delivers for Montana." In a recent Helena debate, he bragged about the projects he brought to his home state, which he says total $2 billion, including "this airport renovation that serves this great city and the Eagles Nursing Home to serve our seniors, and, yes, Liberty House at Fort Harrison for families that come in this town to get their health care."

The other pillar of Republican defense is gerrymandering, the once-a-decade redrawing of U.S. House district boundaries that gives the party in power a chance to create safe seats. Using computer programming, both parties have become expert at marrying census data and voting data to identify friendly voters down to their street address.

Republicans, under the leadership of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, in 2002 pushed the system to its extremes, urging legislatures in Texas, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Florida to maximize Republican seats. In Texas alone, because of redistricting, House Republicans gained five seats in 2004.

Yesterday, both parties shifted their focus to voter turnout. Democrats must net 15 seats to win the House and six to gain control of the Senate. President Clinton appeared at rallies in Virginia and Rhode Island to boost Democratic Senate candidates. President Bush's last rally in Florida symbolized his tarnished image: Popular Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist surprised the White House by skipping the event, leaving Mr. Bush on the stage with struggling Senate hopeful Rep. Katherine Harris. Ms. Harris oversaw the 2000 recount that helped put Mr. Bush in the White House.

Since federal fund-raising records were first collected in 1978, Republican Party committees have always had an edge over their rivals, according to Federal Election Commission records. Individual Republican candidates as a whole have also typically raised more money than Democrats.

This year, Democratic Party leaders began fund raising by tapping friendly companies and financiers in their backyards. Would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi alone raised about $50 million for the House campaign committee, seeking support from the electronics and communication industries. Mr. Schumer mined financial and banking houses in New York City, raising nearly a quarter of his committee's fund, or about $24 million, from that city alone. Among top donors are executives from Goldman Sachs, Citigroup, Morgan Stanley, Credit Suisse Group and the personal-injury law firm of Weitz & Luxenberg. Of those, only Goldman Sachs ranked as a major giver in 2004.

Illinois Congressman Rahm Emanuel, who runs the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has generated about $30 million in donations from his contacts, particularly in Chicago. In 2004, 34 Chicago corporations gave to the House campaign committee either through their company political action committees or executives. So far this year, 60 Chicago firms were represented on the donor list, according to an analysis by the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group.

Among the newcomers: $65,000 from Madison Dearborn Partners, a private-equity firm; $26,700 from Magnetar Capital, a hedge fund; $75,000 from Medline Industries, a provider of health-care supplies and equipment; $13,500 from Midway Games, a videogame maker.

DOJ_NMG_0091544

Party leaders have leaned on veterans with rich campaign accounts but scant competition of their own. After Sen. Hillary Clinton transferred $2 million from her overstuffed war chest to the Senate committee, a number of bloggers publicized the fact that Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry hadn't made a donation; a chastened Mr. Kerry delivered $265,000.

Ms. Pelosi encouraged members interested in becoming committee chairmen to consider giving at least $250,000 to the House campaign committee, higher than the Republican target of $200,000. Senior Democrats with leadership ambitions gave a combined $16 million to the House campaign as of Oct. 27, well above their 2004 levels. House Minority Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who hopes to be majority leader, tops the list with $570,000. New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who wants to take over the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, has given $370,000.

The extra cash has allowed Democratic strategists to go on the offensive in some unorthodox ways.

In an Arizona House seat left open by a retiring Republican, Mr. Emanuel spent $500,000 in the August Republican primary on behalf of the leading conservative candidate in the field, Randy Graf. His calculation: Mr. Graf couldn't win a general election in the moderate district. Republican strategists belatedly tried to defeat Mr. Graf, but he won, and Republicans now have conceded the seat. House Democrats figure they saved about $2 million that would otherwise have been spent trying to defeat a Republican moderate.

Extra money has made it possible for Senate Democrats to define the field early. The Senate campaign committee last summer transferred a chunk of money to the Montana Democratic Party, which began airing ads highlighting Mr. Burns's ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The issue has dogged the incumbent ever since.

Late last week, Mr. Schumer invested $1 million into the long-shot race of Democrat businessman Jim Pederson against Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl. While intended to boost Mr. Pederson's chances, Mr. Schumer also figured Mr. Kyl would insist on help from the Republican senatorial committee. He asked, and received, diverting Republican cash from more competitive races.

Money has also allowed Democrats to expand the battlefield. Nevada Republican Rep. Jon Porter has won re-election twice in his Las Vegas suburban district with double-digit margins. But the Iraq war has become a heavy drag on his campaign. When Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen was inching up in polls in the final weeks, the Democratic House campaign committee shoveled about $500,000 into the race. Mr. Porter's re-election chances have now been downgraded by political oddsmakers.

Mr. Schumer has earmarked $20 million for turnout operations in seven races targeting Republican incumbents. He's using the money to create an up-to-date voter list in Montana and Missouri. Mr. Emanuel is allocating more than $250,000 to build customized turnout operations in each of the roughly 33 districts on which he's concentrating, for a total of about $12 million.

The re-election campaign of 13-term Florida Republican Rep. Clay Shaw is a test of those competing forces: Democratic money versus Republican incumbency.

After Mr. Shaw barely clung to his district in 2000 -- he won by 599 votes -- alarmed Florida Republicans set out to protect him by redrawing his district. The Republican state legislature plundered Republican voters from the adjacent district of a more junior Republican, Mark Foley, who quit this year amid a sex scandal. They also dumped Democratic voters into the neighboring district held by Democrat Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz.

After their handiwork, Republican voters suddenly had a 40% to 35% advantage over Democrats, an eight-percentage point swing from 2000, according to Susan MacManus, a political scientist with the University of South Florida in Tampa. The balance is largely made up of independents.

Mr. Shaw used his seniority in Congress to direct cash into the district. A bridge in Ft. Lauderdale is named after him. His Web site includes a map where constituents can learn about other pork he's delivered, including $3 million for a sea-wall project in West Palm Beach and a Juno Beach mobile post office.

In 2002, Mr. Shaw was re-elected with 62% of the vote and again in 2004 with 63%. His race this year is considered a toss-up because, he says, people have grown "fatigued" by the lack of progress and escalating U.S. casualties in Iraq. About a quarter of voters in his district say they're independents, a group that leans heavily toward Democrats this year.

"I've run in this district twice and won by 20 points," says Mr. Shaw. "It's not gonna be that way this year."

DOJ_NMG_0091545

Last Friday, Mr. Shaw's Democratic opponent, State Sen. Ron Klein, 49 years old, made his pitch to lawyers and staff in the Ft. Lauderdale public defender's office. He doesn't want an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, but says, "it's time for our generation to stand up and provide some new leadership." Behind her desk, Leigh L. Sipper nodded. She voted for Mr. Shaw, 67, in the past, but she's convinced "it's time for a change. The war is a big part of that," she says.

While Iraq made Mr. Shaw vulnerable, money helped Mr. Klein get his message out. The challenger has raised $3.6 million, nearly matching the powerful incumbent's $4 million. (Mr. Klein was given a target of raising $1 million by March in order to get the backing of the Democratic campaign committee.)

Mr. Klein has saturated the district with ads linking Mr. Shaw to President Bush and the war. In one, the mother of a solider in Iraq talks about a Shaw vote she says was against a combat bonus for Iraq soldiers: "Mr. Shaw, how could you?" she asks.

In the final weeks, when Mr. Klein began to run out of money, the Democratic House campaign committee stepped in and filled the gap. The committee invested more than $2 million in the race, an unprecedented sum for the district.

For Democrats, Even A Gain May Feel Like A Failure (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 — In most midterm elections, an out-of-power party picking up, say, 14 seats in the House and five seats in the Senate could call it a pretty good night.

But for Democrats in 2006, that showing would mean coming up one seat shy of taking control of both the Senate and the House. And it would probably be branded a loss — in the case of the House, a big one.

For a combination of reasons — increasingly bullish prognostications by independent handicappers, galloping optimism by Democratic leaders and bloggers, and polls that promise a Democratic blowout — expectations for the party have soared into the stratosphere. Democrats are widely expected to take the House, and by a significant margin, and perhaps the Senate as well, while capturing a majority of governorships and legislatures.

These expectations may well be overheated. Polls over the weekend suggested that the contest was tightening, and some prognosticators on Monday were scaling back their predictions, if ever so slightly. (Charlie Cook, the analyst who is one of Washington's chief setters of expectations, said in an e-mail message on Monday that he was dropping the words "possibly more" from his House prediction of "20-35, possibly more.")

Some Democrats worry that those forecasts, accurate or not, may be setting the stage for a demoralizing election night, and one with lasting ramifications, sapping the party's spirit and energy heading into the 2008 presidential election cycle.

"Two years ago, winning 14 seats in the House would have been a pipe dream," said Matt Bennett, a founder of Third Way, a moderate Democratic organization. Now, Mr. Bennett said, failure to win the House, even by one seat, would send Democrats diving under their beds (not to mention what it might do to all the pundits).

"It would be crushing," he said. "It would be extremely difficult."

Mr. Cook put it more succinctly. "I think you'd see a Jim Jones situation — it would be a mass suicide," he said.

On election eve, the rough consensus among officials in both parties was that the Democrats would win the House but come just short of capturing the six seats they needed in the Senate. There was wide disagreement, though, about how many House seats Democrats might win.

Many of these predictions had been based on polls showing that President Bush, the Republican Party and Congress were extraordinarily unpopular. But going into Election Day, at least 20 House seats and probably 3 Senate seats were tied or close to it, no matter what the national polls say.

So, what if Democrats just squeak to victory in the House by a seat or two? What if Democrats win just three seats in the Senate or — unlikely but not impossible — even two?

"I'm not getting into the Washington expectations game," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Democrat from Illinois running his party's effort to capture the House, in what he said would be a very brief minute he would devote to commenting on this subject. "My job is to deliver north of 15 seats and that's what I am going to do."

DOJ_NMG_0091546

Howard Wolfson, a Democratic consultant advising candidates in some of the most competitive races in upstate New York — and one of his party's biggest optimists this year — said the size of the margin would not matter, assuming, of course, that Democrats win. "It's not a question of 25 or 35," Mr. Wolfson said. "It's a question of 14 or 15. Would you rather have a bigger margin? Of course. But if you take back the House, the world changes."

But any casual reader of a newspaper, or watcher of television news, or consumer of polls could be forgiven for thinking that the nation was about to witness its biggest shift in power since Republicans seized control of Congress by capturing 54 House seats in 1994. In the past week, analysts like Mr. Cook and Stuart Rothenberg, as well as on-the-record Democrats and Republicans, were talking about the Democrats' racking up as many as 35 seats. (Republicans, of course, may have decided that they have a Machiavellian interest in setting up Democrats with inflated expectations.)

"From a communications standpoint, the Democrats have done a lousy job managing expectations," said Justin Blake, an executive vice president at Edelman, the public relations firm.

Indeed, Mr. Emanuel and his Senate counterpart, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, have gone to some lengths not to project overconfidence. Mr. Schumer likes to say that Democrats are "on the edge" of taking back the Senate.

Other Democratic leaders are less restrained.

"I am now even more certain that Democrats will take control of the House and believe the net gain will be at least 30 seats and that we will certainly know the outcome early in the evening," Martin Frost, the former Texas Democratic congressman, wrote in a column he e-mailed around last week.

Mr. Bennett said that winning only 14 seats would produce an inevitable drop in contributions and a round of whither-the-Democrats post-election sessions. But he also said that, based on what had happened after Senator John Kerry's failed presidential effort in 2004, a race that many Democrats thought they should have won, he doubted the impact would last long.

And, unless the Democrats make no gains at all, it seems highly unlikely that there would be the kind of recriminations that typically follow a party loss, the kind of bloodletting already being seen on the Republican side.

Almost without exception, Democrats have praised Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Schumer — though Howard Dean, the party's national chairman, may have to defend his decision to spread Democratic National Committee money to build up parties in all 50 states, while parrying requests for support in the Congressional races.

The scope of a Democratic victory could go a long way in determining just how much power the party had in Congress.

Perceptions matter in politics, and this White House has shown it knows how to shape them; it would no doubt relish trying to weaken its new Congressional foes by portraying a small Democratic edge as a loss.

The obvious best outcome for Democrats would be to win control of both houses, allowing them to claim a public mandate. But unless they somehow control 60 votes in the Senate — which, not to be setting any expectations here, is not going to happen — they will have to work with Republicans to pass legislation. If they win the House by a large margin but do not get the Senate, they will also no doubt claim something of a mandate, though that would seem to be a recipe for gridlock.

If the Democrats fail to capture the House and the Senate, it would provide a psychic boost for the White House and some political vindication for Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser. But given the intramural Republican squabbling of the past two years, it seems fair to say that nothing much could be expected out of Congress for the next two.

Mr. Bennett said, of the possibility of Democrats' losing in the end, "Some people will be saying, maybe that's better, which I think is crazy, but people are going to say it anyway."

In Mock Student Election, Democrats Reclaim House By NAUREEN S. MALIK (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Nearly one million votes cast by elementary and high school students in a nationwide mock election backed a Republican Senate but turned power over to the Democrats in the House of Representatives.

Ballots for the Youth Leadership Initiative's Internet mock election, which ended Thursday night, were tailored to local elections and referenda. Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center of Politics, started the program in 1998 at three local schools.

DOJ_NMG_0091547

Of the 33 Senate seats up for election, 10 are Republican and one independent. In the mock election, Democrats gained seats in Pennsylvania, Montana, Tennessee and Mississippi. But Republicans carried Florida, Minnesota and Washington for a 54-seat majority. (See www.youthleadership.net1 for full results)

Republican George Allen may have retained his Senate seat in Virginia, but his 44.74% win against Democratic rival Jim Webb's 44.59% shows how his campaign missteps became an issue. Hilary Clinton retained New York for the Democrats by a wide margin.

All 435 House seats are up for election and the student polls were brutal in Ohio, Florida, New York and North Carolina. Democrats came out ahead with 218 seats compared with 202 for Republicans and 15 for other candidates.

On the gubernatorial front, New York students elected Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and in California, students voted to re-elect Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger.

These results are by no means a random sample of how kids in the U.S. feel, nor do they foreshadow adult voting, though they did call for President Bush's victory in 2004.

"This is about civic education," Mr. Sabato says. The mock election teaches students "the rules of the game and that politics are exciting so that they will start voting at an early age and continue that through their lifetime." While students often reflect parents' views, he says kids' participation in the mock election has "guilt tripped" parents into voting.

Teachers register free with YLI to participate in the mock election, receive lesson plans and participate in e-congress, where students draft and vote on each others' bills across the country. YLI's mock election is growing as the program matures. More than 204,000 students weighed in on the mid-term elections over an 11-day period, compared with 20,000 in 2002. About 810,000 students had voted in the 2004 presidential election.

Normally, 50% of the eligible voters turn out for presidential elections compared with 30% for off years, says Elaine Kamarck, who teaches American politics and government management at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government. But on Election Day, she expects an uptick at the polls for one reason: the Iraq War. The issue that is on the forefront of student and adult minds elevates the local election with a national concern.

In the real world, adults vote to influence public policy. In Carol Mill's U.S. Government class at Eisenhower High School in Yakima, Wash., juniors do it for extra credit. Teachers can monitor who votes but not how they vote.

Ms. Mills says her students were split over the Iraq war. Another big issue was a referendum to repeal taxes on estates valued at $2 million or more. The Yakima students were in favor of it, pointing to Bill Gates's charities.

Seniors at Westfield High School in Northern Virginia scoured online campaign ads, polls and blogs to develop arguments about amendments on marriage, church incorporation and a real estate property tax break for redevelopment, says social studies teacher Walt Addie.

Betsy Gonzales, who teaches eighth grade at Cedar Park Middle School in Texas, says, says her students get their news from John Stewart's The Daily Show and are backing the more colorful independent candidates: Richard "Kinky" Friedman (comedian and a writer who smokes cigars) and Carole Keeton Strayhorn (campaigning as "One Tough Grandma") in the gubernatorial race. Cedar Park will hold elections on Tuesday and will send results to YLI.

At Hunter College Elementary School for gifted children in Manhattan, sixth-grade teacher Christina Jenkins says the younger students often come to the classroom reflecting parents' views, which can cause some students to withdraw in debates over sensitive issues such as abortion or gay marriage. She encourages those with less popular views to speak up to foster discussion. "Because of that, I play the devil's advocate a lot," Ms. Jenkins says.

After Losing Seniors To Republicans, Democrats Hope To Lure Them Back By ERIKA LOVLEY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- As polls open today, Democratic strategists looking for bellwethers are closely watching a group of voters that has attracted relatively little attention in the blitz of this year's campaign: senior citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0091548

Democrats decisively lost the vote of older Americans to President Bush in the 2004 election, which party leaders see as a key reason they failed to unseat the president. Exit polls indicate Mr. Bush prevailed among those ages 60 and over by a margin of 54% to 46%.

Democrats think they can recapture those voters this year, which would be a crucial step toward taking one or both houses of Congress.

"We found the majority vote [among seniors] continues to be strongly Democratic," said Ana Iparraguirre, a senior associate at Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research, a consulting firm in Washington, D.C., run by a former pollster for President Clinton. Unhappiness over the war in Iraq and, in particular, squeamishness over President Bush's attempt to enact a partial privatization of Social Security are "definitely giving Democrats the advantage," she said.

ELECTION 2006

• Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

5 • Review the results of the latest polls6 in hot Senate races.

• The Senate's Uncertain States:7 Interactive profiles.

• Battlegrounds Poll:8 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

9 • Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers10

• Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts11

Seniors are seen as a critical voting bloc because, unlike younger voters, they tend to turn out reliably in large numbers on Election Day. They are expected to serve as an important voting bloc in several close races in states such as Florida and Pennsylvania, states where the ratio of senior voters is among the nation's highest.

In Florida, voters ages 65 or over, who make up 16% of total voters, according to 2005 census numbers, could play a big role in two tight House races, between Democrat Tim Mahoney and Republican Joe Negron, and between Republican Rep. Clay Shaw and Florida state Sen. Ron Klein, a Democrat. Similar dynamics are in play in Pennsylvania, where 14.6% of voters are seniors, especially in the Senate race between Sen. Rick Santorum, a Republican, and Democrat Bob Casey, and the House race between Republican Rep. Curt Weldon and Democrat Joseph A. Sestak Jr.

Both parties are making pitches on senior-specific issues. Democrats repeatedly focus on Mr. Bush's comments that he would like to return to his theme of overhauling the Social Security system in the remainder of his term. Last week, Mr. Sestak visited the Martin's Run Retirement Community north of Media, Pa. For the better part of an hour, he talked about World War II and the sacrifices made by Americans. He criticized the U.S. pharmaceutical industry and complained about tax breaks issued by President Bush.

Mr. Santorum's campaign has run several television ads touting a bill he has proposed in Congress that would guarantee that Social Security benefits would never be cut for the elderly. One ad features the senator in the middle of a crowded dance hall with seniors who are thanking him for supporting their community.

"We want them to know what we'll do to make Social Security sustainable in the future," said Santorum campaign spokesman Virginia Davis. "It makes visits with seniors an important part of the campaign."

Democrats say the prescription-drug benefit offered under a bill that President Bush backed isn't sufficiently generous, and in particular have charged that the program doesn't adequately allow the government to bargain down the price of drugs for senior citizens offered through the program. Most Democratic attacks charge that the drug provision gives away too much to the pharmaceutical industry. Democrats in the House have vowed to change the program within their first 100 hours if they gain control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0091549

In Florida, Mr. Mahoney, the Democrat running for a House seat, has canvassed local retirement communities about the issue. Mr. Mahoney himself is pushing for a competitive drug plan that would cater to seniors rather than pharmaceutical companies.

Republicans say the prescription-drug issue may actually help them. Some have pointed to a Kaiser Family Foundation Health Poll Report Survey of 1,585 seniors in June, which showed that eight in 10 seniors enrolled in a Medicare drug plan were satisfied with their plan. A similar survey taken in August 2004 found that twice as many people on Medicare had an unfavorable view of the law than had a favorable view.

Overall, older voters appear to be skewing Democratic heading into elections. A Pew Research Center survey of 2,369 registered voters released Sunday showed that 48% of those ages 65 and over were leaning towards voting for Democrats, compared with 42% for Republicans. Reflecting a broader trend, the number of older voters supporting Republicans rose slightly over figures from a Pew poll in September. In the 2002 midterm elections, 46% of seniors supported Republicans, compared with 43% for Democrats.

An increase in senior support for Democrats could spell bad news for Republicans in an election in which turnout among younger voters is expected to be weak. Nearly two-thirds of seniors are expected to vote this year.

"If there is turnout in high levels, it will be tough on Republicans," said Andrew Kohut, president of Pew Research Center, an independent opinion-research group based in Washington.

AARP, the national retirees association, reports that their 37 million members are evenly divided on party politics. One-third typically support Democrats, and one-third Republicans. The remaining third are independents -- voters that both parties are vying to capture.

AARP officials say its members across party lines are disgruntled by the Iraq war, and have made Iraq their top voting priority. "We don't think the issue is playing very well for Republicans at this point," said David Sloane, the group's director of government relations.

How Illegal Immigration Failed As Silver Bullet For Republicans Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- Twenty-one months ago, when House Republicans couldn't have foreseen how endangered their majority would be by Election Day, they went home for the President's Day recess, armed with talking points from the White House and party leaders to promote President Bush's top-priority proposal to remake Social Security.

But when they returned to the Capitol, many of these Republicans -- never eager to take on Social Security anyway without Democrats' support -- reported that voters wanted to talk about something else: illegal immigration.

ELECTION 2006

• Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• See the expanded online version of Washington Wire4. The Journal's Washington bureau will provide campaign analysis, news and buzz on Election Day.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20065.

And with that, congressional Republicans seized on the issue many hoped would be a silver bullet to get through the midterm elections, and without the losses that a president's party traditionally suffers.

By attacking illegal immigration, Republicans could look tough on border security and please their conservative constituents and many independents. In the process, they could force votes in Congress -- say, on cutting off benefits for illegals' children, or making English the official U.S. language -- that would divide the Democrats and their Hispanic allies, and, ideally, trap some Democratic lawmakers into votes that could be turned into 30-second attack ads for television by November 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0091550

It hasn't exactly turned out that way. A visit to this border state helps understand why.

Forget Democrats' divisions. The issue of dealing with illegal immigrants divided the Bush-era Republican Party at least as badly, and more embarrassingly so given that it holds all the power in Washington. Republicans who backed the get-tough route did so knowing they were rejecting the president's other top domestic priority for his second term -- a comprehensive and "compassionate conservative" immigration plan that would provide a path to citizenship for the estimated 11 million illegal aliens already in the country.

Arizona has been a microcosm of the Republican Party's splits. The state's senior U.S. senator, John McCain, has long taken the same position on immigration as the president. He helped broker the Senate's compromise immigration measure, though Republican foes would come to call it Ted Kennedy's plan. Sen. Jon Kyl, the other Republican senator from Arizona, led the opposition to the McCain version in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

In the House, Arizona's Republican Rep. J.D. Hayworth helped lead the drive for a crackdown-only approach; he even wrote a quick book, "Whatever It Takes," and appeared in a conservative group's movie, "Border War." But his fellow Arizona Republicans in the House mostly opposed him.

Like other border states -- Mr. Bush's Texas, for instance -- Arizona most directly feels the costs of illegal immigration in terms of poverty, education needs and crime. But it also enjoys the fruits of a large low-wage workforce, and a proud culture rooted in Hispanic history.

Sen. Kyl, up for re-election this year, has seen his once-wide lead over developer and former state Democratic Party Chairman Jim Pederson narrow to single digits in polls. He hasn't made a huge issue of immigration, but where he has, Mr. Pederson -- like other Democrats nationwide -- counters that his position is little different from Mr. Bush's.

In House races, as it happens, the two Arizona Republicans who've hammered illegal immigration the hardest are in the most trouble. In the Tucson-area district to replace moderate Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe, who is retiring, the Republican nominee is former state Rep. Randy Graf, a founding member of the Minutemen policing U.S.-Mexico borders. His hard-core stance on illegal immigration helped Mr. Graf win the Republican primary over two less conservative rivals, but it left party wounds; Mr. Kolbe, among others, withheld support. The seat is widely expected to fall to Democrats.

Mr. Hayworth may well hold on, though his own internal polls have him several points behind former Democratic state senator and Tempe mayor Harry Mitchell. The congressman, who used to back guest-worker programs, has found that the enforcement-first platform he built for his toughest race yet isn't supporting him very well. Here, as nationally, voters chiefly have on their minds another war than the "border war" he emphasizes.

In a recent speech to a civic group in his affluent suburban district outside Phoenix, Mr. Hayworth opened by saying, "Sadly, here we are, in the early years of the 21st century, again, a nation at war." Then, without mentioning Iraq, he immediately described how up to 6,500 people nightly attempt to cross over to Arizona from Mexico illegally; 4,500 make it, he said. "It may not sit well with the politically correct sensibilities of those who populate the editorial boards of our major newspapers," Mr. Hayworth went on, "but with that type of occurrence on a nightly basis, what else do we call it but invasion?"

When the congressman finally opened the floor to questions, every one was about war -- the one in Iraq. What about the erosion of public support? How can there be a swift end to it? Should the U.S. pull out troops, or add 100,000 more? Mr. Hayworth didn't endorse either extreme, saying non-commitally, "Victory must be our goal, not disengagement."

That evening at an event for Mr. Mitchell, among the attendees was one of a number of local officeholders who've formed "Republicans for Mitchell," Tempe city councilman Ben Arredondo. Mr. Arredondo, from a well-known local Hispanic family that has been in Arizona for generations, quickly volunteers why he's not supporting his fellow Republican: "As soon as Hayworth came on the immigration issue, it was over."

A top national Republican strategist, speaking of threatened incumbents such as Mr. Hayworth, says the immigration issue -- far from being the silver bullet --has exacted a higher price than is recognized; it's been "masked by other things," he says, such as voter frustration with war, high spending, scandals. "But," says the strategist, who asks to be unidentified, "you don't go around the country saying, 'This the No. 1 problem, but, by the way, we're not going to do anything about it.' "

Pelosi's Platform (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0091551

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

What would a Democratic House of Representatives under Speaker Nancy Pelosi be like? The Republicans have been painting an unattractive portrait of Democrats roasting young children on a spit in the Capitol Rotunda and whatnot. Hoping for a more encouraging view, I picked up "A New Direction for America," a 31-page manifesto released to little acclaim by House Democrats in June. By all means read it. But do me a favor and vote first.

The document is full of bromides, of course, and like all good bromides, they come in threes. The Democrats promise "security, prosperity, and opportunity" in "diverse, safe, and vibrant communities." Not to mention "integrity, civility and fiscal discipline." They will "protect Americans, secure our borders, and restore our country's position of international leadership" through "homeland, energy, and diplomatic strategies." And we're only up to Page 3.

The two favorite words of Democrats on the cusp of power seem to be "tax credit." They promise to "modernize" the tax credit for research and development; to "expand and improve" the already ludicrously complex system of tax-deductible retirement accounts such as IRAs and 401(k) plans (and match "dollar-for-dollar" the first $1,000 a person puts in); and to provide a "100% tax credit for tuition up to $3,000." They want a "broadband tax credit" for Internet access in "rural and underserved" areas.

They call for a 50 percent tax credit for employee health insurance paid for by small businesses, as their solution to the health-care crisis. Needless to say, they love the tax credit for ethanol production and want to expand it for local ethanol producers. And -- my favorite -- they want a tax credit to cover the administrative costs of encouraging employers "to offer their employees the option to convert their retirement plan into an annuity when they retire." I don't know what that last one is about, but I smell an interested party. It's just not the kind of thing thought up by anyone who doesn't have some skin in the game.

Democrats call for ending the "Disabled Veterans' Tax" and the "Military Families' Tax." The what? There cannot be any such thing as a Disabled Veterans' Tax. It is a label dreamed up by people wanting special treatment, like the Republicans' brilliant "death tax" for the estate tax. Maybe they deserve it, maybe they don't. But why can't we leave this bullying-by-terminology to Newt Gingrich?

The problem with tax credits in general is that they never appear in the budget, so they never get the same scrutiny as direct spending, although their impact on the deficit is exactly the same. By definition, they cost more than whatever benefit they are intended to achieve, since no one is going to be induced to spend an extra dollar on, say, dance lessons (because some member of Congress has decided that it would be good for the country if more people knew how to dance) unless the subsidy is worth more than a dollar.

Tax subsidies often go to person X to help person Y (e.g., to a corporation to help its employees), and person X gets a slice of the benefit -- often a big slice. And the distributional consequences are rarely examined. For example, tax credits constitute only one of several subsidies the Democrats propose for college education. Why should a young person who is out working and paying taxes subsidize someone in college who will soon be better off, if he or she isn't already?

Fairness is one of the three qualities that need to be restored to American public life after six years of George W. Bush and 12 years of French-Revolution-turned-French-farce on Capitol Hill. The other two are honesty and competence.

Honesty is not just therapeutic. Fiscal honesty is a practical necessity. "New Direction" quite rightly denounces the staggering fiscal irresponsibility of Republican leaders and duly promises "Pay As You Go" spending. But in the entire document there is not one explicit revenue-raiser to balance the many specific and enormous new spending programs and tax credits.

Competence, of course, brings us back to Iraq. Apparently and unfortunately, President Bush is right that the Democrats have no "plan for victory." (Neither does he, of course. Nor, for that matter, do I. But I don't claim to have one. And I didn't start it.) For national security in general, the Democrats' plan is so according-to-type that you cringe with embarrassment: It's mostly about new cash benefits for veterans. Regarding Iraq specifically, the Democrats' plan has two parts. First, they want Iraqis to take on "primary responsibility for securing and governing their country." Then they want "responsible redeployment" (great euphemism) of American forces.

DOJ_NMG_0091552

Older readers may recognize this formula. It's Vietnamization -- the Nixon-Kissinger plan for extracting us from a previous mistake. But Vietnamization was not a plan for victory. It was a plan for what was called "peace with honor" and is now known as "defeat."

Maybe "A New Direction for America" is just a campaign document -- although it seems to have had no effect at all on the campaign. My fear is that the House Democrats might try to use it as a basis for governing.

The True Ideological Battle By ARTHUR C. BROOKS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

In their 2004 book, "The Right Nation," John Micklethwait and Adrian Wooldridge chronicle America's rightward tilt. "If American politics is a seesaw, it is an unevenly balanced one. Imagine Dennis Hastert at one end of the seesaw and Nancy Pelosi on the other end, and you have some idea about which party is sitting with its legs dangling in the air. In the war between two Americas, Hastertland has been winning."

Until today, that is. This midterm election, in the view of many optimistic liberals, will be a forceful repudiation of the inevitability of American conservatism. A victory after so many years of losses will mark the beginning of the end to the country's nightmarish reactionary drift. According to Howard Dean, "The American people are fed up and want to change course. Democrats are offering the American people a new direction." But will it really be the dawn of a new day for the American left? After a cold look at the evidence, liberals might decide to take the champagne off the ice. The victory, assuming there is one, will hardly be glorious, and long-term trends are still distinctly right wing.

Some doomsday scenarios envision a 45-seat shift in the House of Representatives and a substantial Democratic majority in the Senate. These predictions, when looking at the actual data, are probably unrealistic. My colleague Danny Hayes, a political scientist who studies polling, says that the most reasonable picture has the Democrats winning 20-30 seats and taking narrow control of the House, while failing to win the Senate. This assessment is consistent with what most mainstream pollsters are predicting.

No bloodbath -- but still major progress for the left, right? Not really. We are in the midst of a deeply unpopular war, and an electorate in a foul mood. A Washington Post-ABC News poll last week found that more than 30% of likely voters planned to cast their ballots on Nov. 7 for Democrats specifically as a sign of opposition to George Bush. Congressional Republicans are hardly helping their own cause, between corruption and sexual misconduct. And the Republican Congress has so alienated authentic conservative voters with its porky profligacy that lots of Republicans will probably stay home.

By all rights, the Republicans left in Congress after this election should be able to pool to work in one minivan. Instead, they are probably facing a 10% setback in House seats -- hardly a disaster by midterm election standards. What's more, many of the Democrats at the vanguard of today's political "revolution" are not exactly left-wing zealots. Robert Casey, who leads incumbent Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, opposes abortion rights. On issues of gun control and immigration, Senate candidate Harold Ford of Tennessee sounds like a Republican. James Webb, who seeks to unseat Virginia Sen. George Allen, actually used to be a Republican. The lesson is that Democrats can win modestly if the Republicans implode, and preferably if they look more or less like Republicans. This is hardly a mythic victory for the American left; indeed, the larger cultural picture -- in which the election is but a minor political datum -- remains strikingly bleak for American liberalism.

Consider the effect of religious faith, which endures as the most important cultural fault line. On the whole, America is fundamentally religious, with 85% of people expressing allegiance to an organized faith and a third attending a house of worship weekly. Secularism is an exotic taste -- except on the political left. According to the General Social Survey, liberals are a third less likely than the rest of the population to worship regularly, and less than half as likely as conservatives. The percentage of self-described liberals who say they have "no religion" has more than doubled since the early '70s.

This cultural trend represents a growing political liability for the left. Only about one in four Americans currently say they believe that the Democratic Party is friendly toward religion, according to the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. The practical impact of this belief is nicely described by author Stephen Carter in his book, "The Dissent of the Governed." He describes two black evangelical women who change their affiliations from liberal political groups to conservative Christian organizations, explaining that "they preferred a place that honored their faith and disdained their politics over a place that honored their politics and disdained their faith." These women are part of a real trend among religious Americans: According to the National Election Surveys, religious Democrats are more likely than any other group to change their party affiliation. Between 2000 and 2002, they were nearly four times more likely to do so than secular Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0091553

There's certainly more to ideology than faith, of course. Another major cultural force is immigration, which -- as liberals hope and conservatives fear -- has the power to counteract the conservatizing effects of religion. "Today we march, tomorrow we vote," was the slogan chanted earlier this year by Latinos demonstrating in the streets against Republican-led immigration crackdowns. The warning made the blood of many conservatives run cold. It shouldn't have; the political mobilization of Latinos may actually expand the cultural dominance of the American right. According to the Social Capital Community Benchmark Survey in 2000, while American Latinos are about as likely as non-Latinos to say they are politically conservative, those not (yet) registered to vote are significantly more conservative than both voting Latinos and the population at large. In other words, a growing, more politically active Latino U.S. probably means a more conservative U.S. as well.

This counterintuitive fact is good news for the cultural right. But can Republicans capitalize politically on this pattern? Some doubt it, given the party's perceived hostility to immigration and apparent willingness to overlook the racial insensitivity of Sen. George Allen's "macaca" remark about an Indian-American man at a recent campaign event.

So much for religious folks and immigrants. What about young people? Maybe the left can, like it always has, look to the culture of youth to jumpstart the progressive movement. But even here, things are going conservatives' way. The left's traditional edge among young adults shrank from 1974 to 2004, as the percentage of adults 18-25 who labeled themselves political liberals fell by 12%, and the percentage saying they were conservative rose by 143%.

Waning youth support for the left may be partly due to the adroitness of conservative causes. But it probably also has to do with liberal inability or unwillingness to build an authentic youth grass-roots movement. A new and hotly debated book by Columbia University sociologist Dana Fisher documents the fact that most liberal political groups have dismantled their grassroots operations since the mid-'90s and subcontracted their activism to a small group of for-profit and nonprofit companies. In other words, the Republican canvasser at your door is a volunteer and true believer. But the kid asking for your signature and contribution for the local Democratic Party is probably a paid employee. This may be evidence that the left can no longer build grass-roots support to maintain itself, or that it has cut corners and sent its support-building mechanisms ideologically offshore. Either way, it bodes ill for progressive causes.

These are just three examples of the cultural patterns that continue to strengthen the right in America. Many more can be found in fertility patterns, the effects of education, and elsewhere. They tell us that conservatives have much to smile about, no matter what happens today at the polls. Reasonable people will disagree as to whether this is grounds for celebration or a call to fight. Either way, however, it is undeniable that the true ideological battle in America goes far deeper than a midterm election.

Mr. Brooks, a professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is the author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism," to be published this month by Basic Books.

Identity Crisis (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

One verdict from the 2006 election was obvious before a single vote had been counted: The Republican Party no longer has a coherent governing philosophy. Republicans who care about advancing a consistent set of ideals are already at each other's throats and are likely to stay there. True, most Republicans still describe themselves as "conservative." But it is no longer clear what that word means.

When they have nothing else to say, Republicans will always accuse Democrats of harboring secret plans to raise taxes. But the tax issue just sits out there, unhinged from any logical approach to how revenue and spending should fit together in a sensible budget.

Then there is Iraq. Republican foreign policy realists saw the war as a disaster going in. Neoconservatives who supported the invasion increasingly blame the Bush administration for botching the job. The administration's approach to Iraq is an orphan -- only President Bush and his closest advisers claim it as their own.

DOJ_NMG_0091554

That is why we can know how Republicans and conservatives will spend the last two years of the Bush presidency. They will fault philosophical adversaries for what went wrong, purge various actors and ideas from the movement, and insist on contradictory forms of ideological purity. My God, they'll sound like Democrats, won't they?

At the beginning of the 2006 campaign, the most popular charge in punditry was that Democrats were going to the voters with "no ideas." As the election closes, it's clear that the Republicans won the "no ideas" contest. In race after race, they tried to win by saying how horrific their Democratic opponents were -- and, in many cases, Republicans started touting their own independence from Bush. The Republicans have no coherence on immigration; no plausible plans for fixing the mess in Iraq; and little to say about economic insecurity, health care or the budget.

The lesson of 2006 is that the past five years have aggravated every contradiction on the right to the breaking point: religious conservatives against libertarians; neoconservatives against foreign policy realists; pro-immigration conservatives against immigration critics; big business against working-class conservatives; compassionate conservatives against . . . hmm, how do you describe the other side on that one?

In Congress, conservatives who voted for big budget deficits now blame figures such as Tom DeLay for forcing them to do it. Some Republicans who condemn the cost of the prescription drug benefit under Medicare were once happy to brag about it to seniors. Incumbents attack congressional "earmarks" for special spending projects, all the while boasting at home about the bacon they've put on their constituents' tables.

Add to all this the remarkable display of backstabbing among House Republican leaders over who did or didn't do what (and when) about the Mark Foley scandal. Political solidarity is not much of a value anymore in the Republican family.

That is why the most interesting battles over the next two years could take place not between the parties but within them. After a miserable year, Republicans have a lot of scores to settle. And conservatives, many of whom know they've lost their way, will be devoting a lot of energy to figuring out exactly who they are.

Repeat Calls Spur A Debate Over Tactics (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Karyn Hollis, an English professor at Villanova University outside Philadelphia, said the same computerized calls had been ringing her telephone as often as five times a day for more than a week.

They all start with a simple, if somewhat ambiguous, statement: “Hello, I’m calling with information about Lois Murphy,” a Pennsylvania Democrat who is the challenger in one of the hottest House races. That opening sounds “kind of positive in tone,” Ms. Hollis said. But the message quickly turns negative, blasting Ms. Murphy’s political views. After she hangs up, the phone rings again later with the same message. And again. And again.

The calls are part of a telephone blitz that the Republican Party has unleashed in several dozen races that are likely to determine control of the House in Tuesday’s elections. And the repeat calls to the same homes have set off a new furor over campaign tactics, with the Democrats claiming the calls violate federal communications rules and are tantamount to harassment.

Ms. Murphy and other Democrats say they have been flooded with complaints from irritated voters who think that the calls are coming from the candidates themselves. Many of the voters had hung up before the message was over, and never heard that it was produced by the Republican Party.

Democratic leaders contend that the messages violate federal rules that require groups making automated calls to identify themselves at the outset. And the National Republican Congressional Committee, which has financed the calls, agreed on Sunday to quit making some of them in New Hampshire, where a state law limits who can receive computerized phone messages.

Ed Patru, a committee spokesman, said the phone campaign complied with federal law and was “drawing contrasts” between the candidates. “There’s no statutory requirement that our phone calls be complimentary to Democrats,” Mr. Patru added.

Federal filings indicate that the committee has spent about $2 million on phone calls in the last week.

DOJ_NMG_0091555

But Democratic officials say they fear the saturation calling is just a tactic to irritate voters and discourage them from going to the polls.

"Make no mistake about it," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat who is leading his party's effort to retake the House. "This is a dirty trick, one they have pulled before, one they have gotten caught on, and they are still doing it."

Mr. Emanuel was referring to past fights over last-minute phone campaigns, particularly in New Hampshire, where three Republican officials were convicted of campaign violations stemming from an effort in 2002 to jam phone lines used by the Democratic Party to get out the vote.

Complaints about the recent Republican calls first surfaced about a week ago in a smattering of states. Rozanne Ronen, who lives in a Chicago suburb, said she had gotten more than 20 of the calls, all relating to the same House race. "To me, it's just harassment," she said.

New York Democratic Party officials complained Monday that the calls also had been made on Sunday and Monday to voters in four hotly contested House districts.

The Democrats say that a few calls have been made in the early morning or middle of night, and that some voters received several calls minutes apart. Republican officials said that would have happened only if there was a computer glitch.

Others, like Ms. Hollis, the Villanova professor, say they have filed complaints with the Federal Communications Commission. Its rules on automated calls require that callers state their identity at the beginning of the message. These calls end with a disclaimer that they were paid for by the Republican committee; no identification is made at the start of the message.

Political messages are exempt from the federal do-not-call rules meant to discourage unwanted sales pitches. But a New Hampshire law prohibits making automated calls to people who are on the do-not-call list. The Republican committee agreed on Sunday to halt calls there at the urging of the state attorney general.

David Kaplan, a registered Republican in Connecticut who has received more than two dozen of the calls, said he was so annoyed that the Republicans might "have shot themselves in the leg" in terms of winning his vote.

It's A Candidate Calling. Again. (WP)

By Charles Babington And Alec MacGillis

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

This year's heavy volume of automated political phone calls has infuriated countless voters and triggered sharp complaints from Democrats, who say the Republican Party has crossed the line in bombarding households with recorded attacks on candidates in tight House races nationwide.

Some voters, sick of interrupted dinners and evenings, say they will punish the offending parties by opposing them in today's elections. But critics say Republicans crafted the messages to delude voters -- especially those who hang up quickly -- into thinking that Democrats placed the calls.

Republicans denied the allegation, noting that their party acknowledges its authorship at the recorded calls' end. After citizens' complaints in New Hampshire, however, the National Republican Congressional Committee agreed to end the calls to households on the federal do-not-call list, even though the law exempts political messages from such restrictions.

Whether "robo-calls" are positive or negative, mean-spirited or humorous, thousands of Americans are sick of them, according to campaign organizations that have been fielding complaints over the past two weeks.

An Ohio woman, who did not leave her name, called The Washington Post in tears yesterday, saying she could not keep her phone line open to hospice workers caring for her terminally ill mother because of nonstop political robo-calls.

Pamela Lorenz, a retired nurse in Roseville, Calif., called her own experience "harassment as far as I'm concerned" and said, "If I were voting right now, the opponent who's doing this, he'd be off my list for throwing that much trash."

Hour after hour and day after day for two weeks, Lorenz's home has received the same NRCC recorded message attacking Charlie Brown, the Democrat who is challenging Rep. John T. Doolittle (R) in a hard-fought battle in northeastern California. "It is a recorder calling," Lorenz said. "I can't call it back to get them to stop."

DOJ_NMG_0091556

Voters in Northern Virginia have been exposed to fewer of the aggressive "push poll" type calls than elsewhere. But they said they have been getting so many of the conventional automated calls plugging candidates that they have started hanging up as soon as the recordings begin or screening them with caller ID.

"I hang up as soon I hear it start. I've already heard most of what people have to say. I don't have time to listen to them," said Angela Elliott, a Fairfax Circle resident who is registered as an independent and has been getting more Democratic calls than Republican ones.

Nicholas Beltrante, of the Alexandria section of Fairfax County, said he has been getting an average of three to five automated calls per day from both Democrats and Republicans. "I made up my mind weeks ago, and the moment I identify them as one of those calls I just hang up," he said.

As annoyed as they are, Northern Virginia voters said their irritation will not prompt them to vote against the campaigns placing the calls, because the calls are positive in nature.

Jane Edmondson, a McLean community activist, registered Democrat and Democratic donor, said she has stopped answering calls that appear as 800 or 877 numbers on her caller ID, for fear that they are robo-calls. At church Sunday, she said, she and others were jealous of one churchgoer who said his caller ID identifies campaign calls as "political calls." "We all said, 'Why don't we get that?' " she said.

Democrats cited federal records indicating that the NRCC recently spent about $600,000 in at least 45 contested House districts for robo-calls, which are among the least expensive campaign tools. The brief calls typically begin with a speaker offering "some information" about the Democratic nominee and then immediately accusing the nominee of seeking to raise taxes, among other perceived wrongs.

Many voters hang up as soon as a robo-call begins -- without waiting for the criticisms or the NRCC sign-off at the end -- so they think it was placed by the Democratic candidate named at the start, said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Our candidates are inundated with phone calls from furious Democrats and independents saying . . . 'I'm outraged and I'm not going to vote for you anymore,' " she said.

Feinberg said some voters have received robo-calls late at night, despite federal rules barring such calls after 9 p.m. NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said his organization ends all calls by 9 nightly.

Democrats also cited Federal Communications Commission guidelines saying the originators of automated calls must identify themselves at the beginning of each call. Republican Party lawyers, however, said the requirement does not apply to political nonprofit organizations. They rebuffed a "cease and desist" letter sent yesterday by the DCCC.

In a conference call with reporters yesterday, the DCCC chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), compared the widespread robo-calling to a 2002 Republican effort in New Hampshire to jam Democratic phone lines to prevent the Democrats' get-out-the-vote effort. The Republican National Committee has spent more than $2 million to defend its officials in the case, he said. "Make no mistake, this is a dirty trick, one they've done before, one they've gotten caught on and one they continue to do," Emanuel said.

Karyn Hollis, a Villanova University English professor who supports Democrat Lois Murphy in her bid to oust Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.), said she has received numerous robo-calls attacking Murphy. "You just get sick of these calls," Hollis said. A quick hang-up can lead the recipient to conclude that Murphy supporters placed the call, she said. Listening to the full message, she said, subjects the voter to a litany of attacks against Murphy.

"It's a double thing," Hollis said. "Either way they win."

Many robo-calls involve celebrities and are positive and straightforward, such as recordings from former president Bill Clinton urging voters to support Democratic nominees. In New Jersey, comic actor Joe Piscopo has recorded messages on behalf of GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr.

In Connecticut, NRCC robo-calls have targeted Dianne Farrell, the Democrat seeking to unseat Rep. Christopher Shays (R). Asked if Farrell has her own automated calls, campaign spokeswoman Jan Ellen Spiegel replied: "Only one, and it's rather distinctive because it's Paul Newman. We haven't gotten complaints about that one."

Exit-Poll Secrecy Measures Aim To Plug Leaks To Blogs By AMY SCHATZ (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0091557

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Two-by-two, polling specialists from ABC, CBS, NBC, CNN, Fox News and the Associated Press will go into rooms in New York and Washington shortly before noon Tuesday. Their cellphones and BlackBerrys will be confiscated; proctors will monitor the doors; and for the next five hours, these experts will pore over exit-poll data from across the country.

If all goes well, only when they emerge from their cloisters will the legions of ravenous political bloggers have any chance of getting their hands on the earliest indication of which party will end up controlling Congress.

"The demand for info is intense, and if the safeguards aren't steel doors bolting people inside a room, it will get out," says Marc Ambinder, associate editor of National Journal's Hotline OnCall. "The insatiable appetite for this info will overwhelm the ability to keep it secret."

The extraordinary security is a result of mix-ups that prompted grumbling about the accuracy of exit polls after the 2004 presidential election: Bloggers posted data from early exit polls, incorrectly calling some states for Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry and indicating that he would unseat President Bush.

This year, media executives figure the secret will keep less than half an hour. "Based on past experience, I expect that I'll have exit-poll data soon after it's released from multiple sources," Taegan Goddard of the newsy independent blog Political Wire1 says in an email.

Exit polls will be available for all the key Senate races, giving an early picture of whether it could flip to the Democrats. House races won't be available, although clues in statewide data for states with lots of close races, such as Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut and Indiana, will provide a sense of what the broader outcome might be.

The data are collected through the National Election Pool, a consortium made up of the three traditional networks, CNN, Fox News and the AP. NEP's members decide which questions are asked and set the rules for the data's release.

Only consortium members get all of the data, including state breakdowns. Other media outlets -- but not bloggers or political parties -- may purchase the data, on a sliding cost scale. A state report can cost anywhere from $1,000 to $5,400, depending on the size of the news organization. A week after the election, all of the data can be purchased by academics, political parties and others for $10,000.

ELECTION 2006

• Election Quiz:2 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com3, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video4 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20065.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

6 • Review the results of the latest polls7 in hot Senate races.

• The Senate's Uncertain States:8 Interactive profiles.

• Battlegrounds Poll:9 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

10 • Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers11

• Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts12

News organizations use exit polls to give them an early sense of the electorate's mood to shape and guide coverage later that night when the real results come in. As the data become more complete throughout the day, NEP and news organizations use them to project winners when the polls close. TV news anchors know the results, but are honor-bound not to disclose them until the polls close in the individual states. Sometimes, however, they can't resist alluding to some results with broad statements about the mood of the electorate.

Poll results are for internal use for the most part, but are generally the worst-kept secret in the news business. On Election Day, exit polls are the coin of the realm in Washington, and some reporters and editors can't resist sharing top-line data among themselves and with political operatives. Consequently, the information can reach bloggers from any number of sources.

Mainstream news organizations know that bloggers will eventually get their hands on the exit-poll data, but their goal is to delay it as long as possible because the accuracy of the data improves as the day goes on.

DOJ_NMG_0091558

In previous years, numbers were made available to the news organizations in waves via secure Web sites. In 2004, the first wave of data went out around 2 p.m. and quickly leaked onto the Internet. That's what brought about this year's sequestering of the news organization's representatives. The only communication they'll be allowed to make out of the so-called quarantine rooms before 5 p.m. will be to warn their new organizations about potential problems in the data. (In 2000, faulty polling prompted some networks to incorrectly call Florida in favor of Al Gore.) Those messages will be monitored by representatives of the polling firm NEP has contracted with.

Consequently, for much of Tuesday, bloggers will likely be chattering mostly about secondary issues, such as voter turnout and problems with new electronic voting machines.

But at 5 p.m., waves of exit-poll data will begin flowing to newsrooms via limited-access Web sites. For the bloggers, the scramble will be on to get the data first, hoping for an email from a friendly source.

"People need to realize those numbers aren't the real results," says David Bohrman, vice president of news and production at CNN's Washington bureau, who urges people to be cautious when interpreting poll results. "They show why people voted today, and what was on their minds. The only real way to figure out who won is to count the votes."

Mark Blumenthal, a Democratic pollster known as the "Mystery Pollster" on Pollster.com13, which tries to explain the mechanics behind polls, agrees. Exit polls are "still a sample," he says. "Don't get all excited about it." In 2004, Mr. Blumenthal posted a warning in the morning about the vagaries of exit polling data and says he'll post another Tuesday. "You learn the hard way that a one- or two-point lead on a leaked exit poll is meaningless," he says.

Mr. Ambinder of Hotline OnCall14, the free, wonky blog updated by National Journal's political reporters, says editors there have vowed not to post any exiting-polling data. They say that the less they post while polls are open the better. "If a header in my inbox says 'exit poll,' I'm going to try to resist the temptation to open it," he says.

Throughout the day, a lot of unreliable numbers on exit polling will be flying around in emails, predicts Jacob Weisberg, editor of online magazine Slate, which published early exit-polling data in 2004. If Slate receives exit-polling data from a reliable source in the media it will publish them again, Mr. Weisberg says, although he doesn't know if they'll be very meaningful. "When elections are really close, exit polls aren't that reliable."

"I'll post it with the caveat that it was all crap last time and will probably be crap again," says Glenn Reynolds of Instapundit.com15, a conservative-leaning blog, who will be doing interviews for CNN via a Webcam from his Knoxville, Tenn., home.

Unreliable or not, for many bloggers exit polls are just too juicy to ignore. "Basically, yeah, we'll run everything we get the second we get it," says Alex Pareene of the irreverent Washington blog Wonkette16. "Give the people what they want."

Early Night For Poll Watchers? (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

No matter who triumphs today -- Election Day -- supporters of both political parties and will have something to be happy about: They probably will not have to stay up too late to know which way the midterm elections are heading.

"The key races in Congress are concentrated in the Eastern and Central time zones, so we ought to have a good sense of the trend relatively early in the evening," said Amy Walter of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

In the Senate, Democrats would have to gain six seats to win a majority, and all but one of the most competitive races are in states in the East or Midwest: Virginia, Tennessee, Missouri, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Ohio and Maryland. The single nail-biter farther west is in Montana.

Most tossup House races are also clustered in states east of the Mississippi River. By watching the fate of Republican candidates in Connecticut, New York, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio, political enthusiasts will have a good idea whether Democrats will win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House, analysts say.

That is, of course, if everything goes smoothly. And things rarely do. Uncertainties about electronic voting machines and hassles over identifying registered voters could make early predictions about the election precarious.

Nonetheless, there will be plenty of guessing as the night goes on.

DOJ_NMG_0091559

Broadcast networks plan to confine their reports to a single hour starting at 10 p.m. Eastern time, hosted by their national news anchors. ABC will also feature the midterm elections on "Nightline" from 11:30 p.m. to midnight. In addition, the broadcast channels will do live cut-ins throughout the evening when major results become known.

Political junkies will demand a lot more information than that. For them, cable news channels and Web sites will fill in the gaps.

The cable channels are scheduled to provide their usual blanket coverage all evening and into the wee hours. This year, in addition, the Web versions of most major publications and news outlets will constantly update their online election results. Cyber surfers will be able to pop onto a wide variety of Web sites as often as they want and track every tick of the electoral totals.

"If you wake up at 3 a.m. in a cold sweat, you can go to your computer for the latest results," said Rajiv Chandrasekaran, The Washington Post's assistant managing editor for continuous news. "People can also wake up first thing in the morning and do the same thing."

For people who want their beauty rest, however, a few contests with early poll closings can be seen as harbingers of things to come. As Kentucky and Indiana go, analysts say, so will go the House. And the good news: The polls in both states will close by 7 p.m. Eastern time.

Nathan L. Gonzales of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report recommends looking at Kentucky in particular. If Rep. Geoff Davis (R) is defeated by former representative Ken Lucas (D), Gonzales said, "the GOP is in serious jeopardy." If Reps. Anne M. Northup and Ron Lewis, both Republicans, also lose, Republican losses in the House could be sizable, he added.

Another bellwether is Indiana. Three Republican congressmen face tough reelection fights there: John N. Hostettler, Chris Chocola and Michael E. Sodrel. Hostettler has been all but given up for lost. But if Chocola, Sodrel or both also go down, the Republican majority in the House will probably fall with them, analysts agree.

Walter of the Cook Political Report sees the electoral fate of Sodrel, a freshman who is facing former representative Baron Hill (D) for the third time, as one of the nation's best predictors of the partisan direction of the House.

"If a Democratic tsunami is hitting, Republicans could realistically lose the majority before the polls close in the 8 p.m. states," such as Pennsylvania, Gonzales said. "But if Republicans can escape these early states down by only three or four seats, it should be considered a moral victory."

The Cook Report lists nine Senate races as tossups, and Gonzales of the Rothenberg Report names two of them as the ones to watch.

Sen. James M. Talent (R-Mo.) is in a neck-and-neck battle with Missouri state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D). And in Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) is nip and tuck with Democrat James Webb. "If Talent loses, the GOP majority is in serious jeopardy [in the Senate]," Gonzales said. "And it's gone completely if Allen loses."

Check Indiana For A Preview (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

For an early glimpse of how election night will unfold, strategists of both parties have their eyes fixed on Indiana.

Yes, Indiana is home to three of the most competitive House races in the nation. But it is the 6 p.m. Eastern closing time for a majority of the state's polling places that is most intriguing to Republicans and Democrats.

Both parties are eager to seize on early indicators for how the counting will play out. The first sign of a Republican wave in 1994 came when Representative Jill Long, a Democrat, lost her Third District seat early in the evening to Mark Souder. While Mr. Souder is expected to win re-election this time, three Hoosier colleagues — Chris Chocola, John Hostettler and Mike Sodrel — face uphill battles.

Many competitive races are in states in the Eastern time zone. But polls in Ohio close at 7:30 p.m.; those in Connecticut and Pennsylvania stay open until 8, and New York's till 9.

That leaves Indiana as a preview to the evening's suspense, at least in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0091560

For the too-close-to-call Senate races, Virginia could be the one to watch, with polls closing at 7 p.m., followed by Maryland and Missouri at 8, Rhode Island at 9 and Montana at 10. These times, which will be carefully watched by the networks, have been converted to Eastern.

Gore Headlines Maryland Campaign Event (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

SILVER SPRING, Md. (AP) -- Former Vice President Al Gore made an election-eve visit to Maryland Monday, joining Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley and Senate candidate Ben Cardin at a get-out-the-vote rally at a Montgomery County retirement community.

Gore was the only national heavyweight from either party to campaign in the state on a day when Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich wound up his campaign with a rally near his boyhood home in Baltimore County and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the party's Senate nominee, continued what his campaign described as an around-the-clock campaign tour that he had started on Sunday.

With the outlook uncertain in both top-of-the-ticket races, the candidates and their surrogates scratched for every possible vote in the final hours of the campaign.

Volunteers called potential voters from phone banks run by the campaigns and the state Democratic and Republican parties, and the four candidates -- plus Republican lieutenant governor candidate Kristen Cox and Anthony Brown, O'Malley's running mate -- hurried from one stop to the other shaking hands, holding rallies and encouraging volunteers to work harder.

Gore's appearance at Leisure World attracted an overflow crowd of more than 300 to hear the former vice president and a host of Maryland Democratic officials, including O'Malley, Cardin attorney general candidate Doug Gansler and comptroller nominee Peter Franchot.

Gore spoke of the importance of the Cardin-Steele race to Democratic hopes of regaining control of the U.S. Senate.

"It may come down to right here," he said.

Congress has abdicated its responsibility to hold President Bush accountable for his failures, and a Democratic House and Senate are needed to ask the tough questions Republican leaders are not asking, Gore said.

He said Baltimore under O'Malley has had "the most competent, most cutting edge ... administration of any city in the country."

"Please don't take anything for granted. These are close races," Gore said.

Ehrlich returned to southwestern Baltimore County to end his campaign at a rally in the heart of Arbutus, where campaign commercials played on a giant screen and supporters chanted "four more years."

The Republican governor spoke from the back of a tow truck decorated with a dozen Maryland flags. He was joined by two Democrats, former Gov. Marvin Mandel and Baltimore City Councilman Nicholas D'Adamo.

"We have a record of accomplishment in this government and we haven't whined. People expect leadership, and that's what we've done," Ehrlich said.

Steele began an around-the-clock campaign schedule on Sunday, pausing only 45 minutes overnight for a nap, said Doug Heye, a campaign spokesman. The lieutenant governor toured coffee shops, grocery stores and went bowling. He also met with a group of ministers and, late in the day, shook hands with commuters getting off a train from Washington.

Cardin said at the Gore rally that the nation is moving in the wrong direction and a Democratic Senate and House are needed to set a new course.

"This election is about what type of country do we want to leave to our children and grandchildren," he told an audience of mostly older residents at the retirement community.

O'Malley criticized what he said were negative campaign commercials by the governor, drawing laughter from the crowd when he said, "Thank goodness, we won't see them on TV in 24 hours."

Gore Stumps For Cardin; Pastors Endorse Steele (WT)

By Jon Ward And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

DOJ_NMG_0091561

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Former Vice President Al Gore campaigned yesterday with Maryland's Democratic candidates for the U.S. Senate and governor -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, respectively -- closing out the party's effort to hold off strong Republican campaigns.

Meanwhile, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele crisscrossed the state on a nonstop bus tour and received last-minute endorsements for his U.S. Senate campaign from the pastors of two Prince George's County's black megachurches. And Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. campaigned for re-election in Baltimore County, ending the day with a rally in his hometown of Arbutus.

Today's elections in Maryland could help decide whether Republicans will retain control of Congress and whether the Democrats maintain their dominance in state politics. Recent polls for the Senate and gubernatorial contests show that both are dead heats.

Polls open at 7 a.m. and close at 8 p.m.

Maryland elections also will test whether officials have fixed glitches in the state's electronic voting system that caused delays and confusion during September's primary elections.

The final results of close contests might not be known until late this week or next week, because voters have requested nearly 200,000 absentee ballots, which elections officials will begin counting Thursday.

An Anne Arundel County judge late yesterday denied a request by the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups to extend the deadline for voters to postmark absentee ballots. The ACLU filed a last-minute lawsuit, saying that some voters didn't receive their ballots in time to meet the deadline.

"If anybody tells you that one vote doesn't matter, tell them to come and talk to me," Mr. Gore said during a rally at Leisure World, a retirement community in Aspen Hill that is the state's largest voter precinct. "It matters more than perhaps it ever has."

Mr. Gore, who lost the 2000 presidential election to President Bush after weeks of recounts in Florida, said Mr. Cardin's contest with Mr. Steele "is going to be looked at all across the nation."

"This is about more than a Senate seat in Maryland," said Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore. "It's about taking back our country."

Mr. O'Malley called the Ehrlich administration a "detour" in the state's progress.

"In just 24 hours, we will be making a very important decision about whether we are a state that moves forward," he said.

In Landover, Mr. Steele stood with several black clergymen and received an endorsement from the Rev. Joel Peebles of Jericho City of Praise in Landover -- one of the largest churches in the state, with about 15,000 members and a weekly attendance of about 7,500.

Mr. Peebles said Mr. Steele "is the right person for the right job for the U.S. Senate seat."

Mr. Steele said that Bishop Anthony G. Maclin of the Sanctuary at Kingdom Square in Capitol Heights "is standing with us," even though Mr. Maclin did not attend the press conference. Mr. Maclin's church has a weekly attendance of about 2,000.

"I am ready to take that seat in the United States Senate," said Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

In the gubernatorial race, Mr. Ehrlich held a late-afternoon "countdown to victory rally" in his hometown of Arbutus, a blue-collar town in southwestern Baltimore County.

"We have a lot of Democrats here," said Mr. Ehrlich, who was joined on stage by former Democratic Gov. Marvin Mandel. "One Maryland -- Republican, Democrat, independent, Green -- it doesn't matter. Send a message to Annapolis: Stop the shenanigans."

Late yesterday, state Democrats decried a flier that depicts Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson, among other black Democrats, as supporting Mr. Steele and Mr. Ehrlich.

"I resent that my picture is being used in something that's not true," Mr. Johnson said. "Everyone knows I'm supporting the Democratic ticket."

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said the flier, which was sent to Prince George's residents, was "recognition of the bipartisan relationship that has existed between Governor Ehrlich and Prince George's County officials these past four years."

DOJ_NMG_0091562

The closeness of Maryland's races has befuddled national observers. Maryland is an overwhelmingly Democratic state, and the national mood is virulently anti-Republican.

Mr. Steele and Mr. Ehrlich have made inroads into the black community, which makes up about 30 percent of the state's Democratic Party.

Allen, Webb Cite Fate Of Senate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat James H. Webb Jr. yesterday urged Virginians to go to the polls, as they crisscrossed the state in their final full day of campaigning in a race that could determine control of the U.S. Senate.

The uncertainty of today's result was crystal clear yesterday, with the release of two competing polls -- one giving Mr. Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, an eight-point lead and the other showing Mr. Allen, a former governor and congressman, with a three-point lead.

Voters also will decide on a constitutional marriage amendment that is expected to drive turnout among conservatives in rural Virginia and more liberal voters who oppose the measure in Northern Virginia. Turnout is expected to be 65 percent of the state's 4.5 million registered voters.

Polls will open at 6 a.m. and close at 7 p.m. today.

As both candidates made stops in Richmond, Norfolk, Roanoke and Northern Virginia yesterday, they said voters have a chance to set the course of the nation.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican, ended his 10-month underdog campaign at a rally with former President Bill Clinton and more than 2,000 supporters in Old Town Alexandria.

"If you want America to take a different path, you to have to elect Jim Webb," Mr. Clinton said.

Mr. Clinton's visit prompted ridicule from Republicans who remember he lost in Virginia in 1992 and 1996 and that his last-minute visit for Lt. Gov. Donald S. Beyer in 1997 did not help the Democrat win the governor's race.

"You can tell a lot about someone by the folks they keep company with," Mr. Allen said in Norfolk, standing with Sen. John W. Warner, Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, Rep. Thelma Drake and former Redskins defensive end Deacon Jones.

"I'll stand with these patriots closer to Virginia values and virtues than the group that my opponent is standing with," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Webb also was joined on the trail by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, former Govs. Mark Warner and L. Douglas Wilder and Rep. Robert C. Scott.

"You will not lose me in terms of my loyalties," Mr. Webb told voters.

Mark Warner, a Democrat, didn't mind that Mr. Allen was criticizing Mr. Webb's friends.

"I'll take that comparison. I think the people of Virginia are pretty happy with the way we govern," he said.

Mr. Wilder agreed: "We're going to win an upset ... that will have the whole nation talking."

Mr. Allen also criticized Mr. Webb as a friend of liberal Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

That theme carried on at each stop, which also included a solemn message from John Warner that he and Mr. Allen make a "good team." It was the same plea he made in an appearance with Mr. Allen in a two-minute ad last night.

"He has 23 years of serving those in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and now six in the United States Senate and he needs no on-the-job training," John Warner said in Richmond, to cheers from about 75 people in the overflowing room at the airport.

Mr. Allen, a former college quarterback, tossed a football at each event and called his supporters "teammates." They responded: "Six more years."

"Your enthusiasm is invigorating," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0091563

A few hours earlier at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond, about 300 Webb supporters held signs and shouted, "Let's go Jim."

At that rally, at least one Webb voter ripped up a blue Allen sign. Another supporter held a sign that read: "Thanks, George Allen, for making me a Democrat."

Mr. Clinton simplified Republican campaign strategy as: Vote for me, "because my opponent is a slug, and they are going to tax you into the poorhouse, and on the way to the poorhouse, you'll meet a terrorist coming around the street corner, and when you try to run away from that terrorist, you are going to trip over an illegal immigrant."

Immigration, taxes and terrorism were an ongoing theme in Republican stump speeches.

"Republicans look at every day as Independence Day, they like it to be the Fourth of July," Mr. Allen said, paraphrasing President Reagan. "Democrats look at every day as April 15th."

The final days of each campaign showed a marked difference in mood.

Mr. Webb, criticized privately by Democrats for months for having a stiff style, seemed relaxed, enjoying himself and telling more jokes.

Mr. Allen, looking tired and showing weight loss, said with a big smile that the Gallup/USA Today poll released yesterday shows he has needed momentum in the final hours.

At their first debate in July, both candidates agreed that no matter the outcome they would sit down together for a beer when it was over.

By yesterday morning, the mood had soured.

"I don't think I will be drinking a beer with George Allen," Mr. Webb said. "I said I didn't want this to get personal, but I think he went too far."

When asked whether he still planned to get that beer, Mr. Allen shook his head, laughed and said flippantly: "Yeah, sure."

FBI Looks Into Voter Intimidation (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 7, 2006

The FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb.

Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate.

Jean R. Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office. The FBI is the investigative arm of the Justice Department.

Dee Rybiski, spokeswoman for the FBI here, declined comment.

Jensen said she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County.

Jensen said she later received a report from the Hampton registrar about a call to a voter there. That complaint came in response to an e-mail from Jensen to local registrars about possibly deceptive phone calls.

"Voters should not be intimidated or deceived by phone messages purporting to be from election officials," Jensen said in a written statement. "Any communication from federal, state or local election officials will always be in a written form clearly identifying the official source."

With published polls depicting the Allen-Webb race as a tossup, both sides are mobilizing lawyers and voting experts to watch for irregularities and prepare for a possible recount.

In a written statement issued by the Webb campaign, state Democratic Party counsel Jay B. Myerson suggested that Republicans are behind efforts to suppress votes for Webb.

"We've seen this tactic before, and it is about time the Republicans learned that it will not work," Myerson said.

Shawn M. Smith, executive director of the Virginia Republican Party, said the state GOP and Allen campaign are focusing on mobilizing votes for Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0091564

As for voter intimidation or suppression, Smith said: "We are not aware of any such activities taking place and are skeptical of the claims being made. Nonetheless, we condemn such activities if they are being conducted by outside organizations."

Lieberman Says Win Won't Be Debt To GOP (AP-Y)

By Andrew Miga

AP, November 7, 2006

Though Sen. Joe Lieberman expects to win a lot of Republican votes Tuesday, the Connecticut lawmaker said he won't feel especially beholden to the GOP if he is elected to a fourth term.

"I'll owe everybody and that's the point," Lieberman said Monday as he pressed for final votes at a senior center in Meriden.

Lieberman, whose Senate career was at risk just three months ago after he lost to anti-war challenger Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary, led Lamont by 12 percentage points in a statewide poll released Monday.

Lieberman is running as an independent and has enjoyed support from the GOP, including praise from the White House and fundraising help from prominent Republicans such as New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

But he said his comeback since the primary has convinced him that he needs to be a stronger independent voice.

"It's taken me as an independent-minded Democrat and really empowered me to be more independent," said Lieberman, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee. "Parties are important, but they're not as important as the public interest."

Potential gains by Democrats mean the Senate could end up in a 50-50 split, or something close to it. Republicans, who have already helped Lieberman's campaign, would likely court him in hopes of persuading him to switch parties.

Lieberman has pledged to remain a Democrat.

"At every occasion I'm going to try my best to build bridges instead of walls between people in both parties," he said.

Lamont, a Greenwich businessman and political newcomer who has spent $16 million of his own money, including a $2 million loan, on the race, gave a final speech at a union office in Hartford on Monday. He echoed the theme of change that he has used throughout the campaign.

"I say we have a lot of people who have been in Washington D.C., too long," Lamont said. "It's time to bring some new people down there who are going to shake up the way we do business."

Lieberman's independent bid rankled many Democrats who questioned his party loyalty. He has admitted to some bruised feelings about Democratic colleagues such as fellow Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, who endorsed him in the primary but is now backing Lamont.

"Well, we're all grown-ups," Lieberman said. "And the Senate is ultimately 100 people going to work in the same place every day and your ability to get things done depends on how well you get along with the other workers, so it will be fine."

A Fiery Warning Against Taking Risks (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

In a New Mexico district near the site of the first nuclear bomb test, Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican in a neck-and-neck race for re-election, has broadcast an incendiary television commercial against her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid. In the spot, images of fire mutate momentarily into floating fragments of text before dissolving again into flames: “North Korea conducts nuclear test. Reductions in military spending. The murder of any American anywhere on earth.” As a picture of the North Korean dictator, Kim Jong Il, gives way to an unflattering photo of Ms. Madrid, a narrator asks: “Can we trust her? With so much at stake? Does she have the experience we need? In a world like this, is she the one who will keep our families safe? Patricia Madrid. Don’t take the risk.”

Puppy Power: How Humane Society Gets The Vote Out Animal Welfare Is The Issue, Not The Candidate's Party; Loaded For Bear Hunters By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

DUBLIN, Calif. -- Wayne Pacelle marched up to a one-story house here last week, hoping to persuade the two Republicans inside to vote against incumbent Republican Rep. Richard Pombo.

DOJ_NMG_0091565

"Beware of dog," read a nearby sign as Mr. Pacelle knocked on the front door. Suddenly, a pit bull charged from inside the house. Mr. Pacelle stumbled backward. The dog slammed into the door. A screen was all that separated the growling beast from the chief executive officer of the Humane Society of the United States.

"I may be with the Humane Society, but I prefer little dogs when I'm canvassing," said the 41-year-old Mr. Pacelle. For Mr. Pacelle, the pit bull is just one snarling obstacle in his path toward transforming the nation's largest group of pet lovers into a ferocious force in congressional elections. Call it puppy power at the polls.

For the first time in its 50-year history, the Humane Society is trying to elect candidates to Congress who support its animal-welfare agenda. After a series of mergers with other animal-welfare groups, the Humane Society counts 10 million Americans as members, an average of 23,000 in each of the 435 House districts. That's more than twice the membership of the National Rifle Association, which is considered one of the most effective single-issue campaign organizations.

More important, the Humane Society's motivating issue -- the promotion of animal welfare -- resonates with the white suburban women who could be the key block of voters who decide this election.

The Humane Society isn't campaigning for just one political party. Sen. Rick Santorum, a Republican from Pennsylvania, won its support this year for championing federal funding for animal-protection programs. Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen was endorsed for introducing legislation to require bitter-tasting antifreeze to discourage pets from lapping up spills.

ELECTION 2006

• Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

5 • Review the results of the latest polls6 in hot Senate races.

• The Senate's Uncertain States:7 Interactive profiles.

• Battlegrounds Poll:8 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

9 • Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers10

• Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts11

In the House, the Humane Society is campaigning for several Republicans in close races, including Reps. John Sweeney of New York and Christopher Shays of Connecticut. Mr. Sweeney, who represents Saratoga's race track, pushed legislation through the House to ban the slaughter of horses for human consumption.

Among Republicans the Humane Society is targeting are Montana's Sen. Conrad Burns, who opposed Mr. Sweeney's horse-slaughter bill in the Senate, Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico and Mr. Pombo of California.

The Humane Society has endorsed more than 300 candidates for Congress. But it has spent money in just two dozen of the closest races where Mr. Pacelle believes he can swing about 5% of the vote.

"Animals are a part of the fabric of our culture, so it's inevitable that the organized network that protects animals would activate for political ends," Mr. Pacelle said in an interview. About two-thirds of households have pets. "We can be an incredibly influential political organization, as powerful as the Chamber of Commerce," Mr. Pacelle told a crowd of election volunteers in Las Vegas last week.

Carolyn Mathias, a lifelong Republican, learned from the Humane Society that the state's Republican governor, Bob Ehrlich, had approved the state's first bear hunt in 50 years. The Humane Society publicized the decision in television advertisements that featured graphic images of dead bears.

"I'm sure it must sound unusual for a Republican to suddenly not vote Republican based on one issue," Ms. Mathias says. "The way I look at this is that the bears have no political party."

It cuts both ways. When Mr. Pacelle knocked on doors in Las Vegas last week for Republican Sen. John Ensign, a veterinarian, all but one of the volunteers who accompanied him were Democratic women.

DOJ_NMG_0091566

Mr. Pacelle began creating the Humane Society political operation two years ago when he was named chief of the organization. Since then, he has quietly built a formidable election campaign machine. To comply with tax and election laws, Mr. Pacelle has created two offshoots of the Humane Society to focus on election campaigns. In total, the entities have spent $3.4 million on congressional elections and ballot initiatives, more than Exxon Mobil Corp. They have contributed $150,000 to candidates for Congress, which is more than Halliburton Co. has contributed.

The Humane Society has a long history of winning state ballot initiatives on issues ranging from banning cockfighting in Oklahoma to prohibiting hunting with steel-jawed leg traps in Colorado. This year, the Humane Society is battling the NRA over dove hunting in Michigan and big agriculture over the size of pigpens in Arizona.

The Humane Society first tested the waters in congressional elections in 2004 -- and then, in just one race. In that campaign, the group campaigned against Rep. Chris John in Louisiana when the Democrat ran for an open Senate seat against Republican Rep. David Vitter. Mr. John championed the state's legalized cockfighting industry, and the Humane Society didn't want to see him in the Senate.

Polls showed that nine in 10 women in Louisiana opposed cockfighting, so the Humane Society set about to tell 300,000 white female voters that Mr. John supported the practice. The group spent $400,000 on radio ads and mailings to get the message out. When Mr. Vitter won with 51% of the vote, the Humane Society knew it could be a force.

"If we could win in 'Sportsman's Paradise,' we can win anywhere," says Mr. Pacelle. A Yale graduate, Mr. Pacelle considered going to law school before dedicating his career to the protection of animals. Mr. Pacelle says he grew up with several pets and an "unusual interest in the welfare of animals." On his way to a recent news conference, Mr. Pacelle brought his fuel-efficient 2006 Toyota Prius to a halt to let a pigeon pass in front of him. "More than one million animals are killed each day by cars," he says. Divorced, Mr. Pacelle has no pets these days because, he says, he travels too much.

In the campaign's final days, the Humane Society focused on defeating Mr. Pombo, the California Republican who chairs the House Resources Committee. From that perch, Mr. Pombo has broad authority over environmental and agriculture legislation. The Humane Society backed Democratic candidate Jerry McNerney.

The Humane Society spent more than $100,000 on radio ads and $50,000 in mailings accusing Mr. Pombo of blocking legislation to promote animal welfare. A radio ad that aired last week accused Mr. Pombo of voting to "deny funding to crack down on the barbaric practices of dog fighting and cockfighting" and opposing legislation to outlaw the slaughter of American horses, "so the French can eat horse meat as a delicacy."

Such tactics "turned what might have been a snooze of a race into a nationally watched showdown," according to an Oakland Tribune article last week.

In Oakland last week, Mr. Pacelle embarked on his door-to-door canvassing tour dressed in tan khaki pants and a T-shirt that said "Get Political for Animals." After his encounter with the pit bull, Mr. Pacelle eyed a bumper sticker on a truck parked in a driveway: "Dog is my co-pilot," it read. "This is a good sign," Mr. Pacelle said, advancing to the door. In his typical pitch, Mr. Pacelle described Mr. Pombo as "so extreme he even actively supports commercial whaling."

A spokesman for Mr. Pombo predicted the Humane Society's effort would fail because voters would view the group as too extreme. "They are basically accusing members of Congress of clubbing baby seals and kicking puppies," said Brian Kennedy, the spokesman.

That sentiment was echoed by the Republican owners of the growling pit bull. Mr. Pacelle's speech about Mr. Pombo was cut off midsentence. "I don't think he kills dogs," the occupant said, shutting the door.

Mr. Pacelle fared better a few minutes later when he spotted a young couple getting into a black Ford Mustang. "She watches Animal Planet all the time," the man yelled as he drove away. "You've got our vote."

Social Security System Needs Bipartisan Solution (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Rather than fostering an environment for real solutions, your editorial is an example ("AARP's Tax Trap1," Review & Outlook, Nov. 1) of exactly what's wrong with the current debate over Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0091567

The AARP Voters' Guide asks candidates to respond to two questions on this issue. The first is whether they would support or oppose using Social Security to fund private accounts. Our opposition to this is simple: It adds unnecessary risk and trillions of dollars of debt to future generations, significantly compounding the solvency problem. In short, it is not a real solution, and an overwhelming majority of the American public opposes it for this very reason.

Our second question goes to the heart of the matter: Would the candidates support a balanced Social Security plan to continue guaranteed benefits for future generations? The fact is, there are only two ways to address the solvency problem -- adding more resources to the program or adjusting future benefits (or some combination of both). As President Reagan said in signing the last major Social Security bill in 1983, "In this compromise, we have struck the best possible balance between the taxes we pay and the benefits we get back." At the time, he also said that "one point has won universal agreement: The Social Security system must be preserved."

Our research shows the American public wants a balanced, bipartisan solution, and understands that changes will be needed in order to keep our promises. History tells us it can be done. As President Reagan noted in signing the 1983 compromise, this "is a clear and dramatic demonstration that our system can still work when men and women of good will join together to make it work."

AARP's Tax Trap (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Social Security was supposed to be a killer issue for Democrats this election year after they defeated President Bush's reform plans in 2005. But suddenly the tables are turning on several Democratic candidates because of their endorsement of the tax-increase agenda of the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP.

The liberal entitlement lobby has asked candidates around the country to fill out a questionnaire asking, "Will you support a balanced Social Security plan to continue the program's guaranteed benefits for future generations?" That may sound innocuous, but here's how AARP defines its balanced plan on its Web site near the above question: "AARP believes that a bipartisan plan that balances additional contributions from high income workers with modest adjustments in future benefits can maintain guaranteed Social Security benefits for future generations."

Those italics are ours, because in Washington "additional contributions" means a tax increase. And by "high income workers," AARP can only mean anyone earning more than $94,200, which is the 2006 income level above which the 12.4% Social Security portion of the payroll tax no longer applies. Employers and workers each pay half of the payroll levy, and the income cap already rises each year with inflation.

Thus if you make, say, $100,000 a year but live in pricey Los Angeles, tough luck; the folks at AARP think you're rich. They supported the elimination of the income cap for Medicare's portion of the payroll tax (2.9%) as part of the Clinton 1993 tax increase, and now they want to do it for the other 12.4%. A worker earning $150,000 would pay roughly $6,900 more each year in "additional contributions" under this AARP definition of "balance."

Many members in both parties signed this pledge, but for a handful of Democrats in hotly contested House seats (see the table nearby) it's become a political liability. That's because their GOP opponents refused to take the AARP pledge and are making an issue of this Democratic support for raising taxes on middle- and upper-income wage earners. It's certainly information voters ought to have before next Tuesday. Strangely, however, the Democrats are crying foul, and AARP is trying to give them political cover.

Democrat Melissa Bean -- who is trying to hold her seat in an affluent district near Chicago -- now claims she never supported the tax increase she plainly endorsed in answering AARP's questionnaire. And AARP is helping her disavow her pledge by sending a letter to her district's AARP members (as well as to the districts of other vulnerable Democrats who took its pledge). The letter from AARP President William Novelli slams Ms. Bean's opponent David McSweeney for his "ads trying to scare voters."

This AARP complaint about Social Security "scare" tactics is certainly novel, given that its own political clout has been built entirely on scaring seniors. In 2005, it paid for a TV campaign claiming President Bush wanted to "dismantle Social Security." But see if you can follow AARP's latest logic: According to a Chicago Daily Herald interview with AARP spokesman Dave Sloane: "The organization does believe lifting the cap on Social Security taxes and cutting future benefits may be necessary to keep the system afloat." But then he added that to conclude that Ms. Bean supports these policies "is an outrageous leap that is not even close to the truth."

DOJ_NMG_0091568

That's not what Mr. Sloane said in previous statements about the purpose of AARP's candidate survey. He was quoted in the Palm Beach Post as saying that the intent of the questionnaire was to "gauge support for the group's position on Social Security . . . We presume that all the candidates would have read the background material and understood our positions."

Translation: AARP was hoping to use its candidate survey to nail down enough support to raise taxes on Social Security and to defeat private investment accounts if Mr. Bush pushes for reform again next year. But now that its scheme has been exposed and is hurting its Democratic pals in tight races, AARP leaders want to deny that this is what they meant. Let's hope Republicans remember this AARP double-dealing, which resembles what the lobby did in endorsing a drug plan for Medicare in 2003 only to call it inadequate now.

One irony here is that the now-disavowed AARP questionnaire is more honest than the group usually is about the choices facing politicians on Social Security. One option -- opposed by AARP -- is to reduce long-term unfunded liabilities by allowing workers to divert some of their payroll taxes into private accounts and tap into the higher returns that private investments offer. This would go a good deal of the way to solving the problem.

Another option -- the AARP "balanced" plan -- requires either raising taxes or cutting the future benefits of young workers, or both. That is, AARP would make today's lousy Social Security deal for young workers even worse. By all means voters should pay close attention to what AARP asked and how the candidates answered. It may have been the most honest moment in these Congressional campaigns.

America's Crisis Of Confidence (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Here's something to think about when you cast your vote today: A new study shows that Americans have lost faith in the people who lead their federal, state and local governments, and in businesses, churches and schools. And they are afraid to fly.

"America is in trouble," reads the introduction to the 2006 National Leadership Index, sponsored by U.S. News & World Report and the Center for Public Leadership at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. According to the report, nearly three-quarters of Americans think that the nation faces a "leadership crisis."

This is the survey's second year, and it has been downhill all the way, said Todd Pittinsky, the center's research director. "Most groups are following the general trend of having low confidence and, if anything, having that confidence slip further."

The only leaders who earn more than a smidgen of Americans' confidence, the researchers say, are those in the military and medical fields. (Confidence in the media didn't slip, but it was in the sewer already.)

"We could have asked about grandmothers," Pittinsky said. "Maybe we could have had more confidence in grandmothers."

The researchers hope the survey will "contribute to our ongoing civic dialogue -- deepening our understanding of ourselves and the pressing need for effective, responsible democratic leadership."

Sounds scary. Like the section called "Global Leadership and Fear," in which 1,600 people were asked: "How optimistic do you feel about the safety of the United States from a terrorist attack?" Half felt at least a wee bit optimistic. But of the other half, 18 percent were somewhat pessimistic, and 16 percent wigged into the panicky "very pessimistic" category. Oddly, an additional 15 percent were neither pessimistic nor optimistic about the nation's safety.

Perhaps, joked survey researcher and assistant professor Seth Rosenthal, these are people "so paralyzed they can't even tell you if they're pessimistic."

The researchers also asked: "If you flew today, how confident do you feel that you would be safe from terrorist harm on a domestic flight?" Nearly half sucked it up on this one, saying they felt confident about flying safely. But 13 percent put a potential evildoer on every plane. "That's pretty bad," Rosenthal said. "Obviously there aren't planes being dropped out of the sky every day."

Blending fears of leadership failure and flying, the study further found that "Americans who are not confident at all that government leaders in Washington will respond effectively to an emergency crisis are less confident than other Americans about their safety from a terrorist attack on a domestic flight."

DOJ_NMG_0091569

Any bright spots?

The group was asked to guess where the United States ranks among the top 32 industrialized nations in terms of citizens' life expectancy, economic equality and mathematics literacy.

Sunny optimism: The group put the United States in 10th place for longevity, and 15th for both economic equality and math skills.

Misplaced optimism, it turns out: Global rankings place the nation in 24th place for longevity, 30th for economic equality and 25th for math literacy. In other words, we are more elitist and lousier in math than even these disappointed, mistrustful and frightened Americans imagined. And we'll all die sooner than they thought.

Touch-screen Test (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

NEW VOTING MACHINES, like new computers, are generally faster than old ones. But as every computer user knows, reliability is often more important than speed. And a lot depends on who's using the machine and how.

After the debacle with punch-card ballots in Florida six years ago, many counties across the country traded in their clunky old voting machines for high-tech models — many of which enable people to vote just by touching names on a video screen. The switch, however, has drawn a new set of complaints. Some poll workers and computer scientists predict an election day plagued by long waits, glitches and miscounted votes. A more promising possibility is that, with the right equipment and procedures in place, electronic voting machines will deliver an unusually accurate and speedy count.

Unfortunately, the experience this election day is sure to fall somewhere in between. A number of states lack the safeguards necessary to address the machines' vulnerabilities to glitches and tampering. And even in states with those safeguards, such as California, the integrity of the results will depend on voters taking extra steps to make sure everything works as it should.

So far, the most common complaint about the electronic voting devices is that they break down or freeze too often, which is an engineering problem (and one hardly new to computer users). More troubling are the reports that some of the devices have inexplicably tallied the occasional vote for the wrong candidate. Computer experts also have demonstrated how easy it is to rig a machine's software (or hardware) to steal votes.

These problems highlight the need for machines to print and store a record of each vote as it is cast. Manufacturers have resisted putting printers in their machines, and only a portion of the states where the machines are being deployed have insisted on a paper trail. One of them is California, where 32 of the 58 counties will make routine use of the new machines on election day. (In Los Angeles County, voters mark paper ballots that are counted by optical scanners.)

The machines will require voters and election officials to change their habits. The machines let voters check their ballot on a summary screen before it is cast, so they can correct any vote that somehow winds up in the wrong candidate's column. But voters also have to check the paper record before they leave the booth to preserve the accuracy of that record for a recount. Meanwhile, election officials need to keep a tighter lid on voting cards and other equipment. And after the polls close, random audits must be thorough enough to guard against software tampering.

Together, these steps can help deliver the improvements in accuracy that the new technology promises while minimizing the risks of software tampering and bugs. Now if only the manufacturers could develop machines that don't crash.

Vote! (WP)

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

WITH IMPORTANT state offices and control of Congress at stake, it is vital that voters not be deterred today.

The potential obstacles are most apparent in Maryland, where Republican and Democratic officials sparked an unprecedented run on absentee ballots with the unsubstantiated suggestion that electronic voting machines can't be trusted. The hype for absentee voting, sounded by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and echoed by Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), preyed on fears created by the disarray of the September primary. But human error caused the most serious problems; the vote-counting machines worked without apparent problems.

DOJ_NMG_0091570

Distrust of electronic voting is not limited to Maryland. Theories, many fanciful, abound about the ease of hacking into voting machines. There has been no evidence of that occurring, and the layers of scrutiny and security in force on Election Day cast doubt on whether experiments hatched in the privacy of a lab could be carried out in public. We support a verifiable paper trail to add a layer of safety and bolster public confidence. But there's a thin line between raising reasonable questions and persuading voters that there's no point in turning out. Happily, a recent Post poll showed that despite all the controversy, an overwhelming majority of Maryland voters are confident that their votes will be counted.

Then there's the Republican manual for its poll watchers in Maryland. The tone of the GOP message ("Your most important duty as a poll watcher is to challenge people who present themselves to vote but who are not authorized to vote") compares unfavorably with that of the Democrats to their poll watchers ("Your primary job is to ensure that every eligible voter who wants to vote gets to vote"). But the Democratic allegation that the GOP approach represents a conspiracy to suppress the vote is overwrought and unsupported. Much of the GOP manual mirrors state elections board procedures. State elections officials -- who reviewed the materials of both parties -- found incorrect information from the Democrats as well as the Republicans.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

Negative media

"We are told by careful pollsters that half of the American people believe that American troops should be brought home from Iraq immediately. This news discourages supporters of our efforts there. Not me, though: I am relieved. Given press coverage of our efforts in Iraq, I am surprised that 90 percent of the public do not want us out right now," James Q. Wilson writes in City Journal.

"Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 30, 2005, nearly 1,400 stories appeared on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening news. More than half focused on the costs and problems of the war, four times as many as those that discussed the successes. About 40 percent of the stories reported terrorist attacks; scarcely any reported the triumphs of American soldiers and Marines. The few positive stories about progress in Iraq were just a small fraction of all the broadcasts," Mr. Wilson said.

"When the Center for Media and Public Affairs made a nonpartisan evaluation of network news broadcasts, it found that during the active war against [then-Iraqi dictator] Saddam Hussein, 51 percent of the reports about the conflict were negative. Six months after the land battle ended, 77 percent were negative; in the 2004 general election, 89 percent were negative; by the spring of 2006, 94 percent were negative. This decline in media support was much faster than during Korea or Vietnam.

"Naturally, some of the hostile commentary reflects the nature of reporting. When every news outlet struggles to grab and hold an audience, no one should be surprised that this competition leads journalists to emphasize bloody events. To some degree, the press covers Iraq in much the same way that it covers America: it highlights conflict, shootings, bombings, hurricanes, tornadoes and corruption.

"But the war coverage does not reflect merely an interest in conflict. People who oppose the entire war on terror run much of the national press, and they go to great lengths to make waging it difficult."

Changing his tune

"On a campaign bus trip around Baltimore on Saturday, U.S. Senate candidate Michael S. Steele, a black Republican, told me to watch out for what Sen. Barack Obama would say in Tennessee on Sunday," reporter Jon Ward of The Washington Times writes at the Insider Political Blog at www.washingtontimes.com.

"Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat and the fifth black senator in U.S. history, campaigned against Lt. Gov. Steele in Bowie last week," Mr. Ward said.

"Mr. Obama, a rising political star and potential presidential contender, tried to dissuade black Democrats from crossing party lines to vote for Mr. Steele, who has run a savvy campaign against Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who is white.

"You don't vote for somebody because of what they look like," Mr. Obama said Thursday.

Mr. Steele predicted that Mr. Obama's tune might change in Tennessee, when he campaigned for Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a black Democrat running for U.S. Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0091571

Sure enough, Mr. Obama used racial politics while stumping for Mr. Ford at a black church Sunday.

" 'I'm feeling lonely in Washington,' Mr. Obama told worshippers at Mt. Zion Baptist in Nashville, according to the Associated Press. 'I need my dear friend to join me.' "

Bias? What bias?

"According to MSNBC's Chris Matthews, if Democratic Senate candidate Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. loses Tuesday, you can blame it on white conservatives," Brad Wilmouth reports at NewsBusters.org, commenting on the Senate race in Tennessee.

Recent polls show Mr. Ford trailing Republican Bob Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga.

Why? Fear, says Mr. Matthews: "The larger the black population, where the whites are afraid historically, and in Deep South states, they tend to become very conservative Republican out of fear, whatever, of an overwhelming, or a large number of African-Americans because of the kind of culture."

Not that Mr. Matthews -- a Philadelphia native and former Democratic congressional staffer -- has any biases of his own, as NewsBusters' Mark Finkelstein reports. During an interview yesterday morning on NBC's "Today" show, Meredith Vieira asked Mr. Matthews why he was smiling.

"Because I think it's going to be a wipeout," Mr. Matthews said. "I think the Democrats are going to carry the House by 20-some, high 20s, and I think the Senate seats are perhaps not six, but five, and I can see a big victory for the Democrats."

Show that ID

Missouri's chief elections official said yesterday she was asked for photo identification at the voting booth despite a court ruling striking down the requirement.

"I'm guessing this may be happening in other parts of the state," said Secretary of State Robin Carnahan, a Democrat who had opposed Republican efforts to mandate a photo ID in Missouri.

She said that a worker at the St. Louis Election Board asked her three times to show photo ID when she went to cast an absentee ballot Friday.

Miss Carnahan said that she tried to explain a photo ID was not necessary, but that the election worker replied that she was instructed to ask for one anyway. Miss Carnahan said she eventually was allowed to vote without displaying a photo identification.

"To have that experience personally was very troubling," she said.

The Missouri Supreme Court last month upheld a lower court's ruling overturning a law that would have required voters to show a photo ID issued by the state or federal government.

Scott Leiendecker, the Republican director of the St. Louis Election Board, did not immediately return a call yesterday, the Associated Press reports.

Miss Carnahan said she spoke with Mr. Leiendecker, who assured her that the identification requirements would be clarified and that voters on Election Day would not be pressed to present a photo ID.

Muslim voters

A Muslim group says it has been phoning Muslims nationwide to remind them to go to the polls today.

"The calls are being heavily targeted towards districts where there is a large Muslim population and heavy Muslim turnout could make a significant difference in the elections. Virginia, Florida, New Jersey, Ohio and Texas are a few states that have been targeted," the Muslim American Society said in an e-mail, referring to what it calls the Freedom Foundation Center for Electoral Empowerment.

The group said its callers are offering transportation to the polls.

"Callers are reminding Muslims that such important issues as the war in Iraq, civil liberties, immigration, health care, education and economic justice will be greatly impacted by the November 7th elections," the group said.

Must We Talk? (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091572

Have you been trying to ignore this election? Do you avoid talking politics with friends? Do you tune out right-wing talk shows and stay away from left-wing blogs? Do you change channels as soon as you hear the words "Pelosi," "Foley," "cut and run" or "macaca"?

Then you owe it to your country to vote today. It's the rest of us who should stay home.

We've lost our bearings because we've followed the old advice to discuss this amongst ourselves. Democracy, we've been told, is best served when informed citizens deliberate the issues of the day, pooling their wisdom to reach a judicious consensus.

But what really happens when people discuss politics? Consider an experiment last year, when groups of Coloradans convened separately in Boulder and Colorado Springs to discuss global warming, affirmative action and civil unions for same-sex couples. Before the discussions, the people in Boulder were on average more liberal than the ones in Colorado Springs, but there were also moderates in both places whose opinions overlapped.

After the group discussions, the people in Boulder moved to the left, and those in Colorado Springs moved to the right. The researchers — David Schkade, Cass Sunstein and Reid Hastie — concluded that "the major effect of deliberation was to make group members more extreme than they were before they started to talk."

This effect hasn't been studied much in politics, but it's well documented in other arenas. When jurors deliberate how much to award in damages, they often end up giving more than the average juror originally thought was fair — and sometimes more than anyone in the group originally favored. The more they talk, the more they reinforce one another's indignation.

Group polarization is less of a problem if the people start with a wide range of opinions — even if they tend to shift in whatever direction the majority favors, they'll at least be exposed to other views and become more tolerant. There's some evidence that if you purposely assemble a diverse group of discussants and systematically educate them about an issue, some of the people will moderate their opinions.

But when people informally discuss politics, they often don't hear a range of views. As in Boulder and Colorado Springs, they may be surrounded by like-minded people in their neighborhoods, churches and offices. During local elections, they're much more likely now than in the past to hear one-sided rhetoric because gerrymandering has produced so many one-sided districts, making it impossible for moderate candidates to survive.

Thanks to cable television, talk radio and the Internet, it's easier than ever for people to have their opinions validated around the clock. As the media audiences segregate themselves ideologically, they become more extreme in their views — and more convinced than ever that they represent the sensible middle.

When conservatives have their views reinforced daily on talk radio and Sundays at their churches, they start to believe the "mainstream media" is a bunch of wacko traitors. When liberals spend their days reading lefty blogs, or working on campuses surrounded by ideological soulmates, they start convincing themselves that most "corporate media" are right wing, and that Fox News is pure propaganda.

In fact, most journalists do try to be objective, but as a group they, too, can become polarized by spending most of their time talking to fellow journalists and experts with similar views. One of the cleverest demonstrations of this effect was a study published last year in Harvard's Quarterly Journal of Economics. The researchers, Tim Groseclose and Jeffrey Milyo, devised a scale for measuring the slant of news reports by keeping track of which think tanks — liberal or conservative — were quoted most often.

The researchers found that The Washington Times and Brit Hume's evening newscast on Fox fell on the conservative side of the scale, while all the other news media outlets they studied fell on the liberal side. The surprising result — to liberals, at least — was that Fox was closer to the ideological center than the Big Three evening newscasts as well as all the major newspapers and newsweeklies.

Of course, these ideological divides are small compared with the ones in the blogosphere, which is one giant version of the Colorado experiment. You can always find a group online to affirm your brilliant opinions. It's immensely satisfying, but it can also make Election Day a miserable experience. Tonight, you can't help noticing how many ignorant people out there disagree with you.

DOJ_NMG_0091573

Clinton Is Midterm Campaign's Biggest Spender, Records Show, At $29.5 Million And Counting (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has spent more money in the midterm election cycle than any other politician running for office this year, campaign finance records show, investing more than twice as much as most candidates in tight races across the country.

To secure her Democratic re-election bid in New York, Mrs. Clinton spent $29.5 million through the middle of October, according to the Federal Election Commission, suggesting that she may have her sights on a future national campaign. While much of the amount is devoted to television advertising, it is the bills for catering, flowers and photography that elevated her tally far above other Senate candidates'.

While Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, spent $21.5 million through the same time period, records show, his spending report comprises bills like $30.33 at Papa John's pizza, $59.50 at Panera Bread and $74.34 at the Olive Garden.

Not so for Mrs. Clinton, whose campaign reported sending a $6,585 check to Flutterbyes for flowers in Las Vegas, $5,397.50 to Le Petit Gourmet Catering in Glendale, Colo., and $80,000 to Tavern on the Green in Manhattan. Those were among the bills gleaned from a page-by-page review of Mrs. Clinton's third-quarter campaign finance report, which showed disbursements of more than $8 million.

The chairman of the Federal Election Commission, Michael E. Toner, said only a handful of Senate candidates had ever spent more. The spending patterns of the Clinton campaign demonstrated "an extraordinary burn rate," he said, which was particularly striking considering she did not seem to have a serious challenger in John Spencer, her Republican rival.

"It may be that Clinton is spending so heavily in New York to try to accomplish the kind of landslide that President Bush enjoyed in 1998," said Mr. Toner, referring to the Texas governor's race eight years ago. "The president's 1998 race unquestionably helped lay the groundwork for a successful presidential campaign in 2000. History may be repeating itself."

A spokeswoman for the campaign, Ann Lewis, said Mrs. Clinton began raising and spending money in January 2005, preparing for "whatever came our way." When a competitive race did not materialize, Ms. Lewis said, the campaign began investing in an extensive get-out-the-vote program to remind Democrats not to overlook the election.

"If it is not considered to be close, you've got to give people a really good reason to vote for you," Ms. Lewis said. "Frankly, there is not a statewide race that has built-in excitement."

A review of the Clinton campaign's filings with the Federal Election Commission showed that in addition to contributing $2.6 million to other Democrats, the campaign spent more than $2 million on advertising for television, radio and newspapers in the third quarter of the year.

The largest payment, $1.58 million, went to Media Strategies and Research of Denver, Colo., a Democratic political advertising firm. In addition, about $600,000 in fees were paid to Grunwald Communications, which is run by Mrs. Clinton's longtime adviser Mandy Grunwald.

The remainder of the costs covered staff salaries and expenses for Mrs. Clinton. From Connecticut to California, nearly all fund-raising functions included catering, parking and photography.

"An important part of any event is the photo line," Ms. Lewis said. "There is always a good chunk of time during the evening where she is taking photos."

Hillary Gets An Address Wrong (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

In both theory and great expectations, today is the beginning of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. By nightfall she will have won lopsided reelection to the U.S. Senate, with plenty of money left over to start a presidential effort. She enjoys the sort of name recognition a president might envy and has the unalloyed good wishes of Democratic activists who have been waiting all these dark and awful years for a Clinton Restoration. After all, if the Bushes could do it -- one mediocre, the other incompetent -- then why not the brilliant and dazzling Clintons? The answer may be Hillary herself. She can bore a grateful nation.

DOJ_NMG_0091574

Such, anyway, was the effect of her recent appearance at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. The anticipation was great. The crowd was huge, and the fact that Clinton had agreed to speak to this august body meant -- it had to mean -- that she was at last going to say something thumping about Iraq. Instead she delivered a no-news address lacking controversy, fresh approaches or even a single soaring sentence.

If one sparrow does not make a spring, then one speech is not a campaign. But those of us who have heard Clinton before were reminded that she can be industrially dull, so cautious that nothing comes out of her mouth except bromides. In his book about Hillary and her 2000 campaign ("Hillary's Turn"), Michael Tomasky dubbed her "The Laundry Lady" for the numbing numbers of little programs she would somehow implement if elected.

Caution has served Clinton well in the Senate. There, she has listened to the wisdom of Robert Byrd, who gave her his standard nose-to-the-grindstone tutorial and beamed with avuncular pride as she took it to heart and grandstanded not. On the other hand, she has led not, either.

Clinton supposedly comes to the presidential race with two built-in constituencies: women and minorities. The former I'm not so sure about, for wherever I go and her name comes up it is the ladies who make faces. As for minorities, Hillary is Bill and Bill is Hillary, and their record, if not his rhetoric, is unmatched. She has earned her following.

But that leaves the rest of us who might seek something more in a presidential candidate than lists and caution and itsy-bitsy steps toward universal health care. We want, yes, vision, leadership. We want rhetoric that soars, poetry that compels and every once in a while a phrase that pumps the heart and draws a tear. We rarely hear that sort of thing from Hillary Clinton.

The Council on Foreign Relations is not, I grant you, a stadium full of partisans. It calls for a certain understated style. Even so, Clinton managed to bore the likes of stockbrokers, money managers, corporate lawyers and others who you might think are already inured to boredom. Here and there I even saw people fighting sleep. This was her audience -- predisposed to like her, already respecting her. She gave it nothing.

Clinton, in a way, personifies the Democratic Party. Many of the most prominent mentionables (Dodd, Kerry, Biden, Edwards) have pretzeled themselves over Iraq, voting for, arguing against and now expressing dismay. But on their own, they offer not much that lifts the heart. It is a field of the familiar. Oddly, Hillary Clinton is the fresh face, undefeated and on the cusp of history itself. Given who she is and, importantly, what she is -- smart, disciplined and, when she wants, charming -- there are those who say that this campaign is hers to lose. Last week she took a first step toward that goal.

Eyeing 2008, Political Stars Ran Hard For Others (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

It's been a punishing month of bad food, airplane air and hoarse vocal cords. And Barack Obama isn't even on the ballot today.

The popular senator from Illinois, who has barnstormed the country on behalf of Democratic gubernatorial and congressional candidates, is one of the A-list political celebrities of the 2006 campaign season. Other big draws: former president Bill Clinton, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

They aren't doing it for the frequent-flier miles. These headliners bring glitz to otherwise ho-hum rallies and help dazzle donors out of millions of dollars. They earn the gratitude of future officeholders and get to know thousands of voters.

That's all very useful, given that these non-candidates may run for president in two years -- or, as with Clinton, the non-candidate is married to a 2008 hopeful, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Giuliani's itinerary in the closing days included Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and South Carolina. All four states have Republican candidates on the ballot this year and will host crucial early primaries in 2008.

"You're building up chits," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democrats' campaign committee, who has summoned Obama, Clinton and others to appear on behalf of his candidates. "Everyone wants to say that they got out there and put some skin in the game and contributed to a big win."

DOJ_NMG_0091575

Sometimes the visits telegraph something about a candidate. Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for Florida governor, was too busy yesterday to meet up with President Bush in Pensacola but did find time to rally with McCain in Jacksonville. Crist is trying to woo moderate voters to edge out his Democratic rival, Rep. Jim Davis.

And sometimes they make the wrong kind of news. Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) was a popular Democratic guest speaker until an event in California last week for gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides, when he botched a joke about Bush and the war in Iraq. Republicans portrayed the comment as an insult to U.S. troops, and it became a rallying cry for conservative voters in the campaign's final stretch.

More typical: a fundraiser Sunday night in Nashville, headlined by McCain along with fellow GOP Sens. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee and John Thune of South Dakota, on behalf of Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker. As of last night, when McCain returned to Arizona to campaign for Sen. Jon Kyl, he had attended 346 events in this election cycle and had raised more than $10.5 million on behalf of Republican candidates.

Clinton's November schedule was packed with 21 events, including two rallies for his wife, who is expected to easily win a second Senate term today. The former president, still wildly popular with the Democratic base, hit 100-plus events in 31 states for this election cycle, raising more than $33 million from Democratic donors. He also taped 100 prerecorded campaign calls and filmed numerous television and radio ads. Last night, Clinton hit a rally in Alexandria with Senate candidate James Webb.

But Obama may be the biggest attraction. Despite his brief two years on the national stage, Obama has generated rapturous enthusiasm among Democrats, and he has said he is considering a presidential run. His success on the campaign trail in recent weeks has added to his cachet.

The Obama blitz started on Oct. 5 with a fundraiser in New York City for the state's congressional candidates. The next day he flew to Florida for a rally and fundraiser, and then he moved on to Kansas City, Minnesota and Ohio. By the 13th, he had held fundraisers for all the Senate Democratic candidates, collecting $2 million. On Oct. 25 and 26, Obama sent a joint fundraising e-mail to supporters of Kerry and to MoveOn.org, the antiwar group, and raised a total of $1.6 million, all for individual congressional candidates.

The freshman senator paused in the middle of the month for book-related events, then raced through Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Arizona, Colorado and Washington state. Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs estimates that Obama has visited all the main Senate battlegrounds at least three times. Another mainstay is Massachusetts, where Obama was an early supporter of Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick, who is favored to win today, and who, like Obama, is African American.

At a Democratic rally in Norristown, Pa., he received rock-star treatment when he took the stage to tout the state's congressional candidates. In an audience of 1,000, people waved copies of his new book and angled for his autograph. One cried out "We love you!" as Obama came into view.

"I love you back!" Obama responded.

He gave the same speech he has delivered at dozens of similar rallies, explaining how Americans can have "the audacity of hope" to change their lives and those of others. That's also the title of his latest book, published Oct. 17.

The crowd ate it up. Dianne Wills, a Norristown resident and a Republican, said after the rally she would vote Democratic this year after hearing Obama and other speakers. "It convinced me that my choice is right," Wills said.

How Mr. Rich Spreads The Republican Word Millionaire Investor Who Leans Libertarian Pushes Conservative Ballot Initiatives In 14 States (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- This may turn out to be a bad year for Republicans. But perhaps not for some of the conservative causes they support, thanks in part to a New York real-estate investor who has directed millions of dollars toward ballot initiatives to expand private-property rights, cut state budget growth, and impose term limits on judges.

The millionaire behind many ballot measures this year is Howard Rich, a publicity-shy, libertarian-leaning businessman who has become the go-to man for supporters of conservative ballot initiatives. The group Mr. Rich chairs, Americans for Limited

DOJ_NMG_0091576

Government, as well as a handful of other organizations that he fully controls or bankrolls, have put more than $15 million this election season into ballot campaigns in 14 states, public records show.

Mr. Rich and his supporters have sustained a number of setbacks, as many of his initiatives were kept from ballots because of vague wording or signature-gathering irregularities. But in nine states where the measures have survived, recent polling shows some chance of victory today.

On ballots in Arizona, California, Idaho, Nevada, and Washington state, Mr. Rich's proposals seek to prevent governments from imposing land-use measures on private property. In Oregon, Maine, and Nebraska, the measures he backs would restrict a state's ability to raise taxes or increase spending. In Colorado, his proposal would impose retroactive term limits on judges.

Over the years, Mr. Rich has granted few interviews and has become an almost mythic figure in certain political circles. He sits on the boards of the Cato Institute and the Club for Growth, and controls other groups such as U.S. Term Limits and Fund for Democracy, which in turn funnels millions of dollars into other organizations, such as America at Its Best.

Mr. Rich, after writing that he would "gladly answer questions via email" for this article, didn't respond to a subsequent set of queries sent to his email address.

ELECTION 2006

• Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

• Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

• For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

Recently, he granted a brief interview to a nonprofit conservation magazine called High Country News. In that interview, which was taped and has been made public, Mr. Rich said he has made it a practice to help local activists in their fight against politicians who are "plowing over peoples' rights."

"I made a few bucks in business, so I'm able to do this stuff," he said.

Mr. Rich's reclusive nature has created a cottage industry among opponents of his ideas, who have rooted through public records in a dozen states seeking clues about the groups he controls and the money those groups dispense to state-ballot efforts.

Among those groups is the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, a left-leaning Washington, D.C.-based organization that recently launched a Web site -- howierichexposed.com5 -- to highlight the groups affiliated with the New York investor. "Howie Rich From New York City is practically a noun in the West these days," said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the organization.

This isn't the first year Mr. Rich has waded into the arena of initiative balloting. A group he operates pushed term-limit proposals in many states in the 1990s. But he is becoming ubiquitous in an expensive and specialized area of politics. About half the states allow citizen-driven initiatives. This year is one of the busiest in history, with about 75 proposals crowding ballots in 36 states. In recent years, national organizations, along with local groups, have seized on initiatives as a way to push issues before voters that politicians have been reluctant to bring up, or to drive voter turnout for other causes or candidates.

Though often characterized as citizen-driven, initiative campaigns are becoming dominated by corporate and national partisan interests.

In California, tobacco companies Reynolds American Inc. and Altria Group Inc. are spending tens of millions of dollars campaigning against a proposed cigarette-tax increase -- as well as bankrolling antitax and antismoking ban proposals in several other states. One proposition on the ballot in California -- long at the vanguard of citizen initiatives -- would put a $10,000 cap on corporate contributions to ballot initiatives.

Unlike regular political campaigns, proposition initiatives require extensive signature-gathering and often include an outsize educational campaign, as proponents attempt to simplify often-recondite ballot proposals for voters. These added tasks often make initiative campaigns more expensive than average races.

In California this year, five organizations wholly or partially controlled by Mr. Rich have given a combined $3.37 million to push a "takings" initiative, state records show. The proposals would bar state and local governments from condemning private property to promote other private developments.

DOJ_NMG_0091577

On its face, the measure is a reaction to a recent Supreme Court eminent-domain case. But in reality, the takings proposals carry a twist that opponents characterize as draconian: They also limit government's ability to rezone private property, apply restrictive covenants, or impose environmental regulations on a property without compensating the owner.

The takings proposals are patterned after a Rich-backed initiative that passed in Oregon in 2004, which requires the state to pay landowners for new zoning regulations or waive the new restrictions. In three years, landowners have filed damage claims from new zoning regulations that now total $3 billion, according to a Portland State University study -- far outstripping Oregon's ability to pay.

Though the takings measure appears headed for defeat in California, similar initiatives are faring better in Arizona, Montana, Idaho and Washington. In those states, surveys show the proposal is either statistically tied or leading among likely voters.

In those states and in Nevada -- where a takings measure remains on the ballot but was stripped by a court of its more punitive elements -- Mr. Rich's Americans for Limited Government group has supplied the lion's share of the money spent to back them. In Arizona, for example, the pro-takings local organization, Arizona HomeOwners Protection Effort, reports that nearly 86% of the $1.34 million it has collected for its campaign came from Americans for Limited Government. ALG provided a similar share of the support in Idaho. In Washington, it gave about 30% of the total collected by the Property Fairness Coalition, records show.

In addition to takings, groups affiliated with Mr. Rich bankrolled measures to restrict state budget growth bankrolled antispending measures in nine states, three of which have survived legal challenge. A group where Mr. Rich is a director has also provided more than $1.1 million in Colorado to promote a term-limit proposition for judges, according to campaign-finance records there. All told, at least five groups that Mr. Rich controls or serves as a director, including the Fund for Democracy, America at its Best, U.S. Term Limits, and Club for Growth, have given money to conservative ballot campaigns this year, campaign-finance records show.

The collection of Rich-affiliated groups, and the fact that the organizations don't have to reveal their donors, have given ammunition to proposal opponents, who say the campaigns are sham citizen initiatives controlled by a reclusive out-of-stater attempting to usurp local authority.

Oregon's governor has publicly criticized Mr. Rich's activities. In Montana, where three Rich-backed initiatives recently were tossed off the ballot, Gov. Brian Schweitzer challenged Mr. Rich to a debate. "Howard Rich and his wealthy buddies won't even reveal who is funding their campaign," Mr. Schweitzer said. "I invite them to come to Montana, tell us who they are and what their shady initiative is all about."

Among Mr. Rich's defenders is Grover Norquist, of Americans for Tax Reform, a group that supports many of the same ballot measures. Mr. Norquist said Mr. Rich's reputation rests on the simple fact that he is a capable organizer who knows a lot of people and has the money to assist in grass-roots causes. It's not what opponents like to see, Mr. Norquist says.

"So they say, 'He's from New York,'" Mr. Norquist says, "but there's no there there. He's just a man you go to if you have a good idea: term limits, spending limits, property rights."

A Civil Abortion Debate? (USAT)

By Laura Vanderkam

USA Today, November 7, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — South Dakota isn't usually a battleground state, but this fall, one of the country's most important political fights has been waged here on the bitterly cold plains between Mount Rushmore and the Minnesota state line. In March, Gov. Mike Rounds signed a law that would ban almost all abortions within the state. Opponents countered by collecting enough signatures to put the issue on today's ballot as “Referred Law 6.”

The referendum's outcome doesn't matter. If the ban passes, it will be blocked in court. If defeated, South Dakota won't become an abortion hub. Doctors perform only about 800 abortions annually here, almost all in one squat brick clinic near this city's main shopping mall.

DOJ_NMG_0091578

What matters is that South Dakota's referendum represents one of the few times since 1973, when the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision legalized abortion nationwide, that voters have gotten to debate the question directly at the polls.

And yes, debate is the right word. Despite the hostility usually associated with this topic, the residents I spoke with reported refreshingly little screaming. South Dakotans have simply discovered that when you have to persuade your neighbors to join your cause — not judges in Washington — both sides become remarkably civil. That civility has been rare during the past three decades' abortion wars. It's a welcome change — but it's also a chance to wonder how much more pleasant the national debate might have been if we had all been able to forge compromises within our communities instead of indulging in the extremes that carry the day.

Certainly, some South Dakotans — and the outsiders raising money for both sides — have turned shrill. Vandals have defaced signs, and locals report being called just a few too many times on the topic. Nonetheless, leaders of both sides have made a point of avoiding extreme rhetoric in those calls and in their ads.

Jan Nicolay, a former Republican state representative and co-chair of the anti-ban South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, tells me that her side quickly nixed traditional abortion rights prose (e.g. “get your rosaries off my ovaries”).

“Because this is a personal, sensitive issue, we wanted to treat it in as professional a manner as we possibly could,” Nicolay says. SD Healthy Families decided to educate voters about the law's text and appeal to frugal residents by pointing out how much defending the law in court would cost. One TV commercial even starts with the message that “South Dakotans agree: Honor and protect human life.” But with no rape or incest exceptions, the ad says, the law goes too far.

On the other side, Leslee Unruh, who manages the Vote Yes For Life campaign, also shies from extreme slogans. Years ago she had an abortion, which left her devastated — but also repulsed by the abortion-opponents side's traditional pictures of dismembered fetuses. “Putting a picture, a gruesome picture, in front of someone's face that's had an abortion — and there are many of us, we're everywhere — it's so harsh,” she says. “It's not the way to help women, and it's not the way to end abortion. … If you want to show pictures of dead babies, stay in your own state.”

Instead, the official Vote Yes for Life T-shirt features pictures of young, smiling women. Some literature includes the almost-feminist-sounding theme that motherhood can be empowering, even in difficult circumstances.

Of course, South Dakotans have a reputation for reasonableness. Harsh rhetoric “wouldn't play very well here,” says Jean Morrow, a United Church of Christ minister who campaigns against the ban (and has received only one really nasty letter as a result).

But it's not just South Dakotan friendliness that's keeping the debate civil. To win, both sides know they have to persuade neighbors they know and like to join them. To do that, you can't call people names. Unruh reports that one of her neighbors, who is voting against the ban, said he hoped they could still have a conversation on this issue by the fence, as they've always had. “This is one issue I'd love to convince him on,” she says. “I'm not going to, but that doesn't change my respect for him as a person, or his for me.”

Across this state, thousands of such conversations are taking place — conversations that have been rare since Roe froze the debate. Since 1973, people have counted votes on the Supreme Court, not in their own precincts. Because the issue has been removed from the messy, democratic sphere, positions have hardened into philosophically pure abstractions that don't feel right to many Americans.

To some groups that oppose abortion, there's no difference among contraceptives, the “morning after” pill and early-term abortions. The South Dakota law, however, would go ahead and OK the first two but not the latter.

If the ban fails, it won't be because South Dakotans like abortion; it will be because there's no rape or incest exception. Philosophically, there might be no difference between a child conceived in rape and a child conceived because her parents were careless, but most people, in the spirit of compromise, are willing to say there is.

The abortion-rights side in this country haslikewise tried to remain so pure that it has fought to preserve late-term abortion availability with a zeal many find unseemly. Philosophically, there might be little difference between late- and early-term abortions, but polls still find that most voters disapprove of the former but tolerate the latter.

People live in the real world where compromises must be made. You give a little to get your neighbor on board.

DOJ_NMG_0091579

It raises the question: What if all our abortion battles had been fought this way — democratically, with messy compromises — over the past 33 years? We might have reached an answer by now. Maybe. But if South Dakota's any indicator, we'd be a lot less strident. Abortion may be a battleground, but as Unruh says, "We don't have to turn it into a civil war."

Laura Vanderkam is a 2006-07 journalism fellow with the Phillips Foundation, a non-profit group devoted to advancing constitutional principles, a democratic society and free enterprise. She is also a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

The Politics Of Frustration (NYT)

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Ever since anti-taxation zealots in California rediscovered the populist frisson of the ballot initiative a generation ago, American politics has gone off on a binge of ballot proposals. Today is one of the busiest, with 81 citizen initiatives before voters in more than 20 states. Pity the poor voter who has to wade through a list of sometimes contradictory, sometimes misleading proposals, doing work that should be the responsibility of elected officials.

We always watch with interest — and sometimes with concern — to see how people exercise this peculiar power. Will Alaskans stop aerial hunting of wolves and bears? What happened in Oklahoma to impel the proposal to stop paying the salary of state legislators doing jail time? Arizonans will have to decide whether they want the state to randomly award $1 million to one lucky voter in future elections, in order to encourage turnout. (A better inducement, in a state where voters have to come up with opinions on 19 questions today, might just be to cut down on the initiatives.) Citizens in some states are being asked to stand up to the tobacco industry's national clout by approving higher tobacco taxes at home and greater restrictions on public smoking, while others are being asked to do the opposite.

The initiative movement was bad enough when special interest groups used it to encourage voters to believe they could get lower taxes and more services just by voting to make it so, encouraging a government-by-proposition lunacy that made it impossible for state governments to divide up their resources rationally. Lately, political parties have tried to insert hot-button social issues to lure their base to the polls. Thus the raft of anti-gay proposals that are a standard thrust of right-wing election strategists, with eight states asking voters to define marriage as strictly a heterosexual union. This year Democrats in six states have retaliated with proposals to increase the minimum wage.

The ballot questions getting the most national attention undoubtedly include the South Dakota proposal to overrule the Legislature's passage of a draconian ban on nearly all forms of abortion, and a Missouri constitutional amendment aimed at banning restrictions on stem cell research. As much as we approve the sentiments behind each one, we still can't help clinging to the idea that the best way to protect abortion rights or stem cell research is to elect sensible lawmakers and appoint judges who believe in the Constitution.

Scattershot initiative is no way to run a democracy; rebuke is no substitute for effective representation. In this crazy-quilt of vox pop, an initiative to make it easier to propose future ballot initiatives is reported to be in trouble with Colorado voters. This is small comfort for any voter imagining the ballot is about choosing responsive politicians more than panaceas.

Indian Taker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

The polls show that today Eliot Spitzer will realize his long ambition of becoming New York's next Governor, meaning that he will soon be able to fulfill his oft-spoken campaign promise "to end the pay-to-play culture in Albany." We can't wait to see how that one plays out, though we certainly hope Mr. Spitzer does better than he's done as a candidate.

Last month in a debate in Buffalo, the nation's most famous Attorney General was asked his position on bringing out-of-state Indian tribes to New York to open casinos. Addressing his Republican opponent, John Faso, Mr. Spitzer remarked, "No, John, I don't believe out-of-state tribes should be here. And they won't be here under my administration."

After the debate, however, someone must have tapped Mr. Spitzer on the shoulder and reminded him that one of his biggest campaign donors is Richard Fields, a casino developer who represents a Wisconsin Indian tribe that claims ancestral roots in the state and is seeking approval to build a casino in New York's Catskills region.

DOJ_NMG_0091580

And so a few days later, according to the Albany Times Union, "Darren Dopp, the AG's spokesman, said Spitzer isn't including the Stockbridge Munsee Band of Mohicans, the Oneida Tribe of Wisconsin or the Seneca-Cayuga Tribe of Oklahoma among the out-of-state tribes that won't be allowed to develop here." Which leaves us wondering who is included.

Companies operated by Mr. Fields have donated some $200,000 to the campaign of Mr. Spitzer, who also used the developer's Gulfstream jet (at a steep discount) to travel to fund-raisers until he was criticized for the practice. As Governor, Mr. Spitzer could play an important role in making Mr. Fields's clients very happy. So on to Albany, which isn't quaking in fear.

Wisconsin's Cheesy Reformers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Watching television this election cycle, you may have noticed that "campaign finance reform" hasn't made political ads any cleaner. You may also have surmised that money counts as much as ever; its sources and middlemen have merely been reshuffled. What "reform" has done, however, is make it easier for incumbents to keep power, and a case study is the Wisconsin Governor's race.

The challenger is GOP Congressman Mark Green, who has criticized Democratic incumbent Jim Doyle over his vetoes against tax relief, and has also kicked off a debate on education and tort reform. Or at least those were the issues until Mr. Doyle's allies used the campaign-finance laws to change the subject and create a phony scandal.

That story dates back to January 2005 when Mr. Green transferred some $1.3 million from his federal Congressional campaign account into his state campaign account. Legally this was no big deal since the Wisconsin Elections Board has allowed such transfers for some 30 years. Only a few years ago, the board unanimously agreed to such a transfer for then-Congressman Tom Barrett, a Democrat.

But the elections board has long been a political animal, and it lived up to that reputation by holding a meeting the day after Mr. Green's transfer. The Democratic majority adopted an "emergency" rule requiring that money spent in gubernatorial races be collected from political action committees registered in the state. In a stroke, this barred Mr. Green from using much of his money.

Viewing this as a naked political attack, the Republican state legislature jumped into the fray by suspending the rule. The elections board counter-attacked, saying the suspension didn't apply when the legislature was out the session. The majority in August ordered Mr. Green to divest himself of $468,000 worth of transferred funds. And it took this outrageous step over the advice of its own staff attorney.

It's now clear why. A few weeks after the August decision, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel uncovered emails that a paid Doyle lawyer, Michael Maistelman, sent to three Democratic members of the elections board. In one email, Mr. Maistelman informs the Democrats: "We need to accomplish the following . . ." and then lays out Mr. Doyle's preferred modes of punishment for Mr. Green.

He also explains to the commissioners: "Even if this ends up in Court it is a PR victory for us since it makes Green spend money and have to defend the use of his [federal] money." He assures them that "the Gov's Campaign and the Dem party will give you cover on this in the media."

They complied. Governor Doyle has since had a field day. His campaign assailed Mr. Green, accusing him of "breaking the law" and accepting "illegal contributions." It called on the Republican to return his "dirty money." And so it came to pass that the Governor was able to turn attention away from other, more substantive issues by using election-money laws to create an aura of corruption around his opponent. It of course helped that any GOP candidate must lug the ball and chain of the party's baggage in the earmarking and Abramoff scandals.

Even the exposure of the stage-managed emails haven't put things right. Many voters have tuned out what has become a complex story about impenetrable campaign-finance regulations. And because the elections board hasn't brought suit against Mr. Green, the Republican hasn't had a chance to clear himself in a court case he'd surely win, insofar as any "crime" here was wholly manufactured by this politicized board.

DOJ_NMG_0091581

We wonder what Senator Russ Feingold thinks of all this. He's the Wisconsin native son who, along with Republican John McCain, famously spearheaded the federal campaign-finance legislation of 2002, promising healthier politics. It hasn't worked out that way.

Instead, voters have been treated to the muzzling of political activists, the policing of the Internet by federal bureaucrats, partisan attempts to shut down opposition groups and spectacles like this in Wisconsin. This is reform?

Beyond Election Day (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

A couple of things have turned up that may help to clear your mind and revive your spirit after the nastiness of this political campaign:

Goodness knows, we need relief after the barrage of negative ads and insistent phone calls that candidates and political parties unleashed on us. I know that the political consultants are convinced that "going negative" is the only way to move the vote and win an election. But at some point you wish that the grown-ups in this country -- those who don't see elections as a profit-making business -- would remind these talented character assassins of the damage they are doing to the system of representative government that has served this nation so well.

Let me now climb down from my soapbox and tell you about a letter I recently received from former senator George McGovern, telling me that he is forming a bipartisan "Council of Elders," wise men and women who will occasionally consult informally with each other and be available, individually, to counsel people making public policy.

The 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, still writing and speaking at age 84, points out that America has never developed a habit or mechanism for keeping its most experienced figures engaged even in advisory roles. His council is an informal stab in that direction.

Among others, McGovern has enlisted such liberals as historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr.; former interior secretary Stewart Udall; journalists Lewis Lapham and Gloria Steinem; Carrie Lee Nelson, the outspoken and humorous widow of former senator Gaylord Nelson; and former senators Tom Eagleton and John Culver. Balancing them are several notable Republicans, including former Senate majority leader Howard Baker, former majority whip Alan Simpson and Rep. Henry Hyde.

The group is flexible in its approach and still very much expanding in membership, with McGovern serving as a contact point at McGoverncenter@dwu.edu .

McGovern's enterprise reminds me of something Lamar Alexander, soon to be Tennessee's senior senator, told me he had learned many years ago from his apprenticeship under Bryce Harlow, the powerful White House legislative and political adviser in the 1960s and '70s. Harlow taught Alexander and others that it is a wise policy to have at least one old geezer on the White House staff, someone not entirely dependent on the president for his power or position, someone who can speak with utter frankness without fear of the consequences.

That's excellent advice, and my one regret is that my old colleague Mary McGrory, who certainly would have qualified for McGovern's council of elders, did not live long enough to serve. But some of Mary's finest work is finally between hard covers in "The Best of Mary McGrory," published by Andrews McMeel and selected and edited, with great love, by Phil Gailey, a dear friend of Mary's from the old Washington Star who is now at the St. Petersburg Times.

In one column Gailey selected from The Post, where Mary moved after the demise of the Star, she wrote about the era that was then just beginning but is now nearing its end. "Those who yearn for healing and unity in Washington," she wrote, "had better look to the National Zoo. A pair of panda bears have arrived from China, and they'll bring people together because they provide amusement and delight, something that is not anticipated from a Cheney-Bush administration."

Earlier, writing about the funeral of Richard Nixon, she observed that "he was smart but got something big wrong: He thought politics was war and that everything is justified. And what we can learn from this week is how much Americans want to love their presidents -- and they will in life as well as in death, if they are given half a chance."

?

DOJ_NMG_0091582

I mourn the death of a great reporter and a good friend and colleague, Helen Dewar, who gave Post readers definitive coverage of Virginia politics and the Senate over the past decades. She dominated those beats without ever raising her voice or flaunting her knowledge, and she managed to do everything -- including fight the breast cancer that killed her -- with immense dignity and good humor.

Mr. Bland Goes To Washington (NYT)

By Barry Schwartz

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Swarthmore, Pa.

ANOTHER national election season has come to an end — the sorriest, sleaziest, most disheartening and embarrassing in memory. The best one can hope for is a candidate who is a complete cipher. How has American electoral politics come to this?

I think we can gain insight from a study published by the psychologist Eldar Shafir 13 years ago. Suppose you are confronted with the following problem:

You're serving as a juror in a custody case in which each parent is demanding sole custody of an only child. The facts of the case are complicated by ambiguous economic, social and emotional considerations, and you decide to base your decision entirely on the following few observations:

Parent A

• average income
• reasonable rapport with child
• relatively stable social life
• average working hours
• average health

Parent B

• above-average income
• close relationship with child
• extremely active social life
• lots of work-related travel
• minor health problems

To which parent would you award sole custody of the child?

Parent A is average in every way, without compelling positive or negative features. Parent B has a mix of strong positive (very close to the child) and strong negative (lots of travel) features. Asked to make this choice, the majority of respondents — 64 percent — choose Parent B.

What makes this study really interesting is what happens when another group of respondents is given the same character sketches, but asked a slightly different question: "To which parent would you deny custody of the child?" Here again, a majority, 55 percent, choose Parent B.

How can it be that a majority both accept and reject the same parent?

Professor Shafir's explanation is that when people are asked whom to accept, they look for positive features in the parents — reasons to accept one over the other — and Parent B has them. In contrast, when people are asked whom to reject, they look for negative features — and again, Parent B has them. No matter which question you ask, Parent B stands out.

What does this tell us about modern electoral politics? When you go into the voting booth, you're trying to decide whom to accept or whom to reject. Are you judging who the good candidate is or who the less bad candidate is?

The effort by each side to coat the opposition in slime has made many of us cynical, giving us the sense that our task is to reject the worst, not select the best. Nobody's any good, we think, but some are worse than others. Let's keep those candidates out of office. Our job becomes one of denying, not awarding, office.

What that means is that if you want to win an election, you need to find candidates like Parent A, who give us no reason to say no, rather than Parent B, who present a complex set of features, some attractive and some problematic.

DOJ_NMG_0091583

If somehow the cynicism lifted, and we saw ourselves charged with the task of deciding who to say yes to, we'd have more candidates like Parent B. Just one negative feature would not be enough to disqualify someone, in our minds. There would be little to gain by capturing and broadcasting "macaca moments," or subtly invoking old Southern fears of black men cavorting with white women. Candidates would be able to take positions and speak their minds. This might lead to the arrival of candidates who actually have positions and minds. We might even be willing to risk generating a little enthusiasm at the prospect of being led by them.

But unless something is done to quell "gotcha" journalism and relentlessly negative campaigning — and as long as we continue to enter the voting booth looking for reasons to say no — the ciphers will be the winners.

Leaders Of Hamas And Fatah In Talks On Unity Government (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 6 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya failed Monday in their efforts to finalize a deal on a national unity government but planned to try again on Tuesday, aides said.

In another development, Israel began withdrawing tanks and other armored vehicles late Monday night from the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanun, Palestinian security officials said. The Israeli forces entered the town six days ago to halt Palestinian rocket fire and clashed daily with Palestinian militants.

It was not clear if all or just some of the Israeli forces were leaving, and the Israeli military did not immediately comment.

Mr. Abbas, who leads the secular Fatah movement, and Mr. Haniya, who leads the militant Islamic faction Hamas, seemed close to an agreement on a new Palestinian government that would be made up of professionals and technocrats not directly linked to either faction. The new government would seek to end the Palestinians' international isolation and win a restoration of Western assistance cut after Hamas came to power in the spring.

"There are issues to be discussed tomorrow and maybe the day after," said Nabil Aburdeineh, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas, as the talks in Gaza City broke up Monday night. "We agreed on one thing: a national government of professionals will be coming."

Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya announced Sept. 11 that they had reached a tentative agreement for a unity government. But the negotiations quickly stalled with increased fighting between armed Hamas and Fatah groups, and the meeting on Monday between the leaders was their first in weeks.

Mr. Abbas, whose headquarters are in Ramallah, in the West Bank, travels only occasionally to Gaza, where most senior Hamas leaders are based. Mr. Abbas's decision to make the trip signaled that the negotiations had reached an advanced stage.

Mustafa Barghouti, a prominent legislator brokering the talks, said earlier on Monday that the sides had already reached an agreement in principle.

"Both parties have realized that no one party can lead the Palestinians, and there is a need for a coalition that will include everyone," he said.

Hamas and Fatah did not say what issues were still dividing them. However, Mr. Aburdeineh said they had not yet discussed who might serve in a new cabinet.

A Hamas-linked Web site said Hamas wanted Bassem Naeem, the current health minister, to be the new prime minister. Dr. Naeem is not a Hamas member but is considered to have close ties to the group. Fatah may be unwilling to accept him in the prime minister's role.

Even if the Palestinians succeed in establishing a new government, it is not clear whether its policies, as yet undefined, will meet benchmarks set by the United States and the European Union, which are calling for the recognition of Israel, a renunciation of violence and an acceptance of previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. Nor is it clear whether aid will be restored.

The Palestinian political negotiations will not change the status of Mr. Abbas, who was elected president in January 2005 and will retain his post. However, Mr. Haniya and his Hamas-dominated cabinet would be expected to step down.

DOJ_NMG_0091584

Mr. Haniya, in remarks to his cabinet on Monday afternoon, suggested that the government was on its way out, without saying so explicitly. "Palestine is bigger than all of us," he said, [a news service] reported. "It is very easy for us to move to another position in the interests" of the Palestinian people, he said.

Under the proposal for the new government, Hamas and Fatah would each appoint several ministers to the cabinet, professionals and technocrats who could be aligned, but not directly affiliated, with any faction. Hamas would choose the prime minister, members of the group said. Smaller Palestinian parties would also be able to choose a number of ministers.

Mr. Haniya and his cabinet took power in March, two months after defeating Fatah in parliamentary elections. Fatah had dominated Palestinian politics for decades. However, the international isolation, the cutoff of money and internal Palestinian fighting have left Mr. Haniya and his cabinet unable to function as a government or pay the Palestinian Authority's 175,000 employees.

In northern Gaza, meanwhile, the Israeli forces and Palestinian militants battled for a sixth straight day before the Israelis began to leave Monday night. At least four Palestinians were killed by Israeli fire, Palestinian medical workers said.

One of those killed was a 15-year-old schoolboy, while several other youths were wounded in an Israeli airstrike as they headed to school, the medical workers said. The Israeli military said its target had been militants retrieving launchers used to fire rockets at Israel a day earlier.

Also, Mervet Masoud, an 18-year-old Palestinian woman, blew herself up near several soldiers, killing herself and slightly wounding one soldier, the military said. "My mother, be patient," Ms. Masoud, a student at the Islamic University in Gaza City, said in a video released by Islamic Jihad after her attack. "Consider me a martyr and, God willing, we will meet in paradise."

Ms. Masoud said she carried out the bombing as revenge for an attack on a Gaza beach in June that killed seven Palestinians, five of them from one family. The Israeli military has said that while it was firing in the area, it did not hit the family.

Israeli Forces Leave Gaza Town (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

Israeli forces pulled out of the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun before daybreak Tuesday, the military said, completing a weeklong sweep that killed more than 50 Palestinians.

The military said the forces took up new positions inside the Gaza Strip but outside Beit Hanoun, in the northeast corner of the territory near the Israeli border. Residents reported troops and tanks withdrawing from the town overnight.

The pullout coincided with another failed effort by Palestinian leaders to forge a unity government that might lead to lifting of Western aid sanctions that have bankrupted the Palestinian Authority and caused widespread hardships.

Israeli leaders said the object of the raid was to reduce the frequency of Palestinian rocket fire at nearby Israeli towns and villages, but militants kept launching their homemade rockets throughout the operation.

The sweep came in from harsh international criticism because of the death toll and destruction. Israel said most of the dead were militants, but some were women and children. An Israeli soldier was also killed.

On Monday, the sixth day of the sweep, at least seven Palestinians were killed, including a female suicide bomber.

Iran Tries To Foster Trust Among Oil Firms Tehran May Adjust Rules To Lure Investors, But Industry Is Wary By SALLY JONES (WSJ)

By Sally Jones

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is backing changes to foreign energy contracts and retaining moderates in key roles in a bid to woo crucial foreign investors, senior industry and Iranian government officials say. But it remains to be seen whether the new Iranian leadership is ready to give foreign players the kind of stable and lucrative contracts they are seeking.

Iran has the world's third-largest proven oil reserves and second-largest natural-gas reserves. But the country's standoff with the U.S. and its allies over Iran's nuclear program and Mr. Ahmadinejad's anti-Western rhetoric have intensified nervousness among foreign firms about investing there.

DOJ_NMG_0091585

Oil is the backbone of Iran's economy, but the country needs roughly $50 billion in foreign investment during the next decade to reach energy-production targets to avoid losing market share to other members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. Oil companies face a delicate balancing act: While they want to avoid U.S. ire, they are pressured by Iranian officials to attest to a friendly Iranian investment climate.

Overtures from Tehran come as oil companies say the new hard-line Iranian leadership has cast great uncertainty over their role in the nation's energy sector. An executive at one company involved in talks for three planned liquefied-natural-gas units -- part of the development of the South Pars gas field -- said discussions had slowed since most of the Iranian officials had been replaced.

Iran is OPEC's second-largest oil producer after Saudi Arabia, with output of about 3.9 million barrels a day. Crude-oil exports bring in 80% of the country's foreign exchange. They are projected to bring in $60 billion in revenue -- 60% of total government revenue -- for the fiscal year ending in March.

Oil majors feared being shut out of Iran's energy sector after last year's election of Mr. Ahmadinejad. In addition, talks have failed to resolve a dispute between Japanese and Iranian oil officials on the development of Iran's Azadegan oil field, estimated to contain 26 billion barrels of oil reserves.

Iranian foreign-ministry and oil officials say Mr. Ahmadinejad is backing changes to existing Iranian investment rules that foreign energy firms call inflexible.

The country's so-called buyback system -- unpopular with international oil companies that prefer production-sharing agreements -- skirts the constitutional ban on foreign firms taking equity stakes in energy projects by allowing companies to recoup their investment through Iran's oil-and-gas sales over a five- to seven-year period.

Iran plans to extend the time frame during which oil majors can participate in the development of an energy project to 15 years. Mr. Ahmadinejad supports the time extension, together with the idea of giving foreign companies the ability to be involved in direct financing for some projects, officials say, in what would be a crucial driver of foreign investment.

While officials gave no time frame for the changes, they say they want to move swiftly. Implementation of the changes would be "absolutely a positive move," said Valerie Marcel, principle researcher for energy at London think tank Chatham House. "Iranian officials are well aware of the companies' needs," but she said putting them in place is key.

The needed reforms are likely to find support from key oil-ministry officials. Many in the industry initially feared that Mr. Ahmadinejad's hard-line policies would spread to the oil ministry and that he would replace seasoned oil men with inexperienced allies. Yet, in a positive signal, key figures from the previous reformist regime retain a number of senior posts.

After four months of infighting over the high-level cabinet post, Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh was appointed Iran's oil minister in late 2005. Iranian oil-industry officials describe the soft-spoken engineer as an "independent-minded man" with "an excellent understanding of his country's oil business and the need to do business with the rest of the world." Mr. Vaziri has frequently said foreign firms are welcome and strongly supports the proposed investment revisions.

After Mr. Vaziri's appointment, Mohammad-Reza Nematzadeh was appointed head of state-owned National Iranian Oil Products Refining & Distribution Co. To stave off a gasoline crisis in Iran, Mr. Nematzadeh is looking to raise $18 billion to revamp Iranian refineries during the next few years. In his previous job as deputy oil minister and director of National Iranian Petrochemical Industries Co., he was instrumental in attracting billions of dollars of foreign investment.

Hadi Nejad-Hosseinian, who is closely involved in major oil deals between Iran and foreign firms, was reappointed under Mr. Vaziri. But in a recent surprise move, Mr. Hosseinian, who is in his early 60s, retired.

Still, the positive noises from Iranian officials clash with the experience of some foreign companies.

Government negotiations with Inpex Corp., a unit of Inpex Holdings Inc., Japan's largest oil-and-gas-exploration company, on the development of Azadegan have been deadlocked in recent months, with Japan refusing to finalize the contract for the $2 billion project. Iran's oil minister recently said the Japanese firm would be granted only a nominal share in the project.

Iranian lawmakers have frequently criticized Japan's reluctance to finalize the deal and have said Iran could develop the project alone if necessary. Mr. Vaziri has said a consortium made up of domestic and international firms will be awarded the project.

DOJ_NMG_0091586

Underscoring the tension, in January, Norway's Statoil ASA wrote off $335 million in investment in the huge South Pars gas field after three years of delayed production and difficulty with Iranian contractors. The field is estimated to hold more than 280 trillion cubic feet of gas, enough to supply current U.S. gas needs for more than 12 years.

A number of other projects are also under threat, amounting to billions of investment dollars. Iran and China signed a memorandum of understanding in 2004 in which Iran would allow state-controlled China Petroleum & Chemical Corp., or Sinopec, to develop its Yadavaran oil field in southwest Iran. Iran is also pressing ahead with plans to deliver natural gas via a $6 billion pipeline to Pakistan and India.

Foreign investors are also fearful of the remaining conflict within the Iranian regime between reformists who favor foreign investment and conservative hard-liners. Mr. Ahmadinejad caused some alarm in July when he awarded a $2.3 billion contract to the engineering arm of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, Khatam-al-Anbiya Construction Headquarters, or Ghorb, to develop two future phases of South Pars.

The Revolutionary Guard played a crucial role in the nation's Islamic revolution and holds sway over a range of enterprises, particularly those involving exports and imports. Mr. Ahmadinejad served with the guard in the Iran-Iraq War.

A Shift In The Debate On International Court (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

When then-Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton nullified the U.S. signature on the International Criminal Court treaty one month into President Bush's first term, he declared it the happiest moment in his years of service. Bolton referred to the court as a "product of fuzzy-minded romanticism . . . not just naive, but dangerous."

The bipartisan concern then was that American service members deployed overseas risked exposure to a foreign tribunal. President Bill Clinton signed the Rome Treaty on his last day in office in 2000, while registering strong reservations.

Now, as the court prepares to begin public hearings on its first case, the debate among senior U.S. military officials seems to be shifting away from staunch opposition, and a fresh assessment of the court seems to be underway.

The new attitude has been prompted in part by the court's record since it began operations three years ago; Chief Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo, an Argentine, has dismissed hundreds of petitions for cases against the United States. The cases were turned down for lack of evidence, lack of jurisdiction, or because of the United States' ability to conduct its own investigations and trials. Out of some 1,500 petitions to the chief prosecutor, almost half accused the United States of war crimes.

In a letter made public last year, Moreno-Ocampo's office said it was throwing out 240 such cases concerning the war in Iraq. Reviews of each claim determined that none fell within the court's jurisdiction, his letter said, because the United States is not a signatory.

A congressional study released in August said the ICC's chief prosecutor demonstrated "a reluctance to launch an investigation against the United States" based on allegations regarding its conduct in Iraq.

To Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), ranking member of the Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee, the verdict is already in. "The ICC has refuted its critics, who confidently and wrongly predicted that it would be politicized and manipulated by our enemies to prosecute U.S. soldiers," he said recently.

Officially, the United States does not support the court and has no communication with it. "U.S. policy towards the International Criminal Court has not changed," a Defense Department spokesman, who asked not to be identified by name under rules set by the department, said Monday. "While we respect the right of other governments to join and support the ICC, we ask that governments respect the right of the United States not to join the ICC."

But court backers have noted what they consider quiet support for what the court is doing, particularly in the Darfur region of Sudan, in northern Uganda and in Congo.

For example, court advocates considered it a victory that the Bush administration abstained, instead of using its veto, when the U.N. Security Council voted to refer Sudan to the court over alleged atrocities being committed by Khartoum-backed militias in the Darfur region.

DOJ_NMG_0091587

Victoria K. Holt, a senior associate at the Henry L. Stimson Center, a research organization devoted to security issues, co-authored a study based on interviews with senior U.S. military officials, policymakers and politicians who attended a January workshop on the court. Holt and others said they were struck by the pragmatism of both active and retired American military officials, and by an evolving attitude toward the court -- a departure from the administration's stated opposition.

David Scheffer, ambassador at large for war crimes issues during the Clinton administration and a participant in the workshop, said most officers did not fear that the court would be used as a "battering ram against the United States." Rather, he said, many were concerned that by not actively supporting the court, the United States might create the impression that it does not follow internationally accepted rules of war.

"It conveys the image that we are simply intimidated by the prospect of international justice and that we have to browbeat other countries to minimize the risk we may have before the court," Scheffer said by telephone from Chicago. Scheffer is now professor of law and director of the Center for International Human Rights at Northwestern University School of Law.

Some court advocates are pushing for more concrete shows of U.S. support. Africa specialist and International Crisis Group senior adviser John Prendergast and activist actor Don Cheadle have been lobbying senators to prod the administration to share satellite images and intelligence with the court as it investigates war crimes in Darfur.

Moreover, in what seemed like an acknowledgment of the court's legitimacy from two longtime Republican critics, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former Kansas senator and onetime presidential hopeful Bob Dole penned an opinion piece published in The Washington Post on Sept. 10 reminding "Khartoum that the International Criminal Court has jurisdiction to prosecute war crimes in Darfur and that Sudanese leaders will be held personally accountable for attacks against civilians."

McCain and Dole wrote that "U.S. and allied intelligence assets, including satellite technology, should be dedicated to record any atrocities that occur in Darfur so that future prosecutions can take place."

One month after the ICC was formally established four years ago, Bush signed the American Servicemembers' Protection Act, which limits U.S. aid and curtails military training to countries that have ratified the Rome treaty that created the court. The administration negotiated "non-surrender agreements" with 100 countries to ensure that American soldiers are not handed to the ICC, under penalty of losing access to military training. Half of the countries in Latin America are affected by the agreements, although many have received waivers allowing aid to continue.

Many court supporters are arguing that now is the time for the administration to engage with the court, instead of being concerned about potential prosecutions of Americans.

U.S. absence from the court "undermines our argument to the world that we are holding up the standards we preach, and that we are accountable," said Holt, of the Stimson Center. "At a time the United States is being challenged internationally, support of the court may enhance our standing so it can work more effectively."

Panel Calls For U.N. To Be Streamlined (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 7, 2006

A high-level panel called for streamlining U.N. programs to fight poverty, provide humanitarian aid and protect the environment, saying competition among agencies often duplicates efforts and fails to deliver results, a final draft of its report says.

The draft, obtained Monday by The Associated Press, said that while the U.N. "is an indispensable force," it has outgrown its post-World War II structure and "is not as effective as it could be."

"Too often, authority and management responsibility is dispersed among individuals and across organizations, thus limiting accountability for performance and results," it said. "Better cooperation between organizations has been hindered by competition for funding, by mission creep and by outdated business practices."

Secretary-General Kofi Annan established the 13-member panel in response to a call by world leaders at their September 2005 summit for coordinated U.N. operations to meet development goals, including cutting extreme poverty by half and ensuring universal primary education by 2015.

DOJ_NMG_0091588

It will be up to Annan's successor, Ban Ki-Moon, who takes over as secretary-general on Jan. 1, to decide whether to implement the panel's recommendations. The panel's co-chairs, Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and Mozambique's Prime Minister Luisa Dias Diogo, are expected to present the report Thursday.

"The essence of our vision is for the U.N. to deliver as one in the areas of development, humanitarian assistance and the environment," the panel said.

"The U.N. system now encompasses 16 specialized agencies, 14 funds and programs, 17 departments and offices of the U.N. Secretariat, five regional commissions, five research and training institutes and a plethora of regional and country level structures," the draft said.

Weak and disjointed U.N. operations coupled with "inadequate and unpredictable funding have contributed to policy incoherence, duplicating functions and operational ineffectiveness," it said.

A survey by the panel found, for example, that more than one-third of U.N. country teams include 10 or more U.N. agencies carrying out separate operations, and "several teams include 20 or more."

At the global level, the draft said, more than 20 U.N. agencies are active and competing for limited resources in some areas, such as water and energy, and more than 30 U.N. agencies and programs have a stake in environmental management.

A survey by the panel found that the three agreements reached at the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro — on biodiversity, climate and desertification — have up to 230 meeting days every year. "Add the figures for seven other major global environmental agreements ... and that number rises to almost 400 days," the draft said.

Developing countries "are unable to cope with the extensive reporting and participation requirements" of global environmental treaties, which take time, money and expertise away from actually implementing the agreements, the draft said.

The panel said its recommendations can "potentially radically change the way the U.N. operates at headquarters, in each region and in each country."

The panel called for one U.N. program in every country, "not 10 or 20 fragmented and uncoordinated programs delivered by different arms of the U.N." That program would respond to the country's need, the community's views and be approved by the government, it said.

A new U.N. oversight body reporting to the U.N. Economic and Social Council would be responsible for the performance of the single U.N. country program, the draft said.

It called for a new partnership for humanitarian assistance, including the U.N., governments, the International Red Cross and non-governmental organizations led by the U.N. emergency relief coordinator.

The draft also recommended the Nairobi-based U.N. Environment Program be the center of a strong system for environmental protection.

It called for "one strong voice on women's issues in the U.N. system to ensure that the pursuit of gender equality and women's empowerment are taken seriously."

It also called for "one clear framework" to reinvigorate the promotion and protection of human rights, with the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights at the center.

Top Job For US Official Raises UN Reform Fear (FT)

By Mark Turner At The United Nations

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

Josette Sheeran, a US undersecretary of state, appears almost certain to be named as head of the UN World Food Programme on Tuesday, in a decision diplomats fear marks an early blow to reform promises by Ban Ki-moon, the incoming secretary-general.

A UN official said that James Morris, the current head of the WFP, told senior staff at the weekend of the decision to appoint the US official candidate to a post traditionally viewed as a US fiefdom. The announcement, some diplomats believe, would be an indication that fledgling efforts to make appointments on technical merit have foundered.

DOJ_NMG_0091589

The decision was officially taken by Kofi Annan, the current UN secretary-general, in partnership with Jacques Diouf, head of the Food and Agriculture Organisation. But the outcome would be viewed as a clue to the operating style of Mr Ban, with whom Mr Annan consulted.

According to a number of diplomats and officials, there had been early indications that another candidate – Tony Banbury, WFP's regional director for Asia and a former White House employee – had led on merit. While an American, he was not Washington's choice.

But late last week it emerged that, following high-level US lobbying and consultations between Mr Annan and Mr Ban, the decision was made to go with the US government's official nominee.

Ms Sheeran serves as undersecretary of state for economic, business and agricultural affairs, but commentators have noted her history as managing editor of the Washington Times and her association with Rev Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church, which part-owns the newspaper.

According to South Korean officials and one senior UN adviser, Mr Ban did not alter Mr Annan's decision. Seoul's deputy UN ambassador, Oh Joon, insisted on Friday that Mr Ban only came to know about the WFP process last week and that in a telephone call he told Mr Annan he respected the process and decision he had already made.

But several diplomats believe Mr Ban helped sway the process, raising questions about his willingness to assert the UN's independence when put under pressure by powerful governments.

Mr Oh said Mr Ban's first priority, when he arrives in New York in the next few weeks, will be to staff his private cabinet. But there is also mounting speculation as to how he will share out powerful jobs such as political affairs and peacekeeping.

Mr Ban campaigned on a platform of UN reform, but it is unclear whether he will go down the traditional route of sharing out top jobs between the strongest countries or will assert his independence and appoint a professional cadre of technocrats.

Sheeran Will Lead U.N. Food Program (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan today will nominate Josette Sheeran, a senior State Department official and former managing editor of The Washington Times, to be executive director of the World Food Program, U.N. officials said.

The five-year appointment remains subject to approval later today by the WFP executive board, which is considered a formality. Miss Sheeran is expected to take up her duties as head of the Rome-based agency, which administers nearly $3 billion in annual food aid, early next year.

At the State Department, where she has served since August 2005 as undersecretary of state for business, economic and agricultural affairs, Miss Sheeran is charged with promoting the interests of U.S. farmers and business owners in global policy discussions, according to her official biography.

Before that, she served as deputy in the office of U.S. Trade Representative Robert B. Zoellick, where she negotiated agreements with African, Asian and Latin American countries.

From 1997 to 2000, Miss Sheeran was president and chief executive officer of Empower America, where she was a high-profile presence on the media, academic and fundraising circuits. She was an editor of The Washington Times from its founding in 1982 until she left as managing editor of The Times in 1997 to join Empower America.

Miss Sheeran, 52, was selected by Mr. Annan last year to sit on a panel advising the United Nations on how to more effectively deliver humanitarian relief and development assistance.

The report of the High-Level Panel on System-wide Coherence, a group that includes leaders of Pakistan, Mozambique, Norway and senior ministers of several other countries, is to be released Thursday.

Miss Sheeran was chosen for the WFP post from a short list, which was never formally announced but was said by Secretariat officials to have included WFP Asia director Tony Banbury, an American with ties to the Clinton White House; Swiss development minister Walter Fust; and Robert Fowler, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0091590

But the appointment of Miss Sheeran, the Bush administration's nominee, had been expected: Washington contributes about one-third of the WFP's $2.9 billion budget and often applies pressure to ensure its nominees are successful. An American has managed the WFP for about the past 15 years.

The WFP is one of the United Nations' most prominent agencies, with primary responsibility for feeding the victims of conflicts, natural disasters and long-building famines. Last year, the agency fed nearly 100 million people in 82 countries.

Miss Sheeran will oversee a staff of 10,500 across the world, who deliver 4.2 million tons of high-energy biscuits, enriched milk and flour, and other food staples to people in need.

The United States contributes about $1 billion a year to the WFP, in cash as well as food staples and logistical support. The European Commission is generally the second largest donor, with $200 million, and Japan is third, with about $136 million in voluntary contributions.

This is likely to be the last appointment by Mr. Annan, who leaves office on Dec. 31. The United States has called on him repeatedly not to make any long-term appointments that will bind his successor, Ban Ki-moon of South Korea.

However, the administration lobbied hard for Miss Sheeran's appointment, according to U.N. sources, who said Washington wants to keep an eye on an agency whose work is largely U.S.-funded.

Sources in Washington, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the administration initially had planned to nominate Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, who is not seeking re-election today. Instead, Mr. Kolbe was nominated to head the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. The fund's board met last week but was unable to agree on a new executive director.

Ortega Set To Reclaim Nicaraguan Presidency (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 6 -- Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist president and nemesis of President Ronald Reagan, appears to have won back Nicaragua's top job.

With 62 percent of precincts reporting, Ortega was comfortably leading the field of five presidential contenders with 39 percent of the vote, virtually ensuring him a first-round win under Nicaragua's electoral rules.

In a public appearance Monday night, Ortega, 60, declined to declare victory until the full count was in. "We are ready to work together [with the other candidates] to eradicate the poverty of Nicaragua, to provide security to the private sector, to provide security to the diverse foreigners in our country . . . and to develop relations with the entire international community," Ortega said, as his wife and campaign manager, Rosario Murillo, stood grinning by his side.

If the results from Sunday's vote hold, they will mark a stunning comeback for the Cold War icon, who has failed twice to regain power since 1990, when voters disillusioned by a decade-long war with U.S.-backed insurgents and government abuses cast his Sandinista National Liberation Front from office.

Ortega's return to Nicaragua's presidency would also constitute an embarrassing setback for the Bush administration. American officials have recently made thinly veiled threats that the United States would impose economic sanctions and other punitive measures if Ortega was reelected, arguing that Ortega has not changed despite his embrace of Catholicism, pronouncements in favor of a market economy and efforts to cast himself as the candidate of "reconciliation."

U.S. officials appeared motivated in part by concerns that Ortega would be an eager partner in pushing an anti-American alliance with Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez. Ortega's return is particularly galling to many in the Bush administration who devoted their careers to getting rid of him in the 1980s.

Longtime political analysts in Managua said that Ortega was too pragmatic to attempt to resurrect controversial policies implemented during his 1979-90 government that drew international condemnation -- such as military conscription, confiscation of some private property and press censorship.

"Ortega is not going to be stupid and commit the mistakes of the past," said Emilio ?lvarez, an analyst and critic of the Sandinistas. "He knows that the Soviet parachute is gone and that he is totally dependent on the assistance of the United States, the International Monetary Fund and foreign investment."

DOJ_NMG_0091591

Instead, ?Ivarez predicted that Ortega would try to reach out to Nicaragua's impoverished populace with more modest measures, such as raising taxes to pay for salary increases for low-level government workers and for increased spending on education.

Still ?Ivarez worried that Ortega "is erratic. He has these messianic dreams of being the savior of the people that make him vulnerable to unworkable economic schemes."

During the campaign, Ortega caused alarm in the business community by suggesting that he wanted to compel banks to lower the fees they charge Nicaraguans living overseas to wire money to relatives back home.

Carlos Chamorro, editor of the respected weekly newsmagazine Confidencial who broke with the Sandinistas a decade ago, agreed. "Nobody thinks the country is going to go belly up with Ortega," said Chamorro, whose mother, Violeta Chamorro, defeated Ortega in the 1990 elections. "But he represents a step backwards because he could bring economic uncertainty and slow the process of investment and job creation."

Ortega's supporters, including many underemployed youths too young to remember the years of Sandinista rule, are convinced that he is the only candidate who empathizes with their plight. As word of his early lead filtered out, they poured into Managua's streets, setting off firecrackers and cheering ecstatically.

Ortega's closest rivals, meanwhile, held news conferences Monday to announce that they were not yet ready to accept defeat.

"This is not over until the last vote is counted," said Eduardo Montealegre of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance, who trailed Ortega by 8 points in the preliminary count.

Jos? Rizo, of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party, said the preliminary results were misleading because they did not include many polling stations in Nicaragua's remote rural areas, where his support is strongest. He said a count by his campaign workers put him close enough behind Ortega to force a runoff election.

However, the results released by the electoral commission were bolstered by similar findings from a "quick count" of a representative sample of ballots released Monday by Ethics and Transparency, a widely respected Nicaraguan civic group that fielded 11,050 observers to every polling and counting center in the nation to carry out their own tally alongside the official one.

At a news conference in Managua on Monday, Pablo Ay?n, president of Ethics and Transparency, said their count, giving Ortega 38 percent of the vote, had a margin of error of 1.7 percent.

Although there were complaints of irregularities at some polling stations, international observer teams declared that the election was orderly and lawful.

Leftist Headed Toward Victory In Nicaragua (NYT)

By James C. McKkinley Jr. And Jill Replogle

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 6 — Sixteen years after he left power, Daniel Ortega, a former Marxist president and the Sandinista leader who is still regarded as a sworn foe by many in Washington, appeared headed to a victory on Monday in the Nicaraguan presidential election.

Though electoral officials had yet to release final tallies from Sunday's vote, preliminary results and the country's electoral watchdog groups all indicated that Mr. Ortega, who had failed three times before to gain the presidency in elections, would win a clear victory.

An Ortega win in a five-way race would be a defeat for the Bush administration, which strongly opposed his election and worked hard to unite a fractious opposition against him with little success. The White House has said it would withdraw aid from an Ortega government.

With about 61 percent of the vote counted, Mr. Ortega had 38.6 percent of the ballots, about 8 points ahead of the second-place candidate, Eduardo Montealegre, a Harvard-educated financier and conservative Washington has openly supported. Final results were not expected until Tuesday, an election official said.

DOJ_NMG_0091592

Now 60 years old and balding, Mr. Ortega has maintained he is no longer a Marxist, but more of a pragmatist. He has promised to keep good relations with the United States and chose a former political opponent as his running mate. He has also vowed to help the poor and run a positive campaign around the themes of "peace, love and unity."

But he maintains close ties to Cuba and to Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, the leftist president who has become a thorn in the side of the United States. Mr. Chávez gave the Ortega campaign significant support by sending subsidized oil to Nicaragua and distributing it through Sandinista politicians.

Mr. Ortega's expected victory appeared to be another gain for leftists in Latin America, who, despite recent setbacks in Peru and Mexico, have also persuaded voters to abandon conservative governments in Brazil, Argentina, Chile and Bolivia.

Although the results were preliminary, supporters of the Sandinista National Liberation Front party of Mr. Ortega set off fireworks around the city on Monday, and drove around honking horns, shouting victory slogans and waving red and black Sandinista flags. Mr. Ortega had yet to make a statement.

Cuba immediately congratulated Mr. Ortega. "This is good for the people of Nicaragua and for the integration of Latin America," Foreign Minister Felipe Pérez Roque told The Associated Press on Monday.

Mr. Ortega's opponents refused to recognize his expected victory until all the votes were counted. The United States took a similar stance. The State Department's deputy spokesman, Tom Casey, said Monday that the administration would wait to comment until the Nicaraguan electoral council announced who won. He also said it was too early to comment on procedural problems during the voting, noting that several groups of observers planned to file reports.

Mr. Casey said the United States delegation in Nicaragua had remarked on "high turnout and given praise to the Nicaraguan people for their patience and their willingness to show support for this democratic process."

Mr. Ortega was one of the leaders of the Sandinista rebels that swept to power in 1979, toppling the Somoza dynasty of right-wing dictators friendly to the United States and setting up an authoritarian left-wing government.

With the cold war still driving United States policy, President Reagan imposed sanctions on the country and financed anti-Sandinista guerrillas, known as contras, in part by secretly selling arms to the revolutionary Islamic government in Iran. It was Mr. Ortega who led his Soviet-backed army in a bloody decade-long civil war.

The last time Mr. Ortega ran Nicaragua, he seized private assets and redistributed land to peasants. Capital fled the country, along with many of its business leaders. He vows a different approach this time.

The advertising campaign against the former rebel leader was vicious, showing images from the civil war, women weeping, guns blaring. His opponents lost no chance to remind people of the economic collapse that followed the fighting and the United States embargo.

Mr. Ortega was elected president in 1984 and served from 1985 to 1990, before losing to Violeta Chamorro. He struggled to regain power through the ballot box, but without success, in 1996 and 2001.

This time, however, a change in the election law and a strong throw-the-bums-out sentiment in the country after campaign financing scandals involving former President Enrique Bolaños helped carry him to what appears to be a victory.

He was also aided significantly by a change in election rules that allows a candidate to win in the first round with only 35 percent of the vote, so long as he is 5 points above his closest opponent. If Mr. Ortega had not won on the first round, most political strategists predicted he would not have survived a second round, as the splintered anti-Sandinista vote would have united.

As it was, the anti-Sandinista vote seemed split mostly between Mr. Montealegre, with 30.9 percent, and José Rizo, the candidate of the conservative ruling party, who had 22.9 percent, according to the Supreme Electoral Council, the Nicaraguan election authority. Two other candidates, Edmundo Jarquín, a dissident former Sandinista, and Edén Pastora, a former Sandinista who later became a contra rebel, trailed behind.

Results of a quick count carried out by a local monitoring group, Ethics and Transparency, tracked with the official results.

"It's been a pretty exact count, we can say that Ortega's triumph is almost sure," said Carlos Tunnerman, a political analyst and former Nicaraguan ambassador to Washington from 1984 to 1988.

DOJ_NMG_0091593

Former President Jimmy Carter, who was in Nicaragua to monitor the election, said the quick count was "among the most definitive I have ever seen." The count is based on a large, and strategically varied, sample of votes from urban and rural areas and different social strata, explained Mr. Carter and local analysts.

On Sunday night, following the first presentation of results by the election authorities, Mr. Montealegre denounced the early closing of some polling places and problems with the delivery of voter identification cards. He said he would not concede defeat until all votes were counted.

Mr. Carter agreed that there were minor problems with the voting process, but said he did not think they were significant enough to affect the results.

"The likelihood is that those few anomalies, which exist in every election in the world, will not be substantive enough collectively to change the apparent results of this election," Mr. Carter said.

Electoral observers have said the vote was mostly peaceful and orderly, despite long lines and some angry confrontations among voters who claimed polling stations closed before they could vote.

Observers from the Organization of American States said 2 percent of potential voters were not able to cast ballots, and they estimated turnout around 70 percent, The A.P. reported.

Because the front-runner was a cold-war icon for the left, the race generated interest in the United States. Even Oliver North, a former White House aide to President Reagan, visited to speak against Mr. Ortega. Mr. North was at the heart of what became known as the Iran-contra affair.

But in recent years, American money has flowed into Nicaragua in the form of investments. The country has cheap labor and low crime rates, and recently joined the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

During his campaign, Mr. Ortega emphasized his goal of peace and reconciliation, choosing bright pink as the color for his campaign and adopting the rhythm of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" for his jingle.

For some, Mr. Ortega and the Sandinistas still conjure up memories of the war and tough economic times. Marlon José Sánchez Padilla, 36, who sold oranges on Sunday outside of a polling station in the town of Nindirí, bitterly recalled his two years of military service in the 1980s. "Many people were mutilated," he said. "Now he promises the sky, earth and highways, but we don't believe him anymore."

Others at the polls on Sunday said it was time to give Mr. Ortega another chance. "It seems that Daniel Ortega has asked for pardon," said Ninosca Leets, 46, a housewife who said she fled to the United States during the former Sandinista government. "He's asked for reconciliation. He's asked for a change, and I think he should be given the opportunity."

Ortega Nears Victory In Nicaragua Election (WSJ)

By Jose de Cordoba

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Sandinista Party leader Daniel Ortega appeared headed toward a first-round victory in Nicaragua's presidential election, handing the U.S. a diplomatic defeat and bolstering populist forces in Latin America led by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

With returns in from about 61% of polling stations in Sunday's election, the 60-year-old Mr. Ortega, a former guerrilla leader and president, had an eight-percentage-point lead over conservative rival Eduardo Montealegre. Yesterday, an analysis of the vote by a respected civic organization, the Nicaraguan Civic Group for Ethics and Transparency, said Mr. Ortega would win about 38% of ballots cast. He needed at least 35% to avoid a runoff.

While Mr. Ortega campaigned as the candidate of reconciliation and has refrained from criticizing the U.S., his victory will no doubt be seen as a triumph for Mr. Chávez, whose influence had been waning lately owing to a number of setbacks. He had failed in his attempt to win a seat on the United Nation's Security Council and his political allies in Peru and Ecuador lost, in part, because they were identified with Mr. Chávez and his rhetoric.

In Nicaragua, Mr. Chávez may have won some votes for Mr. Ortega by supplying Sandinista allies with cut-rate diesel fuel and fertilizer. Mr. Chávez also has promised to set up an arm of Venezuela's development bank in Nicaragua to fund local projects.

DOJ_NMG_0091594

Washington, on the other hand, actively campaigned against Mr. Ortega, in a kind of echo of the battles of the 1980s, when a U.S.-backed rebel force known as the Contras battled Mr. Ortega's Sandinista government. The U.S. ambassador staged a public campaign against Mr. Ortega and senior U.S. officials said aid and investment could be sharply cut and the country would come to ruin if Mr. Ortega triumphed. Political analysts are sure to debate whether the U.S. campaign backfired.

Mr. Ortega is a hard-knuckle political boss with a devoted, though minority, following, according to most polls. He had lost three previous attempts at the presidency because many Nicaraguans identified him with the hyperinflation, scarcity and the 30,000 dead left by the country's decadelong civil war against Contra forces. He succeeded this time because his opposition was fractured and he had cut a political deal that reduced the percentage of the vote needed to win in the first round to 35% from 45%.

In deeply religious Nicaragua, Mr. Ortega received a politically beneficial blessing from his old foe, Managua's retired but powerful Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo. The cardinal married Mr. Ortega and Rosario Murillo, his longtime companion and closest political adviser. Perhaps not coincidentally, the Sandinistas reversed course and helped to overturn a 100-year-old law that permitted abortion in case of danger to the mother's life; the practice is completely outlawed.

Mr. Ortega and the Sandinistas came to power in Nicaragua in 1979 when they toppled the U.S.-backed dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza. He left power after being defeated in elections in 1990, though the Sandinista leadership allegedly stole hundreds of millions of dollars in state lands and assets.

One of the poorest countries in the Americas, Nicaragua has been experiencing an economic upturn thanks in part to a free-trade agreement with the U.S. that has spurred investment and to a modest tourism boom. To keep the country on track, Mr. Ortega will have to convince the U.S., as well as his countrymen, that he has changed from his days as a doctrinaire Communist.

"Nicaragua is like a plane that is taking off. If the pilot makes a bad move, the plane will crash," says Antonio Lacayo, a prominent businessman here. "Ortega must convince everyone that he will keep Nicaragua within the system of free enterprise and civil liberties and democracy."

Mr. Ortega says his days as a Marxist revolutionary are behind him and that he would like to have friendly relations with the U.S. Many fear his authoritarian tendencies could be given free rein if he gets generous financing and strategic support from Mr. Chávez.

Mr. Ortega's supporters rejoiced. "It's going to be different this time," said Pedro Joaquin Romero, a former Sandinista lieutenant, who has been confined to a wheelchair since a 1986 ambush by Contras. "I think he can get the country moving forward."

Ortega's Likely Return Seen As A Blow To US Policy (FT)

By Adam Thomson In Managua

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista guerrilla leader and leftwing president, on Monday appeared on course to return to power in Nicaragua after an absence of 16 years, according to an incomplete count by electoral authorities.

With about 40 per cent of votes counted by Monday evening, the 60-year-old Mr Ortega was in the lead with 40.1 per cent. Eduardo Montealegre, a former banker and the centre-right candidate for the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance (ALN), was trailing by about seven percentage points.

An Ortega victory would be a blow for US foreign policy in central America. The leader of the National Liberation Sandinista Front (FSLN) needs 40 per cent of the vote or at least 35 per cent with a minimum margin of 5 per cent over the second-placed candidate to avoid a run-off.

Ever since Mr Ortega lost power to the centre-right Violeta de Chamorro in 1990, Washington has manoeuvred to avoid his re-election. During this year's election campaign, Paul Trivelli, the US ambassador in Managua, has spoken out frequently to warn Nicaraguans of the perceived dangers of a Sandinista government.

Recently Mr Trivelli also warned of Mr Ortega's growing friendship with Hugo Chávez, the oil-rich and anti-US Venezuelan president.

DOJ_NMG_0091595

In a recent interview with the Financial Times, Mr Trivelli even warned that an Ortega-led government would provoke significant changes to the currently healthy bilateral relationship.

"The whole gamut of the relationship that I talked about between the US and Nicaragua would definitely be re-examined – and not only by the executive or the State Department or the White House but by the US Congress," he said.

On Sunday, however, the US government's fears appeared to find little echo among voters. Thousands of electoral observers, including many sent by the European Union and the Organisation of American States, reported trouble-free voting.

In the afternoon, citizens lined up peacefully at a polling station in Granada, Nicaragua's oldest city, while polling officials stained the right thumbs of those who had already voted.

Even so, a statement issued on Sunday by the US presidential delegation said that it had received reports of anomalies such as the premature closing of voting stations as well as slow counting. It concluded: "We are therefore not in a position at this time to make an overall judgment on the fairness and transparency of the process."

On the campaign trail, Mr Ortega, who still wears his trademark moustache but has swapped his military fatigues for casual civilian clothes, has done his best to reassure Nicaraguans that his government would be different to the one he headed in the 1980s.

As part of his message of peace and national unity, Mr Ortega has ruled out the possibility of bringing back compulsory military service.

While his speeches have contained anti-US rhetoric – he has mentioned his desire to modify the Cafta trade pact – he has also defended private business and has ruled out a return to property confiscations.

Ortega Seen Winning Nicaragua Election (AP)

By Traci Carl

AP, November 7, 2006

Daniel Ortega, the revolutionary Marxist who battled a U.S.-backed Contra insurgency in the 1980s, was closing in on Nicaragua's presidency, appearing Monday to have defeated four opponents with promises that he was a changed man.

Electoral officials had yet to release final results from Sunday's vote, but preliminary results and two of the country's top electoral watchdog groups all gave Ortega about 40 percent of the vote. That was more than enough to avoid a runoff against Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre, who trailed by at least seven percentage points.

Ortega's rivals refused to recognize his victory, saying they would wait until all the votes had been counted. The United States, which has threatened to pull aid from an Ortega government, also said it was too soon to declare the Sandinista leader a winner.

"This isn't over until the last vote has been counted," Montealegre said.

If his victory is confirmed, the Cold War icon would join a growing number of leftist Latin American rulers, led by Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, who has tried to help his Nicaraguan ally by shipping cheap oil to the poor, energy-starved nation.

"This is good for the people of Nicaragua and for the integration of Latin America," Cuban Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque told The Associated Press Monday.

Ortega's supporters celebrated in the streets late Sunday, swaying to his campaign song set to the tune of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance."

Herberto Jose Lopez, who earns about $235 a month selling CDs from a kiosk, said Monday he voted for Ortega in hopes that he would help Nicaragua's poor.

"I've got a wife and kid and I'm lucky because I have a job, but most people will tell you the same thing: The current administration just governs for the guys in ties," said the 32-year-old Lopez.

Some Nicaraguans worried that an Ortega win would drive away the country's business leaders and elite, as they did the first time he came to power.

"We're just trying to figure out which country to go to," said 27-year-old Karen Sandoval, a Coca-Cola marketer shopping with a friend at an upscale Managua mall. "This sets the country back 20 years."

DOJ_NMG_0091596

Ortega, who served as president from 1985-90, toned down his once fiery rhetoric during the campaign, promising to support the Central American Free Trade Agreement and even maintain good relations with Washington.

The balding, 60-year-old leftist often appears more preacher than revolutionary, calling for peace and reconciliation and urging his supporters to pray.

He says he has changed profoundly since he befriended Soviet leaders, expropriated land and fought Contra rebels in a war that left 30,000 dead and the economy in shambles.

An Ortega victory would cap a 16-year quest to return to his old job. Ortega lost the presidency in 1990, ending Sandinista rule and the Contra war. He has run for president in every election since.

Ortega's vote percentage was similar to what he received in his last two failed presidential bids, but the right was divided this time between Montealegre and ruling party candidate Jose Rizo. The constitution allowed him to win on the first round with only 35 percent of the vote and a lead of five percentage points over his closest rival.

With 40 percent of the vote counted, Ortega had 40 percent to Montealegre's 33 percent. Three other candidates trailed: Rizo, Sandinista dissident Edmundo Jarquin and former Contra rebel Eden Pastora. Statistical surveys of votes conducted by two respected Nicaraguan electoral watchdog groups also both gave Ortega a similar margin.

Electoral observers have said the vote was mostly peaceful and orderly, despite long lines and angry confrontations by people who said polling stations closed before they could vote. Observers from the Organization of American States said 2 percent of potential voters weren't able to cast a ballot, and they estimated turnout around 70 percent.

The race generated intense international interest, including a visit by Oliver North, the former White House aide at the heart of the Iran-Contra controversy, which created a huge scandal when it emerged that Washington secretly sold arms to Iran and used the money to arm the Contras.

These days, U.S. money is flowing to Nicaragua in the form of investments by foreign companies drawn by the country's cheap labor, low crime rates and recent decision to join the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

Nicaraguan presidents cannot serve consecutive terms, and President Enrique Bolanos steps down Jan. 10.

Ortega Headed Back To Power In Nicaragua (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA — Daniel Ortega, the rebel leader driven from power 16 years ago by a U.S.-backed war and the missteps of his own Sandinista movement, was cruising Monday toward victory and an unlikely political resurrection in Nicaragua's presidential vote.

The result was a blow to the Bush administration, which worked actively to discourage Nicaraguans from voting for Ortega, a 60-year-old former Marxist now allied with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, the bete noire of Latin American and U.S. conservatives.

With 62% of the ballots counted, Ortega was outpolling conservative challenger Eduardo Montealegre, 39% to 31%. Two separate "quick counts" that took samples of the vote found Ortega would win a clear and "irrefutable" first-round triumph.

Ortega's apparent victory was celebrated Monday evening in the impoverished neighborhoods of this and other Nicaraguan cities, where the Sandinista National Liberation Front's core supporters have remained loyal through years of revolution, counterrevolution and electoral defeats.

Cars cruised down Managua's main streets with horns honking and passengers waving the black and red flag of the Sandinista Front.

"I feel like I did in 1979, because this is a new revolution," said Violeta Mena, 44, remembering the day when the Sandinistas marched into Managua after defeating the army of dictator Anastasio Somoza. "This is not an armed revolution, it's a revolution for social justice."

Though his followers still call him el comandante, Ortega won by reinventing himself as a moderate and a dealmaker in the long tradition of Latin American populist politics.

DOJ_NMG_0091597

Over the last two years, Ortega has forged a series of cunning alliances that have left his opponents on both ends of the political spectrum weak and divided.

Ortega reconciled with former enemies, including the hierarchy of the local Roman Catholic Church and former commanders of the right-wing Contra army who fought to overthrow him in the 1980s. And Sandinista legislators used their influence to change the rules of the electoral contest to make a first-round victory easier.

"He's a smart man and a shrewd politician, obviously," former President Carter said. Carter, who as president met Ortega when the Sandinistas came to power in the 1979 revolution, was leading a 62-observer delegation here.

Having pulled off an unlikely political second act, Ortega "has an opportunity to heal his country and to heal the disparity between his country and the United States," Carter said.

Ortega was winning a first-round victory in Sunday's vote thanks in large measure to a constitutional amendment the Sandinistas negotiated with one of Nicaragua's most powerful politicians — former President Arnoldo Aleman, now serving a 20-year sentence for fraud and money laundering.

The amendment lowered the threshold for a first-round victory from 45% to 35%. Aleman, in exchange, received a loosening of the conditions of his house arrest.

In 1990, 1996 and 2001 Ortega lost presidential elections to conservative candidates even though he won a greater percentage of the votes in each of those races than he did Sunday.

Carter and other international and Nicaraguan observers said the voting had proceeded normally, despite claims by conservative candidates and the dissident Sandinista Renovation Movement of widespread irregularities.

"The election has taken place in a climate of tranquillity," said Claudio Fava, head of the European Union's team of election monitors. "Above all, it is a victory for the Nicaraguan people…. There was no fraud."

U.S. officials, who had strongly urged Nicaraguans not to vote for Ortega and threatened economic consequences, responded cautiously Monday, saying they would withhold comment pending final results.

"The Nicaraguan electorate has responsibility for choosing its leaders," a State Department statement said. "We will work with those leaders based on their commitment to actions in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

After meeting with Carter at a Managua hotel Monday night, Ortega told reporters that Nicaragua would continue to "give security to the private sector, protect foreign and national investors … and work to eradicate poverty in the country."

Ortega's opponents were not prepared to concede defeat.

"This is a battle to transform Nicaragua," Montealegre, a Harvard-educated banker, said Monday morning. "It won't be over until the last vote is counted."

Another conservative candidate, Jose Rizo of the Liberal Constitutional Party, was running third in the official count, with 23% of the vote.

Oscar Rene Vargas, a sociologist and political analyst here, said the split in the conservative vote, along with a lingering crisis of poverty, immigration and unemployment, helped deliver a Sandinista victory.

Between 1990 and 2005, he said, the number of Nicaraguans living in poverty increased from 2 million to 4 million.

"People had a lot of expectations that life would get better" with conservative governments, Vargas said. "Instead, life got worse." Hundreds of thousands of Nicaraguans emigrated to neighboring Costa Rica, El Salvador and other countries in search of work.

With Ortega looking strong in polls before the election, Paul Trivelli, the U.S. ambassador in Managua, worked behind the scenes to unite Nicaragua's conservative politicians behind a single, anti-Ortega candidate.

Trivelli warned that $220 million in U.S. aid to Nicaragua could be imperiled in the event of an Ortega victory, and U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said U.S. aid to the country would be endangered if "anti-democratic forces" prevailed in Nicaragua. Three Republican congressmen called on the Bush administration to stop people in the U.S. from sending money to Nicaragua should Ortega win.

The American lobbying has been enough to alarm the Organization of American States, which in October said it "regretted" the U.S. intervention. "The future of Nicaragua's political institutions should depend only on the decisions of the people of this nation," an OAS observer mission said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0091598

The European Union and watchdog groups have been critical of Venezuelan attempts to influence the Nicaraguan vote. Chavez is widely believed to have helped fund the Ortega campaign, which dominated the airwaves here.

Michael Shifter, vice president of Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington research group, said U.S. officials have been disturbed at the prospect of Ortega's return. But he said the U.S. effort to prevent Nicaragua from turning to Ortega was out of proportion to any threat the politician could pose to the country and region.

"It's a setback to U.S. policy, but sort of a self-inflicted one, since he's not crucial to U.S. security interests, as they set him up to be," Shifter said.

He said Ortega was not likely to try to push Nicaragua far to the left, and would have to remain closer to the center to accomplish his goals in the country and the region. Ortega will be an ally of the left-leaning regimes in Venezuela, Cuba and Bolivia, but "his capacity to extend his influence is limited," he said.

Who is Ortega?

1945: Born in La Libertad, Nicaragua, to middle-class parents.

1963: Joins Marxist Sandinista National Liberation Front.

1967: Arrested and imprisoned on bank robbery charges.

1974: Released in exchange for hostages, becomes a Sandinista commander.

1979: Sandinistas overthrow dictator Anastasio Somoza and form five-person Junta of National Reconstruction. Under the junta, Nicaragua makes advances in literacy, healthcare, women's rights and working conditions, but sparks opposition with land seizures, economic controls and forced relocation of Miskito Indians.

1984: Elected president, amid boycott by opposition groups.

1986: President Reagan warns that defeat of the U.S.-funded Contra rebels would create "a privileged sanctuary for terrorists and subversives just two days' driving time from Harlingen, Texas."

1990: Loses presidential election to former junta member Violeta Barrios de Chamorro amid spiraling inflation, a U.S. trade embargo and widespread discontent over conscription to fight the U.S.-supported Contra war.

Nicaragua's Ortega Ready For Comeback (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Daniel Ortega, the Marxist who led the fight against U.S.-backed Contra rebels in the 1980s, appeared to be heading to victory in Nicaragua's presidential election, according to partial results released Monday.

The Bush administration openly supported his two conservative opponents to block the election of another leader in Latin America with anti-U.S. leanings. Venezuela and Bolivia have elected anti-American leftists. Brazil also has a leftist president.

U.S. officials, including Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Paul Trivelli, the U.S. ambassador to Nicaragua, warned that foreign investors might move elsewhere if Ortega won. Trivelli has called Ortega's democratic credentials “very doubtful.”

During his campaign, Ortega called for unity and reconciliation and vowed he would maintain the country's vital economic ties with the United States, which has provided $1.2 billion in aid since 1990. But he also said he would strengthen relations with Latin American leaders such as Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

With more than 60% of the vote counted, the Supreme Electoral Council said Ortega had 39% of the vote and Eduardo Montealegre, a U.S.-backed, Harvard-educated banker, had 31%. Three other candidates in the race trailed. Ortega needed 35% and a 5-point lead to avoid a runoff.

It would be a remarkable comeback for the former president and Sandinista leader who for the past 16 years has tried and failed to recapture leadership.

Jubilant Ortega supporters filled the capital's streets late Sunday after the vote. Opponents said the celebration was premature. “This isn't over until the last vote has been counted,” Montealegre said.

Ortega, 60, was elected president in 1984. The next year, a five-year war broke out against U.S.-backed contra rebels. Nicaragua is the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere after Haiti, according to the U.S. State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0091599

Asked by reporters in Washington on Monday whether it was possible Ortega had changed since his Marxist days, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared skeptical. “We'll see,” she said.

Nations Fight Perceived Corruption Image (AP)

By David Rising

AP, November 7, 2006

Nearly three-quarters of 163 countries ranked in a new survey suffer from a perception of serious corruption, while in nearly half it is seen as rampant, a watchdog group reported Monday.

Transparency International's 2006 Corruption Perceptions Index gives the worst scores to many of the world's poorest countries, including almost all African nations, indicating a strong correlation between corruption and poverty.

The stragglers also included several so-called "failed states," including Iraq, which dropped from place 137 last year to second-last as the situation there continues to deteriorate.

"Corruption traps millions in poverty," the agency's international chairman Huguette Labelle said in a statement. "Despite a decade of progress in establishing anti-corruption laws and regulations, today's results indicate that much remains to be done."

The agency's scale is based on the perceptions of the degree of corruption by businesspeople and country analysts. Countries are ranked out of 10, and anything below five indicates "serious" perceived levels of corruption, and anything below 3 "rampant," the agency said.

Several former Soviet republics fared relatively well, with Estonia ranking 24th with a 6.7 rating, Lithuania with 4.8 in 46th and Latvia with 4.7 in 49th. Estonia's place was the highest of the 10 mostly former communist countries that joined the EU in 2004.

In contrast, the perception of corruption in Russia was a dismal 2.5, putting it in a 121st place tie with several other nations including Rwanda and Swaziland. Even Kazakhstan fared better, scoring 2.6.

Faring the best were Finland, Iceland and New Zealand, in a first-place tie with rankings of 9.6.

Filling out the top 10 were Denmark, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland, Norway, Australia, and the Netherlands.

Britain was 11th with an 8.6 rating, Germany 16th at 8.0 and the United States 20th with 7.3.

France tied with Ireland with a 7.4 rating in 18th place, while Italy mustered only 4.9 in 45th place.

The only African countries to score more than 5 were Botswana and Mauritius.

At the bottom of the list in place 163 was Haiti with a 1.8 rating, just slightly worse than Guinea, Iraq and Myanmar which tied in second-last with a 1.9.

Transparency International did not rank countries for which not enough data was available, including Afghanistan, Somalia and North Korea.

US Suffers Fall In Corruption Ranking (FT)

By Hugh Williamson In Berlin

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

The US has suffered a “significant worsening” in its perceived levels of corruption following a series of business scandals and increasing worries over political party funding, Transparency International, the anti-corruption watchdog, said on Monday.

In an international ranking of countries released ahead of Tuesday’s mid-term congressional elections, the US fell to 20th place from 17th last year.

Its score fell from 7.6 to 7.3, with 10 representing “least corrupt” and 0 “rampant corruption”.

The Berlin-based pressure group’s annual Corruption Perceptions Index ranks 163 countries based on opinion polls and expert assessments.

Huguette Labelle, TI’s global chairwoman, said the reasons could include the greater awareness of corruption after the Enron and Worldcom business scandals, and growing concern in the US that private and business donations to politicians was having a corrupting influence on political affairs.

“Issues of ethics and corruption have been on the front-burner for some time with the US electorate and have played a role in the election,” Nancy Boswell, president of the group’s US chapter, said in an interview from Washington DC.

DOJ_NMG_0091600

Finland, Iceland and New Zealand are the world's least corrupt countries, while Haiti, Burma, and Iraq are most corrupt, according to the index.

This year's index score for Iraq of 1.9 is based only on surveys made after the invasion. The score in 2004, based largely on pre-invasion surveys, was 2.1.

"The systems for upholding integrity in Iraq, the rule of law and courts, are not functioning, or have been destroyed," said David Nussbaum, TI chief executive.

The index also revealed a link between corruption and poverty, TI said, with all low-income countries scoring below 5.0.

Such high levels of corruption could also have very serious consequences, for instance when food and vaccines did not reach poor people. "Corruption kills," Ms Labelle said.

Hilary Benn, British development minister, said: "In poor countries corruption harms the poorest people most of all.

"It is shocking that, according to Transparency International Kenya, bribery costs Kenyans about US$1bn [€787m, £526m] each year, yet more than half of all Kenyans live on less than $2 per day."

Mr Nussbaum said the index highlighted the need for associations of bankers, accountants and company lawyers to pay more attention to corruption.

These were failing to clamp down on members who provided a "veneer of legitimacy" to corrupt politicians in developing and transition countries, he said.

Such professional groups should be doing more to tackle bribery on a grand scale that was facilitated by some of their members.

He cited the International Bar Association, and the International Compliance Association as examples of organisations that should act more convincingly.

He urged professional associations to launch their own investigations into bankers, accountants or others who allegedly "provide the arteries through which corrupt money can flow", or provided offshore facilities to invest stolen funds.

He said anti-corruption codes of conduct of such associations were often "too vague" to be effective, and training programmes were outdated.

"For companies, thinking just in terms of compliance in not enough," he said.

Source: Transparency International

Kidnappings Return To Haunt Long Ethnic War In Sri Lanka (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Like a returning ghost, a rash of mysterious abductions has come to haunt this country once more.

Men and women are being grabbed from their homes, sometimes after dark, sometimes in broad daylight. Ransom is demanded in some cases; in others, political intimidation seems to be the point. A few have been freed, but corpses have also turned up. With rare exceptions, the crimes remain unsolved.

The abductions are a terrifying sideshow in Sri Lanka's newly revived ethnic conflict, and they contain eerie echoes of the horrors of a generation ago, when this island nation achieved notoriety for tens of thousands of disappearances.

For nearly a quarter of a century, the ethnic Sinhalese-dominated government has been locked in battle with Tamil separatist guerrillas. A new menace has come in the form of a breakaway Tamil rebel faction, widely accused of being allied with the government and — say kidnapping victims lucky enough to tell their tales — of having a hand in the abductions.

The government denies having any link to the group, called the Karuna faction, and describes the latest abductions as a law-and-order problem that it can tackle.

It is difficult to know who is responsible, or exactly how many people have been seized.

The International Committee of the Red Cross says it received more than 350 reports of disappeared persons through late October. The National Human Rights Commission logged 419 such complaints between last December and September.

DOJ_NMG_0091601

A private human rights advocacy group, called Home for Human Rights, has documented 203 cases of missing persons in the first nine months of this year, using newspaper clippings and other reports. It lists 965 more extrajudicial killings, some of whose victims might also have been abducted.

The victims come from all walks of life: a radio reporter, a university dean, a fish trader. For the most part, they are Tamil, the country's main ethnic minority. Many of the abductions have been carried out in government-controlled territory — sometimes in the heart of this highly fortified capital, at other times in the north and east, close to military installations. Some of those kidnapped have won release only after their families appealed to the highest echelons of the state.

A white van appears repeatedly in their recollections: it is the iconic symbol of the late 1980's, when white vans were used in a wave of abductions as the government fought a violent leftist insurrection.

Despite the official denials, the abductions have spread a cloud over the administration of President Mahinda Rajapakse, including a recommendation by the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, to dispatch foreign monitors to investigate rights abuses here.

[Instead, on Nov. 6, Mr. Rajapakse's government announced formation of a government commission of inquiry, to be aided by foreign observers. Ms. Arbour's office cautiously welcomed the plan but warned of the need to "establish not only individual responsibility for crimes, but the broader patterns and context in which they occur."]

The spike in rights abuses corresponds to the swift deterioration of a 2002 cease-fire between the Sri Lankan military and the ethnic rebels, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

The rights record of the Tamil Tigers has hardly been exemplary. They have been repeatedly accused of abductions, including of children whom they draft into military service. The rebels are also implicated in a rash of assassinations, in particular attacks on ethnic Tamils who work with the state.

The terror of this war has grown ever sharper with the emergence of the Karuna faction, which broke away from the Tamil Tigers.

Sathasivam Kumararatnam, the fish trader, was packed into a white van on a Thursday morning in late September from a street corner near his house. His captors, he said, pistol-whipped him, blindfolded and gagged him, bound his wrists and took his cash.

He was beaten and interrogated about his links to the Tamil Tigers. His family was then pressed for nearly $10,000 for his release. The Kumararatnams bargained his captors down to half that amount, and when a courier came to pick up the ransom, Mr. Kumararatnam's first-born son, Ravindran, beat him to a pulp. He also forced a confession out of him. "I'm with the Karuna faction," Ravindran said he heard him say.

The police confirmed that a man arrested in connection with Mr. Kumararatnam's kidnapping had confessed to links to the rebel faction. They gave no further details.

His captors have since released Mr. Kumararatnam. But he is not yet free. He still receives threatening phone calls, he says. "This time, we will kill you," the callers tell him.

The political nature of many of the abductions, even in cases where the kidnappers' identities are hard to pin down, seems clear.

Nadaraja Kuruparan, a Tamil radio reporter, said he was not asked for a single rupee after he was yanked from his car one early morning in August. He was held overnight at what appeared to be a private house, he said, and told he would have to "clarify" some of his reports. He was released on the outskirts of Colombo the following day, and given taxi money to return home.

The government had previously warned the station about Mr. Kuruparan's popular talk show, on which he had interviewed a Tamil Tiger leader this year. Since his kidnapping, he has decided to take the talk show off the air.

In another case, Balasingam Sugumar, the dean of arts at the main public university in Batticaloa, in the east, was plucked from his house and detained for 10 days, despite his family's quiet efforts to buy off his captors, the family said.

In exchange for his release, his abductors demanded the resignation of a senior university administrator, whom they accused of having links to the Tamil Tiger rebels. It remains a mystery how the white van that came to get him on a Saturday night in late September managed to pass through the military checkpoints that sit on both ends of his road.

DOJ_NMG_0091602

His family says they do not know what ultimately led to Mr. Sugumar's release, only that they reached out to representatives of each of the warring parties, including President Rajapakse, who promised to investigate.

Mr. Sugumar refused to be interviewed. [He has since fled the country, his family said.]

For now, there seems to be little consensus within the government on who is behind the abductions, let alone what to do about them.

A senior negotiator for the government, Palitha T. B. Kohona, said the kidnappings represented a law-and-order challenge for the state. "We would like to get to the bottom of this," he said. "We will intensify investigations if necessary."

Gotabaya Rajapakse, the president's brother, who also serves as defense secretary, said in late October that "lots of people" had been apprehended in connection with the abductions. But he did not have details on how many and in what period.

His claim was contradicted by a retired judge whom the president appointed to look into the abductions. The judge, Mahanama Tilakaratne, said the police had made virtually no arrests. He also said he believed many of the recent abductions were a result of personal grudges and had little to do with the ethnic conflict.

By way of example, he took out the file of one victim and pointed out that he was suspected of an extramarital affair. The judge said he could not share details of any other cases.

Many of those who disappeared a generation ago are still unaccounted for. Their faces stare out from a simple memorial erected on the outskirts of Colombo. Once a year, their families come to lay flowers.

In late October came a weeping father, W. A. W. Weerasinghe, to remember his son, Krishantha, who was stuffed into a white van one afternoon more than 16 years ago and has not been heard from since.

Along with dozens of other parents, Mr. Weerasinghe, 68, laid flowers and wept. "Disappearance is a crime against humanity," reads a tablet at the base of the memorial. "Let us not allow it to happen again."

At the time of those disappearances, President Rajapakse was an opposition lawmaker and a human rights activist whose colleagues were among the thousands abducted and killed. Nine months after Mr. Weerasinghe's son disappeared, Mr. Rajapakse headed to Geneva to draw the attention of the United Nations to human rights abuses in his country, carrying with him reams of files on missing persons.

According to human rights groups and news reports from that time, the Sri Lankan police seized the documents at the airport.

Will Bush Lose Lebanon, Too? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

President Bush learns tonight whether Republicans will lose control of the House, the Senate, or both. But what's a mere midterm when his administration is on the verge of losing an entire country?

That country is Lebanon. Twenty months ago, when Syrian troops were abruptly forced out in the so-called Cedar Revolution after a 29-year occupation, the Levantine state was a byword for the ascendancy of the Bush Doctrine. "It's strange for me to say this," the Lebanese Druze leader Walid Jumblatt told columnist David Ignatius in February 2005, "but this process of change has started because of the American invasion of Iraq. I was cynical about Iraq. But when I saw the Iraqi people voting three weeks ago, eight million of them, it was the start of a new Arab world."

Fast-forward to the present and then watch as the Cedar Revolution gets played in reverse. The White House issued a remarkable statement last Wednesday warning of "mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government." That evidence includes recent threats on the lives of leading anti-Syrian figures, about a dozen of whom were assassinated last year. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah has also promised massive demonstrations if his demand for a "national unity" government -- in which he and his allies would gain enough seats in the cabinet to exercise a veto -- is not met by the end of this week.

This could be scene-setting for another civil war, if the Lebanese have the appetite for it. Mr. Nasrallah's opponents, including the notorious Christian militiaman Samir Geagea, have put it about that if Hezbollah goes ahead with its demonstrations they will stage massive counterprotests and perhaps barricade the roads into Beirut.

DOJ_NMG_0091603

What would Mr. Nasrallah do then? "He's going to push the troops of others to bring about an incident," speculates Lebanese commentator Walid Phares of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies. "He'll start a massive demonstration in front of [Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's] office and demand his resignation. He'll portray himself as the opposition. What he would love most of all is to have the media broadcast the downfall of the Bush-allied government."

That's one scenario, though it probably won't come to that: Mr. Nasrallah would prefer maximum autonomy within the country than actual responsibility over it. Instead, Lebanon's political classes are likely to settle on a compromise that would sacrifice at least one of the three most cherished goals of the Cedar Revolution. The first is disarming Hezbollah, as required by the 1989 Taif Accords and demanded by U.N. Resolutions 1559 and 1701. But that latter resolution, part of the cease-fire agreement arranged by Condoleezza Rice last summer, does more to shield Hezbollah from Israel than the other way around.

Second is a successful conclusion to the U.N. investigation into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The investigation, led by low-key Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz, is said to be within weeks of wrapping up, and informed U.S. diplomatic sources expect that it will indict senior figures in the Syrian regime, including relatives of President Bashar Assad. But the indictments must be followed by a trial in Lebanon, which Mr. Assad is desperate to quash. Hence the Hezbollah power play: If Mr. Nasrallah and his allies can gain a third of the cabinet's seats, they can prevent the Hariri case from ever going to trial.

Finally, the Cedar Revolution was supposed to put an end to Syria's meddling in Lebanon. But that won't happen if at the end of this week's political negotiations the Lebanese government allows President Emile Lahoud, still and forever a Syrian puppet, to remain in office even as the country moves to early elections. Nor does it help that Mr. Assad continues to prove his worth to Mr. Nasrallah by serving as his main conduit of arms.

In all this, Hezbollah has been helped by the weakness of its domestic opponents. The Cedar Revolution demonstrated that Lebanon's anti-Syrian forces were a majority in the country. But those forces are fractious and unsure of themselves, and Mr. Nasrallah was able to draw down their support by striking a deal with the opportunistic Maronite leader Michel Aoun. Israel's incompetent military campaign last summer was another boon for Mr. Nasrallah, since anything less than his complete defeat in war was bound to embolden him politically.

Then there is the forthcoming report of former Secretary of State James Baker's Iraq Study Group, which is rumored to urge the Bush administration to re-engage Damascus diplomatically. In recent days Mr. Assad has been talking a blue streak about his willingness to make peace with Israel, a signal that he might be willing to play ball on that front and maybe in Iraq if only the administration lets him have his way in Lebanon.

The term for Mr. Baker's advice is "sell-out," and it is entirely characteristic of his past Mideast diplomacy. As an alternative, Mr. Phares argues that Ms. Rice should convene a conference of Lebanese NGOs in Washington as a way of bracing them for what he calls a "second Cedar Revolution." Also noteworthy is the internal Shiite opposition to Hezbollah: "The Shiite community never gave anyone the right to wage war in its name," Sayed Ali al-Amin, the Shiite mufti of Tyre, recently told Beirut's An-Nahar newspaper. With winter approaching and Hezbollah reportedly sharply cutting back on its reconstruction funds to homeless Shiites, there's an opportunity here to discredit Mr. Nasrallah and separate his organization from its religious base.

Saving Lebanon will require focus, nerve and imagination, qualities hitherto absent from Ms. Rice's tenure at State. Maybe if her boss loses his majority in Congress, he'll be less inclined to let the remainder of his legacy go down the drain with it.

DOJ_NMG_0091604

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 07, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Appeals Court Weighs Prisoners' Right To Fight Detention (NYT) ... 3
New Rules Go Into Effect At EU Airports (AP) ... 4
Accused Iraqi Agent Held At Federal Supermax Prison In Colorado (AP) ... 4

Homeland Response:

Feds Target Terrorist Recruiting In Prisons (USAT) ... 5
Prosecutors: Terrorists Plotted More Attacks On NYC, London (USAT/AP) ... 6
British Court Hears Of Qaeda Plans For 'Black Day' (NYT) ... 6
Court Told Of Terrorist's Plans To Kill Thousands (WT/AP) ... 7
Government Officials And Muslim Teens Meet At Taping Of Talk Show (NY1) ... 8
Liquids Allowed On Flights, But Bring Patience, Too (CSM) ... 8
Will Long Lines Be In The Bag This Thanksgiving? (USAT) ... 9
Not Following Baggie Rules Can Bog Down Lines (USAT) ... 11

War News:

U.S. Envoy To Iraq Likely Quitting Post (AP) ... 13
Iraqis Told Not To Worry Over US Elections (FT) ... 14
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 14
Iraq Court To Rule On Saddam Verdict (AP-Y) ... 15
Many Oppose Death Penalty For Hussein (NYT) ... 16
Iraq's Rough Justice (LAT) ... 17
Imperfect, But Fair Enough (WSJ) ... 18
Justice In Iraq (WP) ... 19
Thousands From Saddam's Party May Regain Jobs (USAT/AP) 20
Administration Reaches Out To Saddam Backers (WT/AP) ... 20
Proposal Would Rehire Members Of Hussein's Party (WP) ... 21
57 Iraqis Charged In Abuse At Prison (WP) ... 22
Third Guilty Plea In Killing Of Iraqi By A Marine Patrol (NYT) ... 23
Marine Enters Pleas In Iraqi Case (AP-Y) ... 24
The Day The Hatred Boiled Over In Balad (LAT) ... 25
Fewer Pakistanis Rally To Support Islamists (CSM) ... 28

Corporate Scandals:

Appeals Court Panel Rejects Challenge To Clearing Of Lay's Convictions (HC) ... 29
Former Homestore Exec Receives 30-month Sentence (INMAN) 30
Jury Acquits, Hangs In Trial Of McKesson's Former CEO And GC (LAW) ... 30
Fed Warns Of Illicit Bond Activity (WP) ... 31

Criminal Law:

Man Set For Execution For Slaying Of Bank Guard Alleges Prosecutorial Misconduct (FINDLAW/AP) ... 32
Polygamist Compound South Dakota Still Growing (AP) ... 33
Sunland Park Man Arrested In Kidnapping (EPT) ... 33
FBI Charges Man In Kidnapping (KFOX) ... 34
FBI Looking At Whether Duncan Linked To North Dakota Slaying (AP) ... 34
Dallas Woman Sentenced In FEMA Fraud Case (AP) ... 35
Business Owner Pleads Guilty (HARTC) ... 35
Man Pleads Guilty In Child-porn Case (DESERET) ... 35
Prosecutor Kills Himself In Texas Raid Over Child Sex (NYT) ... 35
Series Of Deaths Rattles A City (WP) ... 36
Jury Duty Is Getting Harder To Shirk (USAT) ... 37
Abortion Clinics Request O'Reilly Probe (AP-Y) ... 38

Civil Law:

Judge Dismisses House Democrats' Lawsuit Over Budget Bill (AP) ... 39
Abortion Method Returns To Justices (LAT) ... 39
All Eyes On Roberts Court As It Takes On Abortion (CNN) ... 41
Abortion Cases Pit Justices Vs. Congress (LAW) ... 42

Civil Rights:

Federal Observers At Polls In 22 States (AP-Y) ... 44
Justice Department Dispatches Election Monitors (CNN) ... 44
FBI Looks Into Voter Intimidation (RTD) ... 45
Police Look Into Cross Burning Attempt At Grand Coteau Town Hall (AP) ... 46
Suspected Pimp Charged With Sex Trafficking (AP) ... 46
N.Y. Plans To Make Gender Personal Choice (NYT) ... 46
Uncivil Rights (WSJ) ... 47

Antitrust:

Merrill Gets Justice Department Query On Buyouts, Person Says (BLOOM) ... 48
Report: Regulators Eye Private Equity (AP-YBIZ) ... 49
Feds Request Info In Smithfield Deal (AP) ... 49
Ahold Says It Will Sell U.S. Foodservice (AP) ... 50
Morgan Stanley, Visa Settle Dispute (AP) ... 51
EU To Rule By Dec. 8 On Universal Music Group's Purchase Of BMG Music Publishing (AP) ... 51

NTP Files Patent Suit Against Palm (WSJ) 51
Swift Transportation Gets $2.2 Billion Bid From Its Ex-CEO By ANN KEETON (WSJ) 52
McKesson To Purchase Per-Se For $1.1 Billion, Adding Clients By NICOLE URBANOWICZ (WSJ) 52

Environment/Indian Affairs:

One Chemical At A Time (WP) 53
In Maine, A Public Park In Search Of Public Support (NYT) 54
Female Leader Would Be First For Navajos (WP) 55

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit FBI Chief Earns A Promotion (DEN) 56
Detroit FBI Chief Promoted To Post In Washington (AP) 57
Five Indicted On Cocaine Charges (PALMBEACHP) 57
Grand Jury Indicts Four In Escobedo Case (STCN) 58
Man Thought Connected To Turnpike Killings Denied Bond (AP) 58
Medical Marijuana Remains In Legal Limbo (SDUT) 59
Ex-gang Member In Jail For Drugs (KNOXNS) 61
Lopez 'ashamed' Of Schwartz Case Role (ADS) 61
Early Morning Detroit Blaze Destroys Businesses, Apartments (DEN) 63

Congress-Administration:

Paulson Adviser In Line For Treasury Position By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ) 63
Next Up: House Leader Races (RC) 63
A Mess Of Spending Measures Awaits (RC) 66
Board Decision Makes It Clear: Hire The Vet (WP) 67

Other News:

Greenspan Unconcerned About Housing (WP) 68
Several Signs Point Toward Robust Stock Resurgence (USAT) 69
Dow Industrials Rally 119.51 Points Before Election Investors Celebrate Conclusion Of Tumultuous Political Season, Hope 'Pricing In' Was Right By PETER A. MCKAY (WSJ) 69
Stocks Jump On Flurry Of Equity Buyouts (WP) 70
'Takeover Monday' Eases Slowdown Fears (FT) 71
Merger Market Arrives At 'good Spot' (USAT) 71
Yellen: Income Gap Poses Risk (USAT) 72
Bush Campaigns, Dems Assail Status Quo (AP-Y) 73
Candidate A No-show At Bush Rally (LAT) 74
Crist Snubs President On Election Eve; Davis Calls To 'The Disgusted' (FLSUNSEN) 74
Bush Stumps (AP) 75
Attack Of The Hacks (WP) 76
Vote Republican, America Is At War: Bush (AFP-Y) 77
GOP Hopefuls Absent From Bush Rally (PALMBEACHP) 78
Bush Ends 10-state Blitz To Keep A GOP Congress (WT) 79
President Who Sees In Absolutes Awaits Voters' Definitive Answer (WP) 80
Gubernatorial Candidates Scramble For Votes In Final Hours (HC) 82
Bush Warns Against Presuming Democratic Victories (CHIT) 83
A Last Hurrah Of Sorts For Bush-Rove Partnership (NYT) 84
Tuesday May Bring Bush Worry Either Way (AP-Y) 85
Candidates Make Dash For Finish Line (NYT) 87
Voting In A Neck-and-neck Nation (LAT) 88
Future Rests On GOP Incumbents' Outcomes (AP-Y) 91
As Campaign Clock Winds Down, Parties Press On (USAT) 92
US Senate Goes Down To The Wire (CSM) 93
GOP: Back From The Senate Brink (HILL) 94
See How They Run: An Election-Night Guide With Many Key Races In East, Midwest, Prevailing Party May Be Evident Early On By CHRISTOPHER COOPER (WSJ) 94
Down To The Wire: Expect A Big Night For Democrats (RC) 96
House Poised To Flip; Senate Teeters (RC) 97
Angry Campaigns End On An Angrier Note (WP) 98
Kerry Gaffe Loses Independents For His Party (WT) 100
Polls Give GOP A Lift On Election Eve (WT) 100
Republicans Make Last-minute Push (FT) 102
Parties Spend $225M On Target Races (AP-Y) 102
Final Push Hefty Democratic Fund Raising Vies With Clout Of Incumbency Aggressive Money Machine Aims To Overcome Benefits Of Pork And Redistricting Mr. Shaw's Mobile Post Office By JEANNE CUMMINGS (WSJ) 103
For Democrats, Even A Gain May Feel Like A Failure (NYT) 105
In Mock Student Election, Democrats Reclaim House By NAUREEN S. MALIK (WSJ) 107
After Losing Seniors To Republicans, Democrats Hope To Lure Them Back By ERIKA LOVLEY (WSJ) 108
How Illegal Immigration Failed As Silver Bullet For Republicans Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ) 109
Pelosi's Platform (WP) 110
The True Ideological Battle By ARTHUR C. BROOKS (WSJ) 111
Identity Crisis (WP) 113
Repeat Calls Spur A Debate Over Tactics (NYT) 113
It's A Candidate Calling. Again. (WP) 114
Exit-Poll Secrecy Measures Aim To Plug Leaks To Blogs By AMY SCHATZ (WSJ) 116
Early Night For Poll Watchers? (WP) 117
Check Indiana For A Preview (NYT) 118
Gore Headlines Maryland Campaign Event (WP/AP) 118
Gore Stumps For Cardin; Pastors Endorse Steele (WT) 119
Allen, Webb Cite Fate Of Senate (WT) 120
FBI Looks Into Voter Intimidation (RTD) 121
Lieberman Says Win Won't Be Debt To GOP (AP-Y) 122
A Fiery Warning Against Taking Risks (NYT) 122
Puppy Power: How Humane Society Gets The Vote Out Animal Welfare Is The Issue, Not The Candidate's Party; Loaded For Bear Hunters By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ) 123
Social Security System Needs Bipartisan Solution (WSJ) 124
AARP's Tax Trap (WSJ) 125
America's Crisis Of Confidence (WP) 126
Touch-screen Test (LAT) 126
Vote! (WP) 127
Inside Politics (WT) 127
Must We Talk? (NYT) 129
Clinton Is Midterm Campaign's Biggest Spender, Records Show, At $29.5 Million And Counting (NYT) 130

DOJ_NMG_0091606

Hillary Gets An Address Wrong (WP) 130
Eyeing 2008, Political Stars Ran Hard For Others (WP) 131
How Mr. Rich Spreads The Republican Word Millionaire Investor Who Leans Libertarian Pushes Conservative Ballot Initiatives In 14 States (WSJ) 132
A Civil Abortion Debate? (USAT) 134
The Politics Of Frustration (NYT) 135
Indian Taker (WSJ) 135
Wisconsin's Cheesy Reformers (WSJ) 136
Beyond Election Day (WP) 137
Mr. Bland Goes To Washington (NYT) 137
Leaders Of Hamas And Fatah In Talks On Unity Government (NYT) 138
Israeli Forces Leave Gaza Town (AP) 139
Iran Tries To Foster Trust Among Oil Firms Tehran May Adjust Rules To Lure Investors, But Industry Is Wary By SALLY JONES (WSJ) 140
A Shift In The Debate On International Court (WP) 141
Panel Calls For U.N. To Be Streamlined (AP-Y) 142
Top Job For US Official Raises UN Reform Fear (FT) 143
Sheeran Will Lead U.N. Food Program (WT) 144
Ortega Set To Reclaim Nicaraguan Presidency (WP) 145
Leftist Headed Toward Victory In Nicaragua (NYT) 146
Ortega Nears Victory In Nicaragua Election (WSJ) 147
Ortega's Likely Return Seen As A Blow To US Policy (FT) 148
Ortega Seen Winning Nicaragua Election (AP) 149
Ortega Headed Back To Power In Nicaragua (LAT) 150
Nicaragua's Ortega Ready For Comeback (USAT) 152
Nations Fight Perceived Corruption Image (AP) 152
US Suffers Fall In Corruption Ranking (FT) 153
Kidnappings Return To Haunt Long Ethnic War In Sri Lanka (NYT) 153
Will Bush Lose Lebanon, Too? (WSJ) 155

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Appeals Court Weighs Prisoners' Right To Fight Detention (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis
The New York Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 — The Bush administration's successful effort to have Congress eliminate the right of Guantánamo prisoners to challenge their detentions before federal judges is now moving toward what may be an epic battle in the courts.

And while lawsuits on the topic are spread across the judiciary, the principal battleground, legal experts say, is the federal appeals court in Washington. That court has been considering for three years whether the hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have the right of habeas corpus — that is, the ability to ask a federal judge to review the reasons for their detention.

But the law passed by Congress last month eliminating the habeas right supersedes almost all of the arguments that have gone before and is now the focus of the legal confrontation, government and civil liberties lawyers agree. In a ruling last June, the Supreme Court had said that an earlier measure did not eliminate habeas lawsuits that were already in the courts. However, in October, the administration used more explicit language, saying the new law retroactively blocked federal courts from entertaining habeas lawsuits by Guantánamo detainees.

The three-judge appeals court panel will have to decide whether the pending lawsuits brought by the 430 or so remaining detainees at Guantánamo should be thrown out, as the Bush administration has argued, or whether the new law is unconstitutional, as civil liberties groups have contended.

Whatever resolution is reached by the three appellate judges — David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, both appointees of Republican presidents, and Judith W. Rogers, appointed by a Democrat — it will almost certainly end up before the Supreme Court. A decision could come from the appeals court before the end of the year.

Lawyers for the detainees said in a recent brief that despite the wording of the new law, Congress could not take away the right to bring such habeas corpus lawsuits because that would violate the Constitution.

Their brief notes that the Constitution provides that Congress may suspend the right only in cases of rebellion or invasion, as President Abraham Lincoln did during the Civil War. Congress may provide a substitute, but only one that is equivalent to a full-blown habeas action, the lawyers said in their brief.

Justice Department officials said they would argue that the law is constitutional when they issue their formal reply in a brief due next Monday.

David B. Rivkin Jr., a White House counsel in the administration of the first President Bush, said he believed the department would emphasize that the new law provided an adequate substitute method for a detainee to challenge his confinement.

DOJ_NMG_0091607

A proceeding held for each prisoner at Guantánamo, called a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, is presumed to provide a legally sufficient justification for detention, under the new law. That proceeding, in which three military officers decide if a prisoner is rightfully deemed to be an unlawful enemy combatant, may be appealed directly to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Mr. Rivkin, an authority on national security law who supports the administration, said the law did not suspend habeas corpus but instead provided a new way for it to be exercised.

"The government is saying, 'Look, we're not denying anyone's chance to get habeas,' " he said. "We're just providing a different way."

Mr. Rivkin said the judges on the appeals court panel should be especially receptive to the idea that the process is fair because the law provides for that very court to hear any appeals from the military tribunals.

But the detainees' lawyers have argued that the law provides for only a limited review of the military tribunals by the appeals court. Under the new law, they said, the appeals court may not look behind the record of the military tribunal, and the judges, in effect, are required to accept all of the military's assertions.

Similar objections to the law are contained in a brief filed by seven former federal judges, who were appointed by both Democratic and Republican administrations. The judges say in their brief that the law has "one specific and fundamental flaw," namely that the military tribunals may accept evidence obtained by torture. The judges said the limited review for the appeals court in the new law "cannot remove the stain of torture because the court, at least according to the government, cannot alter or expand the record created by the military."

They said that "no habeas court would permit detentions based on evidence obtained in this manner."

New Rules Go Into Effect At EU Airports (AP)

The AP, November 7, 2006

Passengers were allowed to take only small amounts of liquids on board airplanes Monday as strict new security measures on hand baggage went into effect across the European Union.

The new EU rules limit passengers to carrying 100 milliliters (a fifth of a pint) of liquid per container on board planes — part of regulations imposed after British police said in August that they had broken up a plot to bring down U.S.-bound flights with liquid-based explosives.

New restrictions on the size of carry-on luggage will be introduced in April.

All liquids — not only water and soft drinks but also soups, creams, lotions, oils, perfumes, sprays, gels, toothpaste and shaving cream — are subject to security checks before passengers board their planes.

The containers must fit into a clear re-sealable plastic bag to be presented at security checkpoints, officials said.

The new rules do not affect liquids packed in checked luggage, or drinks and perfumes bought at airport shops after passengers clear security.

Baby foods and medicines also are exempt but can be subject to inspection, officials said.

"All airports in the European Union must apply the new regulations to protect civil aviation against the threat of homemade liquid explosives," EU spokesman Ferran Tarradellas Espuny said over the weekend. "Liquids in hand luggage have to be put in a separate bag."

The rules went into effect Monday at all airports within the 25-nation EU and in Norway, Iceland and Switzerland.

Passengers also are required to remove coats and jackets at security checks, and remove laptop computers and other large electrical items from bags for inspection.

Starting April 17, new rules on cabin baggage will limit hand luggage to a maximum 56 by 45 by 25 centimeters (22 by 17 by 10 inches) — with exceptions for some items, such as musical instruments.

Accused Iraqi Agent Held At Federal Supermax Prison In Colorado (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - An Indiana truck driver convicted of plotting to sell U.S. secrets to Saddam Hussein is incarcerated at a federal super-maximum-security prison in Colorado under an order approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a report Monday said.

Justice Department officials have isolated Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 54, of Greenfield, under a policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on his conversations, restrict his access to news reports and prohibit anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him, The Indianapolis Star reported.

Shaaban is being held under an order known as a special administrative measure, which is meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security.

DOJ_NMG_0091608

William Dazey Jr., a public defender who assisted Shaaban at his trial in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis earlier trial this year, said the order was unusual.

"I have not seen evidence that would support the notion (Shaaban) is a threat to the United States," Dazey said.

Among the other convicts held under similar conditions at the Florence Federal Correctional Complex about 90 miles south of Denver are Zacarias Moussaoui, the alleged "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and Richard Reid, who tried in December 2001 to detonate plastic explosives in his shoe on a Paris-to-Miami flight.

At Shaaban's sentencing, Judge John Tinder recommended placing Shaaban in a federal prison at Terre Haute, closer to his wife and young son, who remain in Greenfield.

However, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sharon Jackson requested the restrictions, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales initialed the order.

Jackson is on special assignment with the Justice Department and was not available for comment Monday, said Mary Bippus, a spokeswoman for the agency in Indianapolis.

Shaaban was stripped of his U.S. citizenship after being found guilty in January of six federal charges, including illegally acting as an agent of the Iraqi government.

He was sentenced to 13 years, four months in prison after a trial in which prosecutors portrayed him as a clever spy who had offered to sell the names of more than 60 clandestine CIA operatives to Iraqi intelligence officials for millions.

Under special administrative measures, the Justice Department must certify a substantial risk exists that an inmate's communications could result in death or serious bodily injury to others.

The regulation states the inmate must be notified of the restrictions and the justification. However, Shaaban received an order that redacted the justification.

Critics question the necessity and the psychological effects of limiting virtually all contact with the outside world for years at a time.

"A lot of this is show. It's playing to people's fears about terrorism," said Khurrum Wahid, an attorney with offices in New York and Miami who defends terror suspects.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Feds Target Terrorist Recruiting In Prisons (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal government is working with prisons in dozens of states to improve intelligence gathering and monitoring of inmates in a stepped-up campaign to curb homegrown terrorism behind bars.

The FBI and Homeland Security Department are urging prison officials to do more extensive background checks on workers and volunteers who meet with inmates. And members of Congress are looking at possible reforms in prison security as a way to combat the spread of extremist Islamic beliefs.

Chief among the concerns is that radical Muslim clerics could have access to prisoners and coerce them with terrorist literature.

“It's a concern because we know that violent extremist groups will target people in prisons,” said Donald Van Duyn, the FBI's counterterrorism director. “We're working to improve monitoring, improve training and increase awareness.”

The intensified surveillance follows the recent arrests of people alleged to be home-grown terrorism suspects in London and Canada, which have raised concerns that the United States may be vulnerable to terrorism at the hands of its own citizens. British authorities said in August that they broke up a conspiracy to blow up U.S.-bound airliners with liquid bombs, and Canadian officials charged 17 people in June with an al-Qaeda-inspired plot to possess 3 tons of bombmaking materials.

Homeland Security officials, who are sending investigators to prisons around the country to gather intelligence on inmate radicalization, are worried that similar plots could be hatched in U.S. prisons. “Prisons can be a breeding ground,” says Charles Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer.

Among the steps that the FBI and Homeland Security are urging prisons to take:

·Develop more informants and set up more intelligence units in state prison systems. The FBI is encouraging prison systems to set up their own intelligence units and to work with local agents to share information. The bureau won't say whether it has undercover agents in the nation's prisons.

·Train more prison staff to recognize signs that prisoners are turning to extremist propaganda, sharing radical views, and attempting to convert other inmates.

DOJ_NMG_0091609

·Conduct background checks on volunteers and workers to ensure extremist Muslim clerics don't have access to prisoners.

"Our concern is not with prison inmates converting to Islam," says Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee. "For many converts, this religion brings the direction and purpose their lives previously lacked."

A case in California shows how some U.S. prisons have spawned converts to radical forms of Islam.

Members of an extremist group robbed a dozen Los Angeles gas stations in 2005 to raise money to finance terrorist attacks on the United States.

The group's founder, Kevin James, is alleged by the FBI to have recruited members from prison. Four members of the group are awaiting trial on charges including conspiracy to levy war against the U.S. government.

"We have to wonder how many other such conspiracies are taking shape under the radar in other prisons," Collins says.

Prosecutors: Terrorists Plotted More Attacks On NYC, London (USAT/AP)

By David Stringer

USA Today, November 7, 2006

LONDON — An al-Qaeda operative captured in Britain planned to bomb the New York Stock Exchange and plotted a series of attacks on London, one to blow up a London subway train as it passed below the River Thames, prosecutors said at a sentencing hearing Monday.

Dhiren Barot, 34, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to commit mass murder in terrorist plots on both sides of the Atlantic. He could face a life sentence in Britain and is wanted in the USA and Yemen on separate terror-related charges.

The Muslim convert and seven alleged accomplices spent more than four years making detailed plans to attack a host of financial industry targets in the USA. They also allegedly plotted to detonate limousines packed with explosives in the underground garages of famous London hotels and train stations.

Prosecutor Edmund Lawson said the group considered using a radioactive "dirty bomb" and ramming a gasoline tanker into a high-profile British target.

Lawson showed clips of a reconnaissance video shot in 2001 during a visit to New York by Barot. The shaky footage — shown on screens in the courthouse — zoomed in on the World Trade Center as an unseen man mimicked the sound of an explosion. Prosecutors said Barot did not have prior knowledge of the Sept. 11 terror attacks that killed almost 3,000 people.

Lawson said that starting in 1995, Barot trained at terrorist camps in Pakistan, Kashmir, Malaysia and the Philippines — crisscrossing the globe to refine skills at bombmaking and with weapons and chemicals. Born in India and raised in Britain since 1972, Barot became the "organizer of major terrorist activity designed to strike at the very heart of both America and the United Kingdom," Lawson said.

In August 2000 and March 2001, Barot traveled to the USA, visiting an aunt in New Jersey, Lawson said.

Plans outlining details of the U.S. attacks were found on a computer after Barot's arrest in August 2004. The 80-minute New York reconnaissance footage was spliced into a videotape of Die Hard with a Vengeance, Lawson said. The video contained shots of entrances, exits and security barriers at the New York Stock Exchange and the Citigroup headquarters.

Prosecutors said Barot's targets included the World Bank headquarters and the International Monetary Fund, both in Washington, the Citigroup buildings in New York and the Prudential building in Newark, N.J.

Barot is wanted in the USA on charges of conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction. Under British law, domestic proceedings take precedence over an extradition. He also is wanted in Yemen in the kidnappings of Westerners in 1988.

Under the alias Issa al-Britani, Barot was named in the report of the U.S. commission that examined the Sept. 11 attacks, as an associate of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged planner. The report said Mohammed ordered al-Britani to identify bomb targets in New York.

British Court Hears Of Qaeda Plans For 'Black Day' (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 6 — A prosecutor told a court here on Monday that Dhiren Barot, the most senior operative of Al Qaeda known to have been captured here, had plotted "a memorable black day for the enemies of Islam" by killing "hundreds if not thousands of innocent people" in Britain and the United States.

Mr. Barot was arrested in Britain with seven others in August 2004, after a major security alert in the United States.

He pleaded guilty in October to a charge of conspiracy to murder.

The potential targets included the New York Stock Exchange, the headquarters of the International Monetary Fund in Washington and, in London, a subway train as it traveled under the Thames. Other supposed targets included Citigroup in Manhattan and the Prudential building in Newark, prosecutors have said.

DOJ_NMG_0091610

He could face life in prison when two days of pre-sentencing hearings conclude Tuesday. He is also wanted in the United States.

Mr. Barot, 34, who converted to Islam from Hinduism, was said to have worked on plans to use a radioactive so-called "dirty bomb" and limousines jammed with gas canisters to explode in underground parking garages.

Edmund Lawson, the prosecutor, said Mr. Barot had planned "to carry out massive explosions here and in the United States, the principal object being to kill hundreds, if not thousands, of innocent people without warning."

Details of the investigation were made public only after several news organizations sought a court ruling lifting restrictions on reporting. The prosecutor described him as a young man who converted to Islam in his early 20s, traveled to Pakistan for terrorist training in 1995 and then to the United States to assess potential targets for Al Qaeda in 2000 and 2001.

The planned operations in the United States were suspended after what Al Qaeda saw as the "success" of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the prosecution said. But, according to Mr. Lawson, notes, documents and computer evidence from Mr. Barot showed that he later made plans for attacks in Britain.

In a note, Mr. Lawson said, Mr. Barot referred to the idea of attacking a London subway train as it traveled under the Thames.

"Imagine the chaos that would be caused if a powerful explosion were to rip through here and actually rupture the river itself," Mr. Barot was said to have written. "That would cause pandemonium, what with the explosions, flooding, drowning etc. that would occur."

Mr. Lawson said Mr. Barot returned to Pakistan in early 2004, apparently to seek approval and financing for his plans. "There were plans for the detonation of a radiation dispersal device, more commonly known as a dirty bomb, the use of a petrol tanker to cause an explosion, and an attack on London's rail or Underground network," Mr. Lawson said.

Court Told Of Terrorist's Plans To Kill Thousands (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

LONDON -- One of the top al Qaeda operatives known to have been captured in Britain appeared in court amid heavy security yesterday for sentencing in a plot to bomb the New York Stock Exchange, the International Monetary Fund headquarters in Washington and to use a dirty bomb in London.

Dhiren Barot, 34, started plotting six years ago for a "memorable black day for the enemies of Islam," prosecutor Edmund Lawson said at the hearing, which was punctuated by a dramatic moment when prosecutors showed a March 2001 video shot while Barot was in New York. The camera zooms in to the World Trade Center and a man is then heard mimicking the sound of an explosion.

"This, we have to bear in mind, was five months before 9/11," Mr. Lawson said.

Flanked by two guards, Barot sat expressionless behind a glass partition as the proceedings began. He pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to commit mass murder in terrorist plots on both sides of the Atlantic. He faces a life sentence.

The criminal plot was to carry out massive explosions in Britain and in the United States, and was meant to kill "hundreds if not thousands of innocent people without warning," Mr. Lawson said.

Barot planned to cram three limousines with gas cylinders and explosives and detonate them in underground London parking garages, Mr. Lawson said. He also identified London hotels such as the Ritz and the Savoy, and railway stations such as London's Waterloo, Paddington and King's Cross as targets. Other attacks in Britain included using a dirty bomb, although experts question whether it would have been lethal.

Mr. Lawson, citing computer files recovered by police, said Barot planned to bomb a subway train as it traveled through a tunnel under the River Thames.

"If a powerful explosion were to rip through here and actually rupture the river itself, this would cause pandemonium ... explosions, flooding, drowning," Barot wrote in the computer documents found, according to Mr. Lawson.

Barot was born a Hindu in India, but was brought to Britain as a toddler. He converted to Islam when he was about 20, Mr. Lawson said.

After leaving his job as an airline-ticket clerk in Britain, he went to Pakistan and attended a terrorist-training camp in the Pakistan-controlled area of Kashmir for at least four months, Mr. Lawson said.

Investigators confiscated Barot's notes that showed he gained extensive training in the use of weapons, chemicals and bomb design. In 1998, he traveled to Malaysia and in 1999 the Philippines, where he attended the Jemaah Islamiyah terrorist-training camp, Mr. Lawson said.

In August 2000 and March 2001, Barot went on two reconnaissance trips to the United States, Mr. Lawson said.

It was this 2001 trip to Manhattan when prosecutors said the video of the World Trade Center was shot.

DOJ_NMG_0091611

"It is memorable for its macabre prophecy," said Mr. Lawson, who said he didn't think Barot had prior knowledge of the September 11 attacks.

Government Officials And Muslim Teens Meet At Taping Of Talk Show (NY1)

NY1, November 7, 2006

Muslim students put FBI and immigration officials on the hot seat Sunday at a taping in Queens of a well known Pakistani talk show. NY1 Criminal Justice reporter Solana Pyne was there as a panel answered questions about everything from FBI training to the success of the war on terror.

An unusual gathering even for a place as diverse as Queens, as a well known Pakistani talk show host taped a program to bring back home.

"There is an important question, what is the outcome of this war on terror after five years," asked talk-show host Hamid Mir.

A room full of students asked questions.

"Are FBI agents or other government officials trained, or getting trained to learn more about Islam?" asked one student in attendance.

Answering them was a member of parliament from the United Kingdom, a local imam, Muslim academics from both coasts, as well as the head of the New York office for Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency, and an FBI special agent.

"FBI Agents can't all look like me," said FBI special agent, Andrew Arena. "They can't all be white guys. We have got to diversify and that's very, very important. We train our agents from day one in the academy to understand the Muslim faith."

In the last few years, FBI and immigration officials have held several meetings with members of the city's Muslim communities, fielding both questions and complaints. But the event Sunday evening was unusual, not only because it included Muslim leaders from across the country, but also because it was the first with Muslim teens and young adults.

"There was some concern on the community's part, particularly after the bombings in the United Kingdom, that there were certain potential segments of the Muslim-American youth in the United States that might be disenfranchised," said Martin Ficke of the Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency. "And of course they have more, you know, potential to be radicalized."

And the forum, held just two days before the U.S. elections, was a chance to let students have their voices heard by government officials. It was also a chance for government agencies to recruit.

"I've had a lot of people come up to me tonight and ask about job opportunities with the FBI," said Arena. "This is the future of the FBI."

Hundreds of students attended the event, and as to how successful it was, well, it depends on who was asked.

"The questions were repetitive and the panel was composed of all non-students, with the exception of one, who did not even receive a chance to speak," said Fatima Ashraf, a forum participant.

"I think this is how we are going to be able to show to America, and to the rest of the world, that we can also contribute good ideas that can help bridge the gaps," added Ali Nayyar, another forum participant.

But even those who wished the event had been organized differently said they hope there will continue to be more events that allow students to have their say.

Liquids Allowed On Flights, But Bring Patience, Too (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK

Flying home this Thanksgiving? There are two things experts say are essential to bring: patience and a sense of humor.

Planes are expected to be fuller, prices higher, and security lines longer than ever.

The good news is that means some major airlines are finally turning a profit in the post-9/11 world. The bad news is passengers are paying for it with their time and comfort.

"It's a very strong travel season. We're looking at some of the highest load factors we've ever seen at one of the busiest times of the year," says Darryl Jenkins, an aviation expert in Marshall, Va. "Go to the airport early, and go with excessive amounts of humor."

Load factor is aviation jargon for the percentage of seats occupied by paying customers. Usually, 65 to 75 percent of seats are filled, so it wasn't unusual in the past to expect that center seat to be empty so you could spread out a bit and relax - but no more.

DOJ_NMG_0091612

This summer load factors were 90 to 100 percent, and that's where they're expected to stay this holiday season. The reason is major airlines have cut back on the number of planes flying so they can increase the amount of money they make on each one that goes aloft.

A recent scientific poll for Expedia.com also found that of people who plan to travel by air this holiday, 80 percent plan to travel as much or more than last year. So, to that full center seat add winter coats and presents for your mother, and you'll be prepared for what to expect: discomfort and inflexibility. Experts say if you're late to the airport, unlike in the old days, don't expect to be able to hop on the next flight.

"If you think, 'Oh, there are 10 flights a day to New York, I'll just get on the next one,' the likelihood of that happening is much, much less now," says Chris McGinnis, editor of Expedia Travel Trendwatch, a quarterly report on the travel industry, based in San Francisco. "That can really botch a trip if it's only three days, so I would say always err on the side of being early and just hanging out at the airport."

Then, of course, there are those vaunted Transportation Security Administration security checks - the other major reason experts are urging travelers to get to the airport as early as possible. During the holidays a lot of people fly who usually don't. So many may be confused about what the TSA will and will not allow on board.

For instance, did you know that some liquids and gels are now allowed? But they have to be in three-ounce containers inside quart-sized sealable baggies, not gallon- or a sandwich-sized. All lighters are banned, but you can bring on four books of matches. TSA's website, at www.tsa.gov, details these rules and is a must-see for anyone who hasn't flown in recent months.

"To make it more understandable to people we've launched a campaign called 3-1-1," says Ellen Howe, a TSA spokeswoman. "It's a reminder of three ounces or less, one quart-sized bag, one bag per traveler, and that bag needs to be pulled out of your carry-on and placed into the bin."

But even with all of the efforts the TSA is making to ensure passengers are informed and its employees are abreast of the current requirements, experts across the board say there's still too much inconsistency.

"You go there one day and one thing is OK, and then the next day you're told that is no longer OK," says Mr. Jenkins. "That's the biggest problem we have with the airlines, is that nobody knows what's kosher."

Knowing what's kosher is crucial because just a few seconds of delay per passenger can add up to very long lines with delays stretching as many as two hours.

"A delay of 10 seconds per passenger, in fact, could back up the line to the point where people could start to miss their flights," says Mike Callinan, president of Productivity Apex Inc. in Orlando, Fla., which did an analysis for the Orlando International Airport.

Some analysts contend that those wait lines and the hassle of security could have been greatly reduced if the TSA had been more efficient in getting the Registered Traveler and Secure Flight programs up across the country. The Registered Traveler program is designed to speed frequent fliers through the screening process once they've volunteered biometric and background information and paid a fee to a government-approved private company. So far, only the airport in Orlando is operating a pilot program, although 13 others have applied to run such programs.

The other program, Secure Flight, is designed to simplify the manner in which passenger names are checked against the federal government's Terror Watch List. After spending hundreds of millions of dollars, the program has been scrapped and sent back to the drawing board because of privacy concerns.

The TSA's Ms. Howe defends the decision, saying, "We'd rather get it right than fast." And some travel experts agree. Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa., says the current screening system needs to be improved before any new layers are added.

"If you're going to put new processes on top of things that aren't yet operating at an efficient or proficient level, then you can actually complicate matters, and customer service can suffer more," he says.

Will Long Lines Be In The Bag This Thanksgiving? (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, November 7, 2006

ATLANTA — Many air travelers have been slow to catch on to the new rules of flying, and government and airline officials fear the confusion could snarl security lines at some of the USA's busiest airports Thanksgiving week.

At major airports such as Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson, Washington Dulles, Las Vegas and others, many passengers arrive unaware of rules that have restricted what may be carried aboard a flight since the uncovering in London last August of an alleged terrorist bombing plot.

DOJ_NMG_0091613

Despite strict rules barring large containers of liquids in carry-on bags, passengers are showing up with big containers of shampoo, toothpaste, aftershave, water, even liquor. Such errors force security screeners to instruct passengers, remove the banned items and make time-consuming hand searches of bags. The result: slower lines.

ADVICE: Not following baggie rules can bog down lines

If the Atlanta airport — the USA's busiest — is any sign, it could be a tough season when the volume of travelers soars later this month for Thanksgiving. Willie Williams, federal security director at Hartsfield-Jackson, says screening there is running as much as 30% slower than before the liquids ban.

Jack Smith, AirTran Airways' customer service chief, says the discount carrier is worried about the screening slowdown not only at its Atlanta hub but across its system.

"We're concerned, and we're doing everything we can to educate the customer," Smith says.

Airline officials say lines have increased at almost every sizable airport. But at certain airports, high volumes of less-experienced leisure travelers, combined with the physical layout, give rise to extraordinary problems. At the worst times at Hartsfield-Jackson — early morning on Monday and Saturday — security lines can snake back from the checkpoints through the terminal's atrium, down the hallways to the rapid transit station and back up the hallway to the luggage carousels.

Wait times on Columbus Day, a Monday, ran well over an hour after bad weather the day before forced AirTran and Delta Air Lines, the biggest carrier at Atlanta, to rebook some passengers. It wasn't that bad early last Saturday. Lines were long, but they moved relatively quickly. The longest wait to get through the checkpoint ran 19 minutes at 8 a.m.

Several travelers grumbled that they didn't know or forgot about the liquids restriction until the security agents reminded them at the start of the lines.

"I thought the ban was over," says Shane Hoff, a sales manager in Atlanta who had to throw away his shaving cream and deodorant in a large trash bin next to the agents' desks.

"I'm traveling with my wife's family. I'm going to smell all weekend," he said. "But it's not the end of the world."

Recent Mondays have also been tough.

"Atlanta Hartsfield on Monday morning looks like Disney World during spring break," says Atlanta-based business traveler Pat Everett, a hospital consultant.

Everett won't be traveling over the holidays. "I can't imagine what it's going to be like."

The holidays tend to see more infrequent fliers more likely to be unfamiliar with the rules. Airline officials worry that long security lines around Thanksgiving could cause passengers to miss their flights at a time when planes are too full to accommodate travelers left behind.

Officials also worry that bad experiences by passengers, and publicity about long airport waits at the holidays, will discourage some people from flying in the future.

"We're concerned about the next 30 days or so," says Christopher White, spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration, which runs airport checkpoints nationwide. "We have all hands on deck."

In October, several big airports were showing much longer wait times than in July, before the liquids ban, according to TSA figures. But even the biggest crowds in October don't come close to what airports are bracing for at Thanksgiving. Fully 50% more passengers surge to the airport on the day before Thanksgiving than on a typical Wednesday. The Sunday after Thanksgiving sees 15% more passengers than a typical Sunday.

'They won't have a clue'

The growing lines have prompted the TSA to launch a national public education campaign in the media, on its website (www.tsa.gov) and at airports to help passengers obey the liquids rules.

Major airports such as Atlanta and Las Vegas McCarran are waging their own education campaigns with press conferences, videos shown in area hotels and staff inside the airport telling passengers what they can take aboard.

Despite the outreach, says Randy Walker, director of Las Vegas McCarran, "I think this holiday season will be problematic." Airports nationally "will be getting a lot of people who haven't traveled since all this happened, and they won't have a clue."

At Las Vegas airport last week, passenger Tracy Parkswas surprised by the plastic bag rule.

"I just don't understand the baggie," said Parks, a therapist from Kansas City, Mo. He and his friend, Brian Thompson, were stopped from carrying bottled water and cologne in their carry-on bags, and had to check them.

"Now that I know about the baggie, I will use the baggie," Parks said.

Walker says a passenger recently showed up at a checkpoint there carrying a bottle of whiskey. He told the screeners it was exempt from the rules, and insisted the screeners just wanted it for themselves. Eventually, the man relinquished it.

In New Orleans, TSA says, a passenger arrived at a checkpoint with a pint-size bottle of hot sauce. In Atlanta, a woman showed up with so many little bottles of liquor that they wouldn't all fit inside a one-quart zip-top bag.

DOJ_NMG_0091614

When the screeners told her she couldn't take them all through the checkpoint, she drank three of the bottles and took the rest aboard.

According to the TSA, passengers are still showing up at checkpoints with full-size containers of toiletries inside their carry-on luggage. Other passengers don't have their little toiletries inside a zip-top bag, or they have a bag that's much bigger than a quart.

Still others are failing to remove the bag containing the toiletries from their carry-ons before X-ray screening. That forces the screeners to hand check the bag on the other side of the X-ray, slowing down the line.

Passengers "are doing it innocently," says Williams, the Atlanta security official. "They're not trying to sneak something through."

Large bottles of liquids, no matter how costly or important to the traveler, must be discarded before the checkpoint — or the suitcase must be checked.

The evolution of the liquid ban

The liquids crisis began Aug. 10. British authorities arrested more than 20 men in London believed to be plotting to blow up U.S.-bound trans-Atlantic jets using liquid explosives taken onto planes in carry-on luggage.

The TSA and its counterpart in Britain abruptly banned all liquids and gels from carry-ons. Only baby formula and prescription medicines were exempt.

The ban initially gridlocked airports and forced most passengers to check their luggage, because liquids were still allowed in checked luggage. The resulting surge in checked luggage overwhelmed some luggage systems, contributing to a 26% year-over-year spike in the rate of complaints about mishandled luggage in August.

Responding to appeals from airlines and business traveler groups, the TSA on Sept. 25 revised the rules to allow small quantities of toiletries through checkpoints. Now, passengers may bring typical travel items such as shampoo, toothpaste and makeup through security checkpoints, provided they're in 3-ounce or smaller containers that all fit inside a 1-quart clear plastic zip-top bag. Only one bag per passenger is allowed. TSA calls this the 3-1-1 rule. Most drugstores stock popular toiletries in small travel sizes.

A zip-top bag containing the toiletries must be removed from a carry-on suitcase and placed in a separate tray prior to screening.

Airport stores in Atlanta, Dallas/Fort Worth and elsewhere are selling zip-top plastic bags for 50 cents apiece. Bob Hope Airport in Burbank, Calif., is more generous: It's giving away 6,000 bags this season.

TSA officials say tests by the FBI found it's highly unlikely that terrorists could destroy a jet with a bomb made from such small amounts of fluids.

Passengers are also allowed to carry on water and toiletries in any quantity bought at airport shops beyond security checkpoints, including liquor and perfume bought at duty-free shops. Liquids are screened before being sold in secure airport areas.

Inexperienced screeners

Although the Atlanta airport is fully staffed, security lines have grown just as TSA at many airports is battling chronically high turnover rates among screeners. Despite a retention bonus program offered by the TSA, one in five security screeners left his or her job during the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30. That has caused staffing problems at some airports, and some screeners are new and inexperienced.

Business traveler Everett says a screener at Hartsfield recently forced him to give up an unmarked, 3-ounce plastic bottle containing his favorite aftershave, Old Spice. She told him the bottle had to have a manufacturer's label. Although that's not correct, Everett had to throw it out.

After that, Everett bought a travel-size container of mouthwash, poured out the mouthwash, and — at the risk of smelling minty — poured in Old Spice. "It sails through the checkpoint," he says.

TSA is pulling out all the stops to keep lines moving over the holidays. Williams says the Atlanta airport is fully staffed with screeners and will have all 22 checkpoint lanes open Thanksgiving week.

Twenty-two uniformed airport employees trained by TSA will be telling passengers what they can and cannot bring aboard before they get to the checkpoint. Sixteen-foot-long signs bearing the TSA's 3-1-1 rule are hanging in the terminal. Brochures are at curbside.

"I think that, over time, people will get it," says Williams, who has been Hartsfield's security director for five years.

Travelers really have no choice. "These regulations are not going away anytime soon," he says.

Contributing: Roger Yu from Atlanta; Chris Woodyard from Las Vegas.

Not Following Baggie Rules Can Bog Down Lines (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0091615

By Roger Yu

USA Today, November 7, 2006

ATLANTA — It's Saturday morning at Hartsfield-Jackson International, typically one of the busiest times at the USA's busiest airport. What you see is a traveling public that is adjusting to the new rules of air travel.

Watching things unfold at the sprawling airport's single security checkpoint makes it clear that travelers, based on their experience and the degree to which they've done their homework, fall into distinct categories.

Some understand in detail what the government now requires to clear security checkpoints under rules changes implemented in August and revised in September. Others? Not so much.

The new rules now say liquid and gel items carried on board must be in containers that are three ounces or less. The bottles must fit in one 1-quart plastic zip-top bag, which must be placed in a security tray for X-ray during inspection. They call it the 3-1-1 rule.

STORY: Will long lines be in the bag this Thanksgiving?

Last Saturday, two lines of travelers led to the 22 inspection lanes that constitute the checkpoint.

The average wait time on Saturday mornings is typically 20 to 25 minutes, says Christopher White, a spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration. But the line moved relatively quickly on this day. The longest wait time was 19 minutes. After 9 a.m., it was down to about 7 to 8 minutes.

At 8:30 a.m., three TSA agents stationed at two desks at the beginning of the lines loudly reminded passengers of the 3-1-1 rule for carry-ons.

Two large TSA banners reinforced the message. Many travelers didn't bother to look up and read them. An electronic sign about four feet tall next to the agents' desks also explained the rules.

The Initiated

Many travelers at the checkpoint came prepared.

Barbara Addaman and Debbie Bond, residents of Atlanta who were traveling to Pensacola, Fla., arrived at the airport shortly before 8 a.m. and waited about 15 minutes at security. "We checked everything, and we knew not to take liquid on board," Addaman says. "We live in Atlanta, and everything (about the airport) is publicized. If you live in an area with a small airport, maybe you're not as aware."

Michael and Linda Friedman, a couple from Atlanta on their way to Acapulco for vacation, stood in line to clear security carrying just their jackets and passports. Knowing the rules well, they also packed their liquid and gel items in their checked luggage. "We know what to do. We travel a lot," says Michael Friedman, a financial adviser.

Leah Streuber, a district manager in Atlanta for Weight Watchers, also knows the TSA rules, but she still got smacked by them because she arrived late for her flight.

Arriving at the security line, she didn't hesitate in walking up to the trash bin next to the security line and tossing in her shampoo and conditioner bottles.

She had planned on checking her luggage, so she didn't bring the smaller bottles required by TSA. Because she arrived late, she didn't have time to stop at the airline counter to check bags. "I'd have been more upset if I had missed my flight," she says.

The Uninitiated

Sonja Hicks, an accountant in Atlanta who was heading to Charlotte to visit friends, was disappointed to have to throw away her moisturizer and lotion. She said she knew about the rules, but simply forgot about them until a TSA agent reminded her at security.

"I wish they would provide the plastic bags," she says wistfully. But a plastic bag wouldn't have saved her — her bottles were larger than the allowable 3 ounces.

A candy store next to the security lines was selling 1-quart plastic bags for 50 cents each. D.J. Washington, an Atlanta-based career consultant for athletes, took advantage of it. On his way to catch a flight to Tulsa, he realized that he had packed his deodorant, toothpaste and cologne in his carry-on.

"I forgot about (the rules)," he says. "But an agent at the line told me about the store."

Shon Bourgoyne, who works at an accounting firm in Atlanta, says she thought the ban on liquids had been lifted. Before entering security, she and India White, one of her three traveling companions heading for a wedding in Chicago, gathered their small liquid items and stored them in a plastic bag they bought at the candy store.

Bourgoyne, her husband Pierre and Pierre's mother passed through security without a hitch, but were forced to wait after agents found large bottles of deodorant and body spray in White's carry-on.

An agent reminded White that she could either discard the items or go back to the airline counter to check her luggage. She chose the latter option, keeping the Bourgoynes waiting.

"I feel sorry for people traveling during the holidays, because the signs aren't very clear," Shon Bourgoyne says.

Bourgoyne says she wishes the airline counter agent had reminded them of the rules.

Airlines have TSA signs posted on their counters.

The Big Picture People

Some travelers had a general notion of the rules. The specifics tripped them up.

Many stopped at the desks manned by TSA agents at the beginning of the line to clear up confusion: How about a lip gloss?

(Lipstick is OK outside the plastic bag. Gloss must be in the bag.)

Does my bottle exceed 3 ounces?

(Read the label.)

What if my plastic bag is not zip-top?

(No go.)

White, the TSA spokesman, says enforcement was actually easier when liquid and gel items were banned because of fewer gray areas. TSA banned liquids aboard flights on Aug. 10. It implemented its 3-1-1 rule on Sept. 26.

David Vernon, an IT consultant from Augusta, Ga., was downing his coffee in a mug quickly before entering the security line, knowing it was banned.

Holding an unopened 1-liter bottle of water that would clearly be banned, he wondered if he could stomach drinking that, as well.

He had bought the bottle earlier in the morning on his way to the airport, hoping to drink it on board. He thought there was a chance that the TSA would bend the rule for him. "This whole liquid thing is annoying. I didn't even notice the signs. And (even if I did), I probably wouldn't have read it," he says.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Envoy To Iraq Likely Quitting Post (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 7, 2006

Zalmay Khalilzad, the plainspoken dealmaker and Republican insider who has won praise and criticism for attempts to broker Sunni political participation in Iraq's fragile government, is likely to quit his post as U.S. ambassador in Baghdad in the coming months, a senior Bush administration official said Monday.

As the midterm elections approached in the United States, Khalilzad has been a public face of Bush administration attempts to project both willingness to change strategy or tactics in an unpopular war and solidarity with the increasingly fractious Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Khalilzad's departure has been rumored for months, but he has not turned in his resignation, the State Department official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because neither the White House nor Khalilzad has announced any personnel changes. Khalilzad could leave as soon as the end of this year, but is more likely to remain in his post through the spring, the official said.

"He doesn't want to stay there forever and there are ongoing discussions about when he will finish his time, but there is no definite date," the official said.

Other U.S. officials have said Khalilzad will probably return to an academic or private sector job in the United States. His replacement in Baghdad may be Ryan Crocker, a senior career diplomat who is currently U.S. ambassador to Pakistan, those officials said. Crocker was a top U.S. representative in Baghdad for several months in 2003, shortly after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

Khalilzad is an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim who was seen as a go-between among Iraq's political and sectarian factions when named to the Baghdad post in April 2005. Initially criticized by some Shiites for showing what they called favoritism to the Sunni minority, Khalilzad has more recently been a target of Sunni criticism that the United States is not doing enough to protect Sunnis from Shiite reprisals and death squads.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, during a Baghdad visit on Friday, told al-Maliki that Khalilzad would leave about the first of the year and replaced by Crocker, according to two top aides to the Iraqi leader. The aides spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to release information.

DOJ_NMG_0091617

Negroponte was Khalilzad's predecessor as ambassador in Baghdad. Khalilzad had been the Bush administration's ambassador to Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban. A White House favorite whom Bush calls by his nickname "Zal," Khalilzad worked in the Republican administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Al-Maliki snubbed Khalilzad two weeks ago, when the ambassador held a press conference to announce that Iraqi leaders had agreed to develop a timeline by the end of the year for progress in stabilizing the country, only to be contradicted by al-Maliki hours later.

Last week Khalilzad and U.S. military commanders agreed to lift a U.S. security cordon around a Shiite slum in Baghdad after meeting with al-Maliki. Sunnis claimed that al-Maliki asked to lift the cordon on orders from anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an important base of al-Maliki's support.

Aides to the prime minister have said flatly that he hopes to expand his authority by playing on American voter discontent and White House reluctance to open a public fight just before the elections.

Iraqis Told Not To Worry Over US Elections (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

Washington has reassured Iraqi leaders that there is no reason to worry about dramatic changes in policy as a result of Tuesday's US elections, Zalmay Khalilzad, the US envoy to Iraq, has told the Financial Times.

Some of the Iraqis "are not as used to [American domestic politics], when things are being said in the heat of the political fight". Some of them took that "as an indication that policies will change dramatically", he said.

"The president has told them not to pay attention to that . . . the president will be the commander in chief and the architect of US foreign policy regardless of the outcome." President George W. Bush's Republican party is expecting a setback in the mid-term elections, in which US policy in Iraq has been a big factor in the Democrats' rising fortunes.

Mr Khalilzad played down reports of tension between the US embassy and the Iraqi government and said that he welcomed statements by Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, that he wanted more control over Iraqi security forces.

"There are some people who think that there's a struggle going on [with] Iraqis who want to have more authority, as if we were fighting over the wheel of a car, who's going to take charge of it," the ambassador said. "But in fact that is not the case. Our goal is Iraqi self-reliance, [so] we welcome someone such as Mr Maliki, the leader of Iraq, saying: 'Look, I want to take more responsibility for the security of my country, I want more forces, forces that are capable, forces that are under my control'."

Mr Khalilzad added that Iraqi politicians were working to resolve key issues that divided the big ethnic and sectarian blocs.

"They still have the issue of the hydrocarbon law, the issue of militias and insurgents . . . even if they need a new flag or not, when do you . . . have provincial elections?" He said Iraqi leaders had claimed there would be a plan to handle militias by the end of the year.

The ambassador also said that Iraqi leaders needed to move quickly to reach compromises to retain the support of the international community. "They have to recognise that the patience of the countries that can help them is wearing thin."

¦Mr Khalilzad is likely to quit his post as US ambassador in Baghdad in the coming months, a senior official in Mr Bush's administration said on Tuesday. His departure has been rumoured for months but he had yet to resign, the State Department official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because neither the White House nor Mr Khalilzad has announced any personnel changes.

Mr Khalilzad could leave as soon as the end of this year but was more likely to remain in his post through the spring, the official said.

"He doesn't want to stay there forever and there are ongoing discussions about when he will finish his time." US officials said the envoy would probably return to an academic or private sector job in the US. His replacement may be Ryan Crocker, who is ambassador to Pakistan.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

Just kidding, Donald

Talk about an "A-list" headlining the American Spectator's Robert L. Bartley dinner (and dancing) Nov. 15 at the Mandarin Oriental hotel, although the evening's master of ceremonies will no doubt be a bit uncomfortable when introducing the keynote speaker.

That master of ceremonies would be myriad-hat wearer Ben Stein, and the keynote address will be delivered by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0091618

Inside the Beltway can't help but recall Mr. Stein, in his "CBS Sunday Morning" commentary barely one week ago pointing out that the situation in Iraq has become so difficult that if he were still a White House speechwriter, as he was under Richard M. Nixon and Gerald R. Ford, this is what he would suggest President Bush announce today:

"My fellow Americans, I have some sobering news. It is my duty above all to protect the nation and to protect the Constitution. I sincerely believed I was doing that when I ordered the invasion of Iraq. I still believe Saddam Hussein was the most dangerous man in the world. But it is clear to me now that things are not working out well in Iraq.

"Despite the incredible competence, bravery and sacrifice of our men and women on the ground there, Iraq is still a violent, largely out-of-control country. We may be making more terrorists than we destroy. The word 'quagmire' comes to mind.

"It is clear that changes must be made. I have this morning accepted Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's resignation with sincere thanks for his service to the nation. Despite his flaws, he is a great American. He will be replaced by a truly heroic American, Senator John McCain of Arizona."

Two-day election?

To ensure that the balloting may

Proceed in an orderly way:

On Tuesday, please note,

All Republicans vote --

And all Democrats on the next day.

-- F.R. Duplantier

Luntz leak

"I will discuss the significance of what I expect to be a significant power shift in Washington, with a particular emphasis on the implications for corporate America."

-- leading Washington political pollster Frank Luntz, who leans to the right, hinting of his prediction of a rise to power by Democrats when providing the subject matter of his Election Day conference call today at 4 p.m., several hours before the polls close.

Long distancer

Hats off to U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission chief Edward McGaffigan Jr., for becoming, as of Friday, the longest-serving person in his post -- 9 years, 11 months and 30 days under his belt.

Previous record holder: former NRC Commissioner Kenneth C. Rogers.

Mr. McGaffigan, first appointed to the regulatory body in 1996 by President Clinton, also is the first person to have been nominated (twice by Mr. Clinton) and confirmed to three terms on the panel. He begins his 10th year of service on Dec. 9.

Nevertheless, as Eliot B. Brenner, the NRC's director of public affairs, tells Inside the Beltway of Washington's all-too-familiar ways: "He had a 103-day break between his second and third terms while awaiting Senate confirmation of his nomination."

The commissioner, who grew up in Boston (an avid runner, he has completed six U.S. Marine Corps marathons and one JFK 50 Miler) and lives in Arlington with his two children (his wife of 18 years, Peggy, passed away in 2000), will be honored by his fellow commissioners and senior staffers at an event tomorrow at NRC headquarters.

Ben then

We opened this morning's column with an item about Ben Stein, whom younger generations know as a movie and TV actor and his "gets the red out" Visine commercials. Indeed, his speech in his film role as the teacher in "Ferris Bueller's Day Off" has been ranked as one of the 50 most famous scenes in American film.

But whereas Mr. Stein resides today in Beverly Hills, Calif., it's interesting to recall that he was born in Washington in 1944, grew up in Silver Spring and attended Montgomery Blair High School.

He was a Washington poverty lawyer in his early years, then a trial lawyer for the Federal Trade Commission, and an adjunct at American University, lecturing on politics and society. As we mentioned, he spent two years as a speechwriter for Presidents Nixon and Ford, although he has stressed he did not write the line "I am not a crook."

Iraq Court To Rule On Saddam Verdict (AP-Y)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, November 7, 2006

Iraq's appeals court is expected to rule on Saddam Hussein's guilty verdict and death sentence by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said Monday, setting in motion a possible execution by mid-February.

If the ruling is upheld, The Associated Press has learned that Iraq's three-man presidential council is pledged to allow Saddam's hanging to take place. The execution must be carried out within 30 days of the appeals court's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0091619

The surge in violence expected immediately after Sunday's verdict did not happen. The Interior Ministry credited a round-the-clock curfew in Baghdad and two restive Sunni provinces. Checkpoints were also closed along Iraq's borders with Jordan and Syria. Authorities were gradually lifting the restrictions, with pedestrians allowed back on the streets of Baghdad late Monday afternoon.

Around the country, jubilant Shiites celebrated the verdict, as Sunnis held defiant counter-demonstrations.

Saddam, who empowered the Sunni minority when he ruled Iraq, was sentenced by the Iraqi High Tribunal for ordering the executions of nearly 150 Shiites from the city of Dujail following a 1982 attempt on his life.

If the appeals court upholds the sentences, all three members of the Presidential Council — President Jalal Talabani and Vice Presidents Tariq al-Hashimi and Adil Abdul-Mahdi — must sign death warrants before executions can be carried out.

Talabani said Monday that although he opposes capital punishment, his signature is not needed to carry out Saddam's death sentence. Talabani, a Kurd, has permanently authorized Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite, to sign on his behalf. Abdul-Mahdi has said he would sign Saddam's death warrant, meaning two of three signatures were assured.

Al-Hashimi, the other vice president and a Sunni, gave his word that he also would sign a Saddam death sentence as part of the deal under which he got the job April 22, according to witnesses at the meeting, which was attended by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

"We wanted a written promise before the first meeting of the new parliament. But later and during a meeting in the presence of American and British ambassadors and other politicians, the promise became oral in which he vowed not to oppose important rules and laws — especially those related to Saddam," Deputy Parliament Speaker Khaled al-Attiyah told the AP.

Thus the approval of the death penalties handed down Sunday for Saddam, his half brother Barzan Ibrahim, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, chief of the Revolutionary Court, had been part of the pact under which al-Hashimi got one of two vice presidential posts.

If the nine-judge appeals panel upholds the death sentences, they could be ready for signing early next year, according to a schedule laid out Monday by chief prosecutor Jaafar Moussawi.

Moussawi said the Iraqi High Tribunal must send the entire case file to the appeals panel within 10 days, or by Nov. 15.

On the same day that the defense appeal is given to the High Tribunal — the deadline is Dec. 5 — that court is required to send it to the prosecutor general for study and preparation of counter-arguments.

The prosecutor has no time limit to answer the appeal, but Moussawi told AP he would submit his brief within days of receiving the defense appeal.

While the appellate court also has no deadline for its ruling, Moussawi said it would act quickly because it had no other cases under consideration.

"The appeals panel will take less than a month to make its decision," Moussawi said.

Many Oppose Death Penalty For Hussein (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates Nov. 6 — European politicians on Monday spoke out against the death sentence for Saddam Hussein. Arab officials and commentators derided what they said was a flawed and politicized trial, while for the first time broadly acknowledging Mr. Hussein's crimes.

Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, speaking to reporters on Monday, said he opposed the death penalty for Mr. Hussein, joining several other European leaders and European Union officials who announced their opposition to the sentence. When pressed by reporters, Mr. Blair spoke of his longstanding opposition to capital punishment. He said he did not intend to protest the sentence, and condemned Mr. Hussein's brutality.

European leaders insisted that the viciousness of the actions of which Mr. Hussein was found guilty had not changed their view that state-sponsored killing was wrong. Some warned that executing Mr. Hussein would only worsen the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq.

The Associated Press quoted Terry Davis, secretary general of the Council of Europe's Parliamentary Assembly, as saying: "A country ravaged by violence and death does not need more violence, and especially not a state-orchestrated execution. Saddam Hussein is a criminal and should not be allowed to become a martyr."

Amnesty International said Sunday that it "deplored" Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as "deeply flawed and unfair."

In the Arab world, many dismissed the verdict as a product of an unfair trial, decrying the lack of control of the proceedings by the judges, the seeming contradictions in procedures and the generally politicized nature of the proceedings. Most of those who commented on the subject said the decision to impose the death penalty would not stem the wave of violence gripping Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0091620

"You'll hear a lot of moderates say it's great Saddam got what he deserves, but unfortunately it was through a trial that was regrettable," said Ayman Safadi, the editor of the Jordanian daily newspaper Al Ghad. "People see Saddam himself as irrelevant. This trial was not about Saddam; it was about Iraq itself."

Analysts said the timing of the verdict, just two days before the United States midterm elections, underscored the politically charged nature of the proceedings.

"His sentencing now is a deliberate attempt to boost the Republicans in the U.S.," said Imad Shueibi, president of the Data and Strategic Studies Center, a privately financed research organization in Damascus, Syria. "They're expecting big losses in the upcoming elections, and they figure maybe this sentence might give an illusion of some success. But of course only the naïve will believe that."

But for many, the trial missed an opportunity to send messages to other dictators and to teach valuable lessons.

"There's no way to celebrate," said Muhammed al-Ameer, the political editor at the Saudi daily newspaper Al Riyadh. "No one doubts that Saddam committed human rights abuses, but the trial was so flawed that it put things in question. It just keeps sounding like a step taken by the Republicans to help them."

Perhaps the most dramatic shift was in how many viewed Mr. Hussein. Previously, few in the region had been willing to address directly the issue of whether he might be guilty of crimes against his people, with many people lionizing the former dictator. Most of those interviewed on Sunday and Monday said they believed he was guilty, but they also said that the flaws in his trial offset his guilt.

"People used to see Saddam as a fearless, defiant leader, but then he appeared in handcuffs and his image was shattered," said Saleh Qallab, a columnist with the Jordanian government-backed newspaper Al Rai. "Nobody can sympathize with a weak figure; that change is not political, but psychological."

Makram Mohamed Ahmed, a columnist with the Egyptian government-backed Al Ahram newspaper, said, "He was a burden to his nation and a burden to the entire Arab world and he might have truly deserved this fate, if only the court's legitimacy was not in question."

Most of all, Mr. Ahmed said, the verdict has failed to send a message to other Arab leaders to loosen their grip and make needed changes. "I don't think any of the Arab leaders will come to think that this can happen again," he said. "The Bush's administration is losing its popularity and the Democrats may get a majority in the Congressional elections."

Iraq's Rough Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

IT WAS THE U.S. Supreme Court, not the Iraqi High Tribunal, that famously declared: "A defendant is entitled to a fair trial but not a perfect one." Still, that legal dictum is an apt description of the process by which the Iraqi court decided to sentence Saddam Hussein to death for the slaughter of 148 Iraqi Shiite villagers in 1982.

With customary exaggeration, President Bush went further, hailing Hussein's trial, which began in October 2005, as "a milestone in the Iraqi people's effort to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law." At the other extreme, some human rights groups are finding fault with the proceedings because of evidentiary shortcuts, alleged conflicts of interest and the politically motivated removal of several judges.

The conduct of Hussein's trial on this and other charges fell short of American norms (such as the right to a trial by jury) and also lacked the imprimatur of the International Criminal Court. As we have argued before, the legitimacy of the proceedings would have been enhanced if respected foreign jurists had joined their Iraqi counterparts on the bench. Some of these deficiencies may be rectified in the appeals process, which must be thorough and painstaking.

That said, the trial established that Hussein ordered the massacre of residents of the Shiite farming town of Dujayl as collective punishment for a failed assassination attempt. Like other examples of Hussein's brutality, the killings in Dujayl should not have gone unpunished. Whatever its flaws, the trial established Hussein's guilt in an open and adversarial proceeding (one that the deposed dictator did his best to disrupt).

Not content to pronounce that justice had been done, Bush gushed that the sentencing of Hussein was a "major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government." Where Bush and Iraqi's Shiites discern simple justice in Hussein's comeuppance, the country's Sunni population sees sectarian payback by the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki. Maliki said that Hussein is finally "facing the penalty he deserves."

That penalty — death by hanging — is also controversial, with British Prime Minister Tony Blair reiterating Monday that his nation opposes the death penalty "whether it's Saddam or anyone else." Capital punishment is legal in Iraq (as it is in the U.S., regrettably), and Iraqi authorities are unlikely to be swayed by death penalty abolitionists in this of all cases. The prospect of capital punishment has always been at the end of this trial.

DOJ_NMG_0091621

None of this suggests that Hussein should have been given amnesty for the atrocities carried out under his orders. Even critics of the U.S. invasion that brought him down acknowledge that his rule was not just brutal but bestial. Holding him accountable for his crimes is a matter of simple (if rough) justice. But it will be a "milestone" for the rule of law in Iraq only if Sunnis can be convinced that the new order in their country isn't as unjust as the old one.

Imperfect, But Fair Enough (WSJ)

By Alan Dershowitz

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

The Nuremberg trials it is not. But then again, Saddam Hussein is no Hitler or Goering. He was a regional tyrant whose invasion of Kuwait was turned back by the U.S., whose effort to develop nuclear weapons was thwarted by Israel, and whose war with Iran proved mutually destructive. He did succeed in murdering, torturing and terrorizing thousands of his own people, and for one small part of that -- the murder of 148 men and boys in the town of Dujail -- he was placed on trial, convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to hang.

The trial itself was repeatedly disrupted by in-court outbursts, out-of-court murders of lawyers, and frequent changes of court personnel. It did not go nearly as smoothly as Nuremberg: But those trials were conducted after World War II had been decisively won and all resistance ended. The trial of Saddam was conducted in the midst of continuing resistance and ongoing violence. Considering this important difference, the trial process was remarkably efficient.

But was it fair, or was it victors' justice, as Goering characterized Nuremberg? In a sense, all trials that follow military conflicts are victors' justice; the losers don't get to hold trials. No British generals were placed on trial for Dresden, nor were any Americans put in the dock for Nagasaki. But some victors' justice can be fairer than others. Nuremberg represents the epitome of fair victors' justice. The defendants were brilliantly represented by lawyers of their own choosing. The prosecutors were the brightest and fairest the victorious Allies could send. (Even the Soviet chief prosecutor was a distinguished lawyer, though he was clearly taking orders from Stalin.) The judges were, for the most part, highly regarded (the Soviet judges, though highly experienced, lacked the independence of the American, British and French). The verdicts were generally regarded as fair, with some death penalties, some terms of imprisonment (many quickly commuted) and not a few acquittals. These calibrated results satisfied the appearance of justice, as well as the reality in most cases.

The Baghdad trial also produced calibrated results: three death sentences, one sentence of life imprisonment, three sentences of many years behind bars, and one acquittal for lack of evidence. The fact that the conviction and death sentence of Saddam was a foregone conclusion does not necessarily undercut the trial's fairness. The verdict and sentence was predictable because the facts were clear and the evidence compelling. A defendant's obvious guilt does not necessarily make his trial unfair; nor does it necessarily make it fair. Even the most guilty and despicable are entitled to a trial before objective fact-finders (in this case judges, not jurors), with an opportunity to challenge the prosecution's evidence, to put on evidence of his own, and to have a fearless lawyer advocate on his behalf.

Saddam was afforded such a trial, though he denied it to others, and by the standards of justice in most Arab and Muslim countries, this trial was extraordinarily fair. But because the U.S. is the occupying power, and our representatives were looking over the shoulders of the Iraqi prosecutors and judges, the trial will be judged by Western standards. Even so, the Baghdad trial, though far from exemplary, must receive a passing grade, especially considering the circumstances in that city blighted by violence.

Would the trial have been fairer if it had been conducted by some sort of international tribunal situated outside Iraq? Certainly the threats to the lawyers would have been less dramatic. The death penalty probably would not have been imposed, since any court with European judges would not do so. The problem is that no international tribunal has yet established sufficient credibility, certainly not any that are under the auspices of the U.N. In this respect, the Baghdad trial represents a failure of the international community to devise a satisfactory process.

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, who is one of Saddam's lawyers, was thrown out of court for characterizing the trial as a "mockery of justice." He and Saddam's other lawyers will have the opportunity to provide specifics to back this rather general charge when they file their brief in the automatic appeal to which the defendants are entitled. It will be interesting to see whether the issues raised by the defendants are more political or legal -- whether they are macro or micro. If the defendants believe they have no chance for an appellate reversal or modification, and want to use the appeal to score political points, they will, of course, lose. But if they approach the appeal in a lawyerlike manner -- focusing on the particular evidence, the elements of the crimes, the judicial rulings, and other more technical issues -- they may provide the appellate chamber an opportunity to demonstrate the fairness of the process by modifying or even reversing some of the judgments.

The fairness of legal proceedings -- whether domestic or international, whether in war or in peace -- is always a matter of degree. Perfect justice is an illusion. Perfect injustice is a reality, as Saddam Hussein proved when he inflicted it on his perceived enemies for so many years. Now this exemplar of perfect injustice has been subjected to imperfect justice. The result is satisfying, and should serve as an object lesson to the many dictators who continue to terrorize their people and others in the expectation that they will never be brought to justice.

DOJ_NMG_0091622

Mr. Dershowitz, professor of law at Harvard, is the author, most recently, of "Preemption: A Knife that Cuts Both Ways" (Norton, 2006).

Justice In Iraq (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Over the coming days and weeks -- throughout the appeals process, up to and including the day of the execution itself -- you are going to hear a lot about what went wrong with the trial of Saddam Hussein. You will be told, as an Amnesty International director put it , that the trial "has been a shabby affair, marred by serious flaws. . . . Every accused has a right to a fair trial, whatever the magnitude of the charge against him."

You will hear many denunciations of the verdict itself: The British Guardian newspaper called on Iraq to maintain a "principled opposition to the death penalty, to which there can be no exceptions. No European country now executes its criminals." You will also be told that the judges were incompetent, that the Iraqi government interfered constantly and that the international legal community loathed the trial from the start. All of this is true -- and all mostly irrelevant.

In fact, all post hoc political trials are in some sense "victor's justice." That's just the nature of putting on trial people who were not doing anything "illegal," according to the laws of their totalitarian society, at the time they committed their crimes. The International Military Tribunal that sentenced the Nazi leadership at Nuremberg not only wrote special rules to duck the question of its own dubious legality but even accused the Nazis, at one point, of murdering some 20,000 Polish officers at Katyn and elsewhere, a crime that the Soviet judges -- among them an infamous participant in show trials -- knew for a fact that the Soviet Union itself had committed. The much-vaunted, approved-by-international-community trial of Slobodan Milosevic evolved into an occasion for the Serbian ex-dictator to carry on an extended rant. In part, the decision to hold Hussein's trial in Iraq was made in order to avoid that kind of U.N.-sanctioned failure. In part it was made because back in 2003 the U.N. Security Council -- led by France, Russia and China -- told the Iraqis organizing the trial that it wanted nothing to do with the trial anyway.

In truth, though, the shambolic and incoherent nature of this trial was not so much evidence of too few foreign human rights lawyers as it was yet another byproduct of the shambolic and incoherent nature of the U.S. occupation of Iraq. Clearly the violence outside the courtroom affected what happened inside: Defense lawyers were murdered, judges traveled under armed guard and members of the prosecution said privately that they still felt afraid when Hussein came in the room. At times, their fear showed, adding to the appearance of incompetence. Even now, the chief investigative judge visits mass-grave sites in strict secrecy; his family is in hiding, as are the families of other judges.

The violence outside the courtroom also affected how the trial was perceived outside its walls. Televised testimony, which Iraqis initially found riveting, grew less relevant as the violence increased. The trial became nothing more than the background noise of the sectarian struggle: On Sunday, Shiites cheered the verdict while Sunnis denounced it. Imagine how different Hussein's death sentence would sound today if a stable, peaceful Iraq with a reformed judicial system were uniting to declare it, unanimously. Even the British media might then accept that, in such extraordinary cases, the Iraqis are allowed to choose penalties of which Europeans disapprove.

And yet, in the end there is only one standard by which the trial of Hussein and other Baathist leaders should be judged: Did it or did it not compile a true record of Hussein's crimes -- a record that in some distant, future, peaceful Iraq, will be available to help Iraqis understand what took place during Saddam Hussein's reign? Though it is unfashionable to write anything positive about Iraq right now, the answer is that it did. The crime for which Hussein was condemned -- the torture and execution of 148 people in the small town of Dujail more than two decades ago -- was well documented . Witnesses and archives were produced. Cross-examinations were held.

In August the Iraqi court started hearings in a second trial , this one designed to examine the Anfal campaign of 1987-89, during which Hussein murdered up to 180,000 Kurds. Already, some dozen witnesses have testified about what they saw when Hussein, at the height of the campaign, unleashed chemical weapons on whole Kurdish villages. Large parts of Shiite and Sunni Iraq are hearing these stories for the first time. Listening to them may someday, in that distant, future, peaceful Iraq, help them to understand what Kurds experienced under Saddam Hussein's reign and help them to achieve some kind of reconciliation.

It is true that the execution of Hussein, if and when it occurs, could well have a positive effect on Iraqi politics. If nothing else, it will eliminate once and for all the Baathist dream of a Hussein-led revanche -- a dream that even Hussein himself appears to have cherished; witnesses say he was genuinely surprised by the verdict and was shaking afterward. But his death will also probably put an end to this truth-telling project, one that has been unique and unprecedented in the Arab world. For the first time, an Arab dictator was held accountable for crimes against his people. Thanks to American incompetence in Iraq, it may be the last time for a long time, too.

DOJ_NMG_0091623

Thousands From Saddam's Party May Regain Jobs (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to die, the Iraqi government declared a major concession Monday to the Sunni Arabs who backed him. The action could result in thousands of purged members of Saddam's party being reinstated in their jobs.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of five American troops. Two soldiers were killed in a helicopter crash north of Baghdad, and two Marines and an Army soldier died in fighting in Anbar province in the west. The deaths raised to 18 the number of U.S. servicemembers killed in Iraq in the first six days of November.

The political concession was detailed by the government organization that had been charged with removing Saddam loyalists from state institutions. Under a draft law, the organization would amend its rules to enable former Baath Party members to regain their jobs.

The amendments grew out of a 24-point national reconciliation plan that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, announced in June, shortly after he took office.

Sunni Arabs were the base of Saddam's support and became the backbone of the insurgency that has killed tens of thousands of Iraqis and has been responsible for the vast majority of U.S. casualties. Al-Maliki hopes to entice disaffected Sunnis away from the insurgency.

Under the former "de-Baathification" protocols, devised by the U.S.-led occupation authority after Saddam's regime fell, 10,302 senior Baath Party members had been listed for dismissal. The draft law, however, includes the names of just 1,500 party members, said Ali al-Lami, the commission's executive director. Those not reinstated would receive pensions, he said.

The draft law must be approved by the country's Shiite-dominated parliament.

The United States dissolved and banned the Baath Party in May 2003. It later modified its stance and invited former high-level officers from the disbanded military to join the security forces.

The former top U.S. administrator in Iraq, Paul Bremer, also allowed thousands of teachers who were Baathists to return to work. He conceived of the de-Baathification effort but later found that it had gutted key ministries and the military with no replacement personnel among the Iraqi workforce and educated elite.

The United States had joined recently with Sunnis Arabs in calling for the Shiite-dominated government to end the process, which had exacerbated the already deep fissures among the country's religious and ethnic groups.

"Such a move will be in the interest of Iraq because a Baathist, like any Iraqi citizen, has the right to get back his job," said Ammar Wajih of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni group.

About 1.5 million of Iraq's 27 million people belonged to the Baath Arab Socialist Party when Saddam was ousted. Many, however, joined for professional, not ideological, reasons. Career advancement, university enrollment and specialized medical care depended on party membership.

Regardless of why they joined, those who advanced in the party were expected to spy on fellow Iraqis and to join militias that helped suppress Shiite and Kurdish revolts after Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Administration Reaches Out To Saddam Backers (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to death by hanging, the Shi'ite-dominated government offered a major concession yesterday to his Sunni backers that could reinstate thousands of members of the ousted dictator's Ba'ath Party in their jobs.

With a tight curfew holding down violence after Saddam's guilty verdict and death sentence, the government reached out to disaffected Sunnis in hopes of enticing them away from the insurgency, which has killed tens of thousands of Iraqis and is responsible for the vast majority of U.S. casualties.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of five more American troops, two in a helicopter crash north of Baghdad and three in fighting west of the capital. The deaths raised to 18 the number of U.S. forces killed in the first six days of November.

Sectarian killings also persisted despite the extraordinary security precautions. Fifty-nine bodies were discovered Sunday and yesterday across Iraq, police said. But with no surge in violence, authorities gradually were lifting the restrictions in Baghdad and two restive Sunni provinces: Pedestrians were allowed back on the capital's streets late yesterday afternoon, and the international airport was to reopen today.

DOJ_NMG_0091624

Across the country, Shi'ites celebrated the verdict while Sunnis held defiant counterdemonstrations.

Iraq's appeals court is expected to rule on an appeal by Saddam's attorneys by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said yesterday, setting into motion an execution by mid-February. If the ruling is upheld, the Associated Press has learned, Iraq's three-member presidential council will allow Saddam's hanging. The execution must be carried out within 30 days of the appeals court's decision.

Sunday's verdict and yesterday's opening to the Sunnis were seen as a welcome break for the United States, which had called for the Iraqi government to stop purging members of Saddam's Ba'ath Party from their jobs. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, however, has balked at U.S. requests to set up an amnesty program for insurgents.

Mr. al-Maliki has been engaged in a public feud with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad since last month, when the prime minister disputed the envoy's announcement that he had agreed to a timeline for progress in quelling violence and encouraging Sunnis to join the political process.

Indications emerged yesterday that Mr. Khalilzad was preparing to leave his post.

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, during a visit to Baghdad on Friday, told Mr. al-Maliki that Mr. Khalilzad would leave about the first of the year and be replaced by Ryan Crocker, a senior career diplomat who is ambassador to Pakistan, two top aides to the Iraqi leader said.

The United States dissolved and banned the Ba'ath Party in May 2003, a month after toppling Saddam. The U.S. later softened its stance, inviting former high-level officers from the disbanded military to join the security forces.

About 1.5 million of Iraq's 27 million people belonged to the Ba'ath Party, formally known as the Ba'ath Arab Socialist Party, when Saddam was ousted. Most said they joined for professional, not ideological, reasons.

Proposal Would Rehire Members Of Hussein's Party (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 6 -- A high-ranking commission of Iraq's Shiite-led government said Monday it had prepared a draft law that could return tens of thousands of former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party to their government jobs.

After toppling Hussein in the spring of 2003, the interim U.S. authority that ran Iraq enacted a plan that purged Baath Party members from their government jobs, whether or not they had been accused of wrongdoing. The move threw thousands of Baathists out of work and is blamed by many for creating a vast pool of unemployed, disenfranchised Sunnis who later became eligible recruits for insurgent groups.

Thousands of former Baathists have since been allowed to return to their posts after rigorous vetting, but political and security analysts say that if the government were to enact more sweeping measures, it could help soothe rampant sectarian violence and advance reconciliation between the country's Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs.

Ali al-Lami, executive director of the Supreme National Commission for de-Baathification, said in an interview that the commission had drafted a law for parliament that would give 1.5 million former Baathists who "excommunicate" themselves from the party the option of returning to their former government jobs or drawing a pension for their past employment. Other estimates have put the number of purged Baathists in the tens of thousands; the figures could not be reconciled.

Lami said 3,000 or so top former Baathists would be given their pensions but would not be allowed to resume government employment. And about 1,500 high-level former Baathists would be barred from ever resuming their jobs or drawing a pension.

The announcement came as Iraq's capital and other volatile areas around the country remained under a full curfew following the death sentence handed down to Hussein the day before. With violence levels seemingly low and people increasingly defying the curfew, the government announced that life would return to normal on Tuesday.

Lami said the timing of the proposed rollback of de-Baathification -- which would be a boon for Sunnis -- had nothing to do with the verdict in Hussein's trial.

"There have been a lot of meetings with the political blocs and nongovernmental organizations, and it's almost complete," Lami said. "This is only for those who left the Baath Party," he said, noting that Iraq's constitution outlaws the party as a terrorist organization.

The two-day curfew, which covered Baghdad, the northern cities of Mosul and Kirkuk and the restive provinces of Salahuddin and Diyala, was imposed Sunday morning by authorities fearing a violent backlash against the verdict in Hussein's trial, which was announced later in the day. He was found guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced to hang for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the village of Dujail, north of Baghdad, in the 1980s.

The verdict sparked anguished protests by Sunni Arabs, particularly in Hussein's home town of Tikrit, and jubilant celebrations by Shiite Muslims, who were ruthlessly suppressed during his 24-year rule, but there were few reports of violence. It remains to be seen whether the curfew succeeded in stopping retaliatory attacks or only deferred them.

DOJ_NMG_0091625

Passions remained high in some areas, but the government lifted the curfew for pedestrians at 4 p.m. Monday and announced that people and vehicles could return to all of Iraq's roads at 6 a.m. Tuesday.

Pro-Hussein demonstrators marched Monday in several towns north of Baghdad, in the Sunni heartland, including Tikrit, 90 miles north of Baghdad, and Samarra, where the bombing of a Shiite shrine in February sparked intense sectarian clashes across Iraq.

In the towns of Hawijah and Riyadh, outside Kirkuk, hundreds of protesters demonstrated against the Hussein verdict, the U.S. occupation of Iraq and the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, carrying Hussein's picture and chanting, "Yes, yes, to the leader Saddam Hussein" and, "Death, death, to the America and Maliki government."

In Sadr City, a sprawling Shiite slum in eastern Baghdad with 2.5 million residents, people defied the curfew blanketing the rest of Baghdad and celebrated the verdict by passing out sweets to children and performing celebratory dances in the streets. Residents contacted by telephone said that life had returned to normal, with cars and buses in the streets, shops opened and people going about their daily business. They said police made no attempt to enforce the curfew in the area, which is controlled by the Mahdi Army, a militia led by anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"We don't care about the curfew in our city," said a 32-year-old blacksmith, referring to Sadr City. "But we respect the curfew outside" in the rest of Baghdad, he said. "In our city, no one can force us to stay in our homes. The Mahdi Army will protect us."

While President Bush on Sunday called Hussein's trial and verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," British Prime Minister Tony Blair, America's closest ally in Iraq, was more circumspect Monday, saying he and his party opposed the death penalty for Hussein -- or anyone -- on principle.

The U.S. military on Monday announced the deaths of five servicemen: Two soldiers died Monday when their helicopter crashed in Salahuddin province, north of Baghdad, a military statement said. No hostile fire was observed at the time of the crash, which is under investigation.

One Marine died Saturday and another on Monday of wounds sustained in fighting Saturday in Anbar province, west of Baghdad, a second military statement said. A soldier from the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division also died Monday in combat in Anbar, it said.

57 Iraqis Charged In Abuse At Prison (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 6 -- Iraq's Interior Ministry has charged 57 employees, including high-ranking officers, with human rights crimes for their roles in the torture of hundreds of detainees once jailed in a notorious eastern Baghdad prison known as Site 4, officials announced Monday.

The charges marked the first time the present Iraqi government has taken criminal action against members of its own security forces for operating torture chambers inside Interior Ministry prisons, said Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a ministry spokesman.

Sunni Arab detainees and human rights groups have long alleged that members of the ministry's police force, made up mostly of Shiite Muslims, took revenge on Sunni captives through beatings and other brutal methods. For months, Shiite officials have said such accusations are exaggerations, branding them attempts by Sunnis to discredit the Shiite-led government.

But on Monday, senior Interior Ministry officials acknowledged there was clear evidence of such abuses, following a probe by three separate investigative committees that lasted 2 1/2 months.

A U.N. human rights report reached a similar conclusion in the summer, after Iraqi and U.S. officials uncovered the torture during a visit to Site 4 in May. More than 1,400 detainees at Site 4 were held in "overcrowded, unsafe, and unhealthy conditions" and "suffered systematic physical and psychological abuse" by Interior Ministry officials, the report said. Investigators also took photos that "documented lesions resulting from torture as well as equipment used for this purpose."

"Whoever abuses power and authority will be held accountable, regardless of their position or background," Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani told reporters in an opulent room in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces. "This is giving a lesson for those in our ministry who may want to violate the law."

The action was the latest move in a series of recent Interior Ministry crackdowns on the police forces it runs. The Iraqi government is engaged in an intense struggle to bring under control sectarian reprisal killings, death squads and criminal gangs.

U.S. pressure is also growing to get rid of militias and death squads that are widely believed to have infiltrated Iraq's security forces. U.S. officials said they have warned the Iraqi government that U.S. law bars financially backing any foreign security force that violates human rights with impunity.

DOJ_NMG_0091626

In recent months, Bolani has fired more than 3,000 employees. In early October, the ministry suspended an entire police brigade on the suspicion that its members could be linked to Shiite death squads. Two weeks later, the ministry removed two of its highest-ranking police generals, who led its special police commandos and its public order brigade, both widely known to be infiltrated by Shiite militias.

Khalaf said one of the generals had played a role in the Site 4 abuses and "was disciplined within the military's legal system." The U.N. report said the Site 4 prison was holding detainees who were previously held by the public order brigade and the Wolf Brigade, a special Interior Ministry police commando unit.

Khalaf declined to name the commander, saying the names of all the accused would be released after they faced a criminal trial. In all, the investigating committees indicted 20 commissioned officers, 20 noncommissioned officers and 17 policemen and civilians. They were dismissed from their jobs and served with arrest warrants, Khalaf said. They could receive jail sentences.

"If the officer carried out the torture with his own hands, or supervised it, or it occurred while he was in command, it's all the same thing," Khalaf said.

On Monday, both U.N. and U.S. officials described the criminal charges as a positive development for efforts to bring order and the rule of law to Iraq. "The fact there seems to be action on Site 4 is a step in the right direction," said Gianni Magazzeni, chief of the U.N. human rights office for Iraq, which published the report. "It's an indication that the minister is taking seriously his responsibility and acting accountable."

"This is one step of many he needs to take in this direction," said Army Maj. Gerald Ostlund, a U.S. military spokesman who focuses on issues concerning Iraq's security forces, referring to the minister.

Magazzeni said he hoped the Site 4 action would spur closer scrutiny of atrocities that unfolded in another Interior Ministry facility in the Baghdad neighborhood of Jadriyah in November last year. U.S. soldiers entered an underground bunker there and found a clandestine torture center where scores of Sunni men were held for months. Many were beaten, starved and then killed by their Shiite captors.

A report on Jadriyah was delivered to Iraq's government, but its findings have never been publicly released nor its perpetrators forced to face justice. "That would be another way to help reduce the feeling of impunity," Magazzeni said.

It remains to be seen whether Bolani, a Shiite and an engineer by training, can take on senior figures in his ministry who are suspected of links to Shiite militias. Many are left from the days of his predecessor, Bayan Jabr, who many Sunnis allege turned the ministry into his own Shiite fiefdom and a haven for the militias.

Bolani has no political affiliations, a quality that made him attractive as a replacement for Jabr. But this very independence means he has less clout in getting rid of politically connected co-workers inside the ministry.

"That's part of his challenge," Ostlund said. "You fire somebody from the government here, what have you turned them into? What have they become the day after? Sometime it is better to keep your enemies closer than your friends."

On Monday, Bolani spoke cautiously. Asked if any of the 57 alleged offenders were members of Shiite militias, he said that "no reference to militias came up during the investigation."

Khalaf, the spokesman, was also cautious when asked if the ministry would go after Jabr, now Iraq's finance minister and alleged by human rights groups to have been aware of the torture unfolding in Site 4 and other ministry prisons.

"This is not true," Khalaf said of the allegation. "No minister would allow such violations if he knew, because the Interior Minister is for all of Iraq's people."

Third Guilty Plea In Killing Of Iraqi By A Marine Patrol (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Nov. 6 — A marine corporal pleaded guilty on Monday in the shooting death of an unarmed Iraqi in April, the third person charged in the case to do so.

As part of a plea agreement, the marine, Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, received reduced charges of aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice.

Corporal Jackson said Monday at his court-martial here that he knew that the killing was unlawful when it occurred. Initially charged with seven others with kidnapping and premeditated murder, he avoided the more serious charges as part of a plea agreement to testify against fellow squad members.

A military judge set sentencing for Nov. 16.

Corporal Jackson, 23, accepted the deal last week, after months of proclaiming his innocence as he remained in the brig.

Seven marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with kidnapping and killing the Iraqi, Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, who died of multiple gunshot wounds on April 26, and with covering up the crime.

DOJ_NMG_0091627

Another marine, Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr., has also been negotiating a plea, defense lawyers said.

At the court-martial on Monday, Corporal Jackson gave testimony about the killing that closely tracked testimony by the two others who have pleaded guilty.

He said the men were on patrol near Hamdaniya searching for Saleh Gowad, an insurgent who repeatedly planted bombs, including one that was thought to have killed four members of a platoon in his company.

The corporal testified that the men kidnapped and killed a man they believed to be Mr. Gowad, but who was Mr. Awad, staging the scene to make it appear as if there had been a gunfight.

"Everyone told the story that it was a good shoot and a lawful engagement," Corporal Jackson said.

Plea bargains are common in cases with multiple defendants. But experts in military law say the number of deals in the Hamdaniya case and the rapid legal proceedings are somewhat unusual.

"In my view, one deal is sufficient when you have statements" admitting guilt, said Gary D. Solis, a former military judge and Marine prosecutor who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University.

"Two deals make you sleep well," Mr. Solis said. "But three is gilding the lily. At some point, a prosecutor has to prosecute."

Aside from the testimony by those who reached plea bargains and a summary of the individual charges, prosecutors have divulged little information about their case.

The government's case is considered strong because statements describing the killing were signed by members of the squad, part of the Second Platoon of Kilo Company in the Third Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, which is based here.

In addition to Corporal Jackson, deals were reached with the Navy hospital corpsman, Petty Officer Third Class Melson J. Bacos, 21, who was sentenced to one year in prison after pleading guilty to modified charges of conspiracy and kidnapping, and Pfc. John J. Jodka III, 20, the youngest and least experienced of the marines, who faces sentencing on Nov. 15.

The terms of the agreement with Private Jodka will be made public at the hearing next week when the defense intends to call additional witnesses, his civilian lawyer, Jane Siegel, said.

Under military law, the defendants who have accepted pretrial agreements retain the right to go to trial until their sentencing hearings, said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice.

"You can still try to beat the deal," Mr. Fidell said. "A defendant can, and not infrequently does, do better at trial than the outcome for which he bargained at pretrial."

Others who have been ordered to trial are Cpl. Marshall Magincalda, Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington and Cpl. Trent D. Thomas. The squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, has not been ordered to trial.

The testimony of fellow troops in such cases can make the defense difficult. It leaves little alternative but to argue that a killing was somehow mitigated by extenuating circumstances. Because the witnesses know one another well, there is the risk of information coming out that undermines a witness's credibility, legal experts say.

Some defense lawyers have suggested another reason for the multiple plea agreements. "I think it is a matter of expediting the process and saving the command a lot of money," Ms. Siegel said.

Marine Enters Pleas In Iraqi Case (AP-Y)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, November 7, 2006

A Marine pleaded guilty Monday to aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in the case of an Iraqi civilian who other servicemen said was kidnapped and killed by members of the squad.

Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, 23, entered those pleas and others through his attorney Thomas Watt at a military court hearing. Jackson pleaded not guilty to murder, kidnapping, larceny, housebreaking and another charge of conspiracy.

Jackson was the third serviceman to plead guilty to reduced charges in return for his testimony in the case, in which seven Camp Pendleton-based Marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with murdering 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad.

Jackson, who has been in military prison since May, spoke only to confirm his identity and attorneys' names and say he understood his rights.

The sentencing guidelines for the counts Jackson pleaded guilty to were not immediately clear.

Last month, Pfc. John Jodka III pleaded guilty to assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in the incident.

The first to make a deal was Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson J. Bacos, a Navy corpsman on patrol with the Marines. He pleaded guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy.

Members of the squad abducted Awad after their plot to kidnap and kill a known insurgent failed, according to testimony from Bacos and Jodka. The victim was a former policeman and father of 11.

Awad was shot after being dragged to a hole several hundred yards from his house, Bacos and Jodka said. A shovel and AK-47 were placed near the body to make it appear Awad was an insurgent planting a roadside bomb, both defendants said.

Both Jodka and Bacos singled out their squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins, as hatching a plan to kidnap an insurgent. Hutchins' attorney, Rich Brannon, has said he did not believe Hutchins did anything wrong.

Jackson joined the Marines in March 2005 and was on his first combat tour.

His father declined to comment. A Web site set up by Jackson's family to raise money for his defense said Jackson was innocent.

"To send these men to war to do a job and then imprison them for doing it is absurd," the Web site states.

"Why are they being subjected to less rights and freedom of movement than the very terrorists they put their lives on the line to protect the world from?" the site states.

The Day The Hatred Boiled Over In Balad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

BALAD, IRAQ — There were no heroes here.

When gunmen murdered dozens of people in this once peaceful Shiite market city over two days last month, no one stepped in to stop the killing. Not U.S. forces, whose stated purposes in Iraq include preventing all-out civil war. Not the Iraqi security forces, who mostly turned a blind eye to the massacre. Not the people of Balad, who allowed decades of fear and hatred to overwhelm their better instincts.

Perhaps nothing could be done. Perhaps Iraq's Shiite-Sunni feuds have become so heated that not even 140,000 U.S. soldiers can stop the country's increasingly brutal civil war.

"They hate each other," said one U.S. officer in the Balad area, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly on matters pertaining to Iraqi society. "How are you going to get rid of that? You're not going to give these guys sensitivity classes."

Balad, a city of 120,000 up the Tigris River from Baghdad, lies less than 15 miles from Logistics Support Area Anaconda, the largest U.S. military base in Iraq. A small forward operating base, Camp Paliwoda, lies just outside the city. But U.S. troops stuck by the mantra of letting Iraqis take the lead and gave the Shiite-dominated police force latitude as townspeople went on a murderous rampage.

"We didn't think it would happen on this scale," said Capt. Mark T. Jenner, intelligence officer of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Division, which was in the process of handing over the area to another U.S. unit when the slayings occurred.

Perhaps the most chilling thing about the massacre in Balad was that it was not the work of outside death squads. According to Iraqis and U.S. intelligence officials, it appears to have been the work of Shiite residents who turned on their neighbors.

"The ordinary people, some of them took their guns and did this thing," said Amira Baldawi, a Shiite member of parliament who is from Balad. "The city is under pressure all the time. There is a reaction to every action."

*

Usual calm is broken

The killings began on a Friday afternoon, normally the day of rest in Muslim countries. Ajeel Mujamaie, a 30-year-old high school teacher of English and Arabic, was rushing his pregnant wife, Fadhilla, to the hospital and could tell that the usual calm of the day had been broken.

"There was a lot of tension and commotion in the area," he said.

Mujamaie got Fadhilla to the delivery room, then scouted the hospital for a doctor. He ran into a security guard he knew, a man named Abbas who was a relative by marriage. Abbas warned him to get out.

"He told me I have to leave," Mujamaie said. "He told me they will kill me."

Soon gunmen swarmed the hospital, aided by some of the employees. "They were from Balad," Mujamaie said of the men who guided the gunmen from room to room. "They were saying: 'Take this guy. Don't take this guy.' "

As Fadhilla writhed in pain, Abbas, who wore a police uniform, slipped the couple into their car and headed for a midwife outside the city center.

Across Balad, Sunnis like Mujamaie and his wife had begun to flee.

*

Deep-rooted tensions

For decades this farming region north of Baghdad has been a caldron of mistrust between the Shiite Muslim tribes living in town and the Sunni Arab tribes spread out in the surrounding farmlands.

DOJ_NMG_0091629

In the 1970s, the city became a stronghold of Shiite activists of the then-outlawed Islamic Dawa Party, which had strong ties to neighboring Iran. After the Iran-Iraq war erupted in 1980, President Saddam Hussein and his Baath Party supporters cracked down, executing Dawa members, uprooting orchards and seizing the property of well-to-do Shiites to hand over to Sunnis.

The U.S.-led invasion in 2003 upended the balance of power. Shiites began asserting their muscle, angering Sunnis. In 2004, a group loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr took over a Sunni mosque in downtown Balad, declaring it its own.

In February, when a bomb severely damaged the Shiite shrine of the Golden Dome in nearby Samarra, U.S. soldiers said they had to seal off Balad to prevent Shiites from heading there to exact revenge.

The tally of death squad abductions and shootings mounted. U.S. and Iraqi soldiers found the bodies on farms or floating down the Tigris.

Economic rivalry underlies some of the feuding. The Shiite Bani Tamim tribe in the city and the Sunni Mashadani in the countryside fight for control of trade routes and the transport of construction materials to Baghdad. Tribal vendettas add a complicated layer of bloodshed to the sectarian violence.

In recent months, Sunnis began complaining of Shiite thugs, allegedly with ties to the Sadr organization, manning checkpoints. Shiites, too, warned of a coming breaking point. In September, Baldawi sent a bundle of desperate letters from her constituents to Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

"People complained that the situation is not at all secure," she said. "They wanted more security forces to protect the area."

Nevertheless, on Sept. 13, U.S. forces formally handed over control of the area to Iraqis.

The episodic killing continued. A Sunni man visiting the Balad hospital was found dead in the city in early October. On Oct. 6, a group of Sunnis attacked a Shiite-dominated Iraqi army unit. The soldiers killed two Sunni members of the Jabouri tribe.

The final trigger came in the early morning of Oct. 12: a shootout in which soldiers of Iraq's Shiite-dominated government killed an alleged Sunni insurgent. Townspeople, villagers and U.S. troops nervously awaited a Sunni reprisal. It came within hours.

*

Swarmed by gunmen

Mohammed Adnan Obeidi's mother had warned him not to take construction jobs in the Sunni village of Duluiya. But the 22-year-old Shiite's family is poor, and the Sunni merchant offering work seemed respectable enough. So on Oct. 12, Obeidi, his best friend, Thamer Azzawi, and 14 other men accepted the merchant's offer to rebuild his roof and headed to the village, across the Tigris from Balad.

They finished the job by midday and were heading back when they were swarmed by dozens of masked gunmen who blocked the road and began shouting "God is great!"

The gunmen boarded the workers' bus and demanded that they put their hands on their heads and their heads between their legs. The bus drove on for nearly an hour.

"I tried to see what was happening, but one of the gunmen hit me on the head with the butt of his rifle," Obeidi recalled.

Once the bus stopped, the men were ordered off, handcuffed and blindfolded. The gunmen had walkie-talkies and heavy-caliber machine guns. Azzawi begged for mercy. He was a Sunni, he pleaded. He lied and said that Obeidi, a member of a tribe that includes both sects, was a Sunni too.

"They let us go, only me and my Sunni friend," Obeidi said.

The two froze when they heard gunfire behind them, and walked on for nearly two hours. As night settled, they found a way back to Balad, where they told their stories to police.

The next morning, the bodies of the 14 workers were found on the outskirts of Duluiya. They had been shot at close range and bore signs of torture.

U.S. and Iraqi officials immediately recognized the threat the incident posed for the 200 or so Sunni families living in town in Balad. "It was outside the tribal boundaries," said Jenner, the U.S. intelligence officer. "It was strictly Sunni versus Shiite."

The provincial governor, a Sunni, headed for the city in an attempt to impose calm. But mistrustful Shiites at checkpoints reportedly refused to allow him to enter. Friday prayer leaders in Shiite and Sunni mosques issued calls for calm at noontime. They fell on deaf ears.

*

No outside job

Though suspicious of each other, Sunnis and Shiites in the Balad area lead intertwined lives. The Sunnis in the countryside grow produce, and the city serves as a commercial hub. Sunnis come into town to use the hospital, shop, make appointments with lawyers and buy and sell cars at auction lots.

When the retaliations against Sunnis began Friday afternoon, killer and victim probably knew each other.

DOJ_NMG_0091630

Obeid Nawaf, 51, a Sunni real estate dealer, left for his small house in the countryside as soon as he heard about the slain workers. In the afternoon, he dispatched his brother and son to fetch supplies. He never saw them alive again.

The killings continued Saturday. For hours, mobs killed any Sunni men they encountered. A woman from Duluiya who identified herself only as Umm Mohammed said her 22-year-old son, Hamid, haplessly wandered into Balad for a shopping trip Saturday and was shot by Shiite gunmen.

The gunmen went to car auctions and seized Sunnis, killing them and burning their vehicles.

Hussein Azzawi, a 39-year-old used-car dealer from Duluiya, had sent two of his employees to sell cars in Balad. "They burned the corpses with the cars," he said. "They had committed no crime except they were Sunnis."

Nawaf, the real estate dealer, heard that some of the dead were being taken to the morgue of a nearby town. There he found the bodies of his son and brother. "It cannot be described," he said. "They were cut up and mutilated. There was acid on their faces."

Sunni political and religious leaders accused fighters linked to Sadr's Al Mahdi militia of streaming into the city and leading the killings at the request of Balad residents. But Balad's Shiite residents and U.S. forces reject that theory.

"We don't think it was the Mahdi army," said Capt. Matthew Thomas, the incoming intelligence officer of the 3rd Battalion, 8th Cavalry Regiment.

Capt. Keith L. Carter, a company commander whose area of responsibility included the city, probably knows contemporary Balad better than any other American official. "I don't think you could see violence on this scale by outsiders," he said.

Indeed, days before the attacks, the city's cellphone service had gone down because of an insurgent strike, cutting Balad off from outside communication.

The hatred that day was homegrown.

"There is no Sadr army in Balad and we never asked for their interference," said Tahseen Rasheed, a resident. "It was the families of the victims who decided to retaliate. They armed themselves and stood on the road and started to kill whichever suspects they could find."

*

Offer of help rejected

The U.S. military monitored events from its base just outside Balad, where its role in policing conflicts has become increasingly marginal. "We could tell the sectarian tension was flaring up," Thomas said. "We got reports of Shiite retaliation against Sunnis."

By Friday afternoon, U.S. forces dispatched a platoon-sized unit into town. The soldiers offered to help the local Iraqi forces keep order. Iraqi officers declined, and the Americans left.

At some point on Saturday, U.S. forces got in touch with Iraqis and told them to establish checkpoints around the city and retrieve bodies. At 5 p.m., city officials declared a 48-hour curfew for Balad and Duluiya, with cars barred from the streets and no traffic allowed in or out of either town.

Nearly 30 hours after the discovery of the bodies of the Shiite workmen, the retaliatory killings subsided.

By then, 36 to 70 Sunnis had been killed in a city about the size of Thousand Oaks. Hassanian Baldawi, an official at the Balad hospital, said two days after the massacre that the facility had received 80 bodies over the previous four days, including those of women.

The Americans' hands-off approach stunned many. "Everyone was asking why the American forces aren't intervening," said Ismail Amili, a 45-year-old hospital employee. "Is it because such bloodshed serves their interests?"

U.S. forces here abide by a tough-love approach, forcing Iraqis to take the lead. "While we probably have the capability of sending all of our forces and barricading the city, it is a good thing that the Iraqis are taking over," Thomas said.

But perhaps U.S. soldiers — consciously or unconsciously — do make a grim calculation that benefits them. Sunni insurgents in the countryside attack American troops as well as Shiites. By contrast, Shiite gunmen often welcome Americans to their towns and primarily target young Sunni men suspected of being insurgents.

Whereas American soldiers get dirty looks in Sunni villages, they can walk through downtown Balad with little fear.

"Honestly, it makes our job easier," Sgt. Dominie Price, 25, of Wheaton, Ill., said of the Shiites targeting Sunnis. "There's less insurgents attacking us."

Still, even with Americans taking a back-seat approach, Balad is better off with them around, Carter said.

If the U.S. left tomorrow, he has no doubt what would happen: "Shiite gunmen would come to power in Balad and would form a defensive barrier," he said. "The Sunni insurgents would lay siege to the town."

Shortly after the massacre, a reconciliation conference was held in the provincial capital of Tikrit. U.S. officials hailed it as "a clear sign of solidarity among civic, military and religious leaders of Balad." But it failed to produce any political resolution or ease much of the friction between Shiites and Sunnis or the various tribes.

DOJ_NMG_0091631

Despite talk of a truce, Sunnis fire mortar rounds every night into Balad and have killed and injured dozens. Shiite police and soldiers battle Sunni gunmen nightly for control of a checkpoint on the edge of the city that serves as the gateway for food, gas and people. The checkpoint has been hit so many times by bombs that its concrete watchtower has collapsed.

And more than half of the 200 or so Sunni families who lived in Balad before the massacre have fled for the countryside, terrified of more bloodshed at the hands of their neighbors.

On a recent day, a visiting U.S. officer praised a ragtag group of Iraqi soldiers and police guarding the checkpoint, called Delta 49. The men had captured two suspected Sunni fighters and killed one. The fighters allegedly were trying to get into town with a cache of dynamite and other munitions.

The 20 young men explained that they were volunteers protecting the gates of the city from the Sunni intruders outside.

"The terrorists come from this area, this area and this area," said police officer Saad Fakhreen Hassan, pointing to the green countryside. "We came here to challenge the terrorists."

Asked about the events of Oct. 13-14, he denies that there were any reprisals against Sunnis in Balad. The Sunni families who left did so because they wanted to, he said.

"Balad right now is surrounded by terrorists, and all the villages are filled with terrorists," he said. "Balad is a peace-loving city."

Mujamaie sees things differently. He and his wife reached the midwife that Friday afternoon, and they now have a baby daughter named Noor.

"The people in Balad are divided," he said. "There are those against the killings and those in favor of them. But I will never go back to Balad. We saw what kind of killers those people are."

Fewer Pakistanis Rally To Support Islamists (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, November 7, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

For a week after missiles destroyed a madrassah, or religious school, in Pakistan's tribal belt suspected of harboring al-Qaeda officers, thousands of angry men, many armed, have stormed through the area's main towns, chanting jihad against America and endorsing suicide attacks.

But hundreds of miles away, in the cosmopolitan cities of Karachi, Lahore, and Islamabad, relative silence has prevailed.

The difference in response is telling, observers say. It underscores not only an important gap in understanding between the tribal areas and the rest of the country - a gulf that helps keep the area underdeveloped and prone to extremism - but an erosion of the Islamist parties' power on the national stage.

"[The Islamist parties] have used this opportunity to divert people's attention. But in other provinces, people have not responded to the call. They're fed up," says Afrasiab Khattak, former chairman of the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan.

It was supposed to be a raucous week. Fresh on the heels of last Monday's missile attack, the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA), the main coalition of religious parties and the ruling entity in the semi-autonomous North-West Frontier Province (NWFP) and Balochistan, called for nationwide protests, hoping to stoke the fires of religious sentiment.

In Bajaur and other areas of the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA), they got what they wanted. Thousands massed for days in several towns, carrying weapons and calling for jihad. It was even announced that a suicide-bomb squad was preparing to attack the Pakistani military.

As the protests raged, militants in North Waziristan, who recently brokered a peace deal with the government, moved to solidify their power. They passed out leaflets in several towns announcing the establishment of a "Mujahideen Shura" or council to institute "Allah's law in Allah's land," according to local press reports. At least two men suspected of spying for American forces were killed in North Waziristan last week, while several other government-linked tribesmen were shot dead, allegedly for aiding the government's efforts to oust militants.

But this anger, while certainly significant, barely projected beyond the tribal zone. In Islamabad, there were hardly any protests to be seen. Lahore, a city of 10 million, saw a turnout of 500. In Karachi, 5,000 shouted slogans, hardly significant for a metropolis of 15 million.

This contrasts sharply with past protests. In January, when another militant hideout was targeted by the CIA in Bajaur, 10,000 people flooded the streets of Karachi to protest. Not long afterward, the MMA summoned 15,000 protesters in Lahore alone when the controversy over the Danish cartoons erupted, although many speculate that widespread discontent with the government, and not mere religious sentiment, brought them to the streets.

Still, many observers see it as a sign that the power of religious parties over public anger has diminished. The MMA came to power in the NWFP and Balochistan in 2002 on the promise that they would resist Western-oriented foreign policy and govern according to the tenets of Islam. But many of the MMA parties, particularly Jamaat-Ulema-Islami (JUI) - which dominates politics in the North-West Frontier Province, Balochistan, and the tribal zone - have slowly cozied up in recent months to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's military regime. Such compromises have ultimately undermined their claims to independent credentials, analysts point out. That's perhaps one reason why last week's calls for nationwide strikes were dismissed as pure political play.

DOJ_NMG_0091632

"People now realize that they're just doing politics rather than really showing their mettle. They're just using the occasion," says Behroz Khan, a journalist and analyst in Peshawar who writes for Pakistan's The News. Government officials last week echoed this refrain.

"The MMA has already seen that people have rejected their strike call a day before and will not take to the streets today," Muhammad Ali Durrani, the information minister, told a press conference last week. Pakistani authorities had suspected the madrassah of harboring al-Qaeda officers.

Leaders of Jamaat Islami, the MMA's central party, deny these accusations, saying their power is as strong as ever.

"The people believe in Jamaat Islami because ... they have strong leadership and commitment," says Siraj-ul-Haq, a Jamaat Islami leader and member of the provincial assembly in the NWFP. He added that if protests have been muted, it is only because the MMA is working slowly toward its goal of building a nationwide protest movement.

"We are sure we will succeed to organize a new agitation throughout the country," he says.

Certainly, Pakistanis at large condemn last week's missile strike, arguing that the militants should have been arrested. But street protests will continue to founder because, besides the MMA's political weakness, many Pakistanis are only mildly concerned with events in FATA, say analysts. As far as many Pakistanis are concerned, the tribal zone may as well be a different country.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Appeals Court Panel Rejects Challenge To Clearing Of Lay's Convictions (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, November 7, 2006

An appeals court panel has slapped down an Enron shareholder's challenge of a judge's decision to erase former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's criminal convictions.

The three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals refused to order U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston to reverse his October ruling that cleared Lay's name because the ex-chairman died before he had been sentenced or launched an appeal.

The appeal panel's ruling, issued last week, reiterated what Lake said in his decision: Legal precedent says that "when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed."

That is how all such situations are to be addressed unless the law is changed by Congress, the U.S. Supreme Court or by the full 5th Circuit, the panel ruled.

Russell P. Butler, the shareholder who challenged Lake's ruling, said he would appeal the panel's decision to the Supreme Court.

"I think we have a good chance," said Butler, who said he lost $8,000 when the disgraced company collapsed nearly five years ago.

Samuel Buffone, who represents Lay's estate, didn't return messages seeking comment tonight.

Lay died of heart disease July 5, just six weeks after he and former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling were convicted of multiple charges including fraud and conspiracy after a four-month trial. Last month Lake sentenced Skilling to more than 24 years in prison. The ex-CEO is confined to his home, awaiting a decision from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons as to where he will serve his time.

Lay's death before sentencing and appeal prompted his lawyers to ask Lake to erase his convictions as allowed by law.

The government fought that move and hoped Congress would act quickly on a new law proposed by the Justice Department that would prevent courts from vacating criminal convictions in similar circumstances. That effort failed.

The government did not appeal Lake's ruling, nor did prosecutors take a position on Butler's challenge.

Had Lay's convictions stood, the government could have pursued efforts to seize millions of dollars in alleged ill-gotten gains through criminal proceedings. Lake's ruling blocked that strategy, leaving the Justice Department to pursue Lay's assets in civil courts.

DOJ_NMG_0091633

Days later — on the same day Skilling was sentenced — the Justice Department filed a civil forfeiture claim against Lay's estate that is pending. The Securities and Exchange Commission also has a civil case against Lay and Skilling that has been pending since they were indicted in 2004.

Former Homestore Exec Receives 30-month Sentence (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, November 7, 2006

Peter Tafeen also faces 3 years of supervised release

Peter Tafeen, a former Homestore executive who pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud for his participation in a fraudulent advertising scheme, today was sentenced to serve 30 months in federal prison.

Tafeen was also sentenced to three years of supervised release following the prison sentence, and six months of the supervised release program must be served in home confinement.

Tafeen, who faced a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison, served as executive vice president of business development at Homestore from 1997 to November 2001. Homestore, which has operated Realtor.com and other property-search Web sites, this year re-branded as Move Inc.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said, "The sentence … was very fair and it reflected both Tafeen's involvement in the crime and his assistance in cooperating with the government during (Stuart) Wolff's trial."

Brian J. Hennigan, a lawyer for Tafeen who is a partner at Los Angeles law firm Irell & Manella LLP, said that Tafeen, who is currently out on bond, will report to prison Jan. 8. The judge, he said, has recommended that Tafeen serve his prison sentence in a Pensacola, Fla.-area prison near Tafeen's home.

A facility in that area is the Federal Prison Camp in Pensacola, a minimum-security prison that is on the grounds of the Saufley Field Naval facility.

As part of a plea agreement announced in March, Tafeen had agreed to testify against his former boss, Stuart Wolff, who was chief executive of Homestore during the accounting scandal. Tafeen had faced similar charges to Wolff before entering into the plea agreement, which came a few weeks before his trial was scheduled to begin.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Justice Department had filed criminal and civil cases against Wolff and Tafeen in April 2005.

Last month, Wolff was sentenced to 15 years in federal prison and ordered to pay a $5 million fine and restitution to victims of a financial scheme that deceived investors by artificially inflating revenues.

U.S. District Court Judge Percy Anderson found Wolff guilty of conspiracy, three counts of filing false statements with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, four counts of lying to accountants, five counts of fraudulent insider trading, and five counts of falsification of corporate books and records.

The judge had also ordered that Wolff must not be involved in any business relating to Internet advertising, and Wolff is reportedly appealing his conviction. A hearing is scheduled next Monday related to Wolff's request to stay out of custody on bail pending his appeal.

Tafeen, after leaving Homestore, in October 2003 filed a lawsuit against the company charging that he was owed millions of dollars relating to legal expenses. Homestore officials reached a settlement through which the company would pay up to $11.9 million to support Tafeen's legal costs.

The company also had reached a separate agreement to pay up to about $15.2 million related to Wolff's legal expenses.

Ten other individuals have pleaded guilty in connection with the illegal financial scheme at Homestore, which involved multimillion-dollar "circular" advertising transactions with AOL and other companies through which Homestore essentially paid itself by routing money to and from other companies and disguising the true nature of those transactions.

Wilner said three former Homestore employees are still awaiting sentencing, including the company's former CFO Joseph Shew, 37; former chief operating officer John Giesecke Jr.; and Jeffrey Kalina, who had served as senior manager of mergers and acquisitions transactions at Homestore.

Jury Acquits, Hangs In Trial Of McKesson's Former CEO And GC (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, November 7, 2006

The securities fraud trial against the former CEO and general counsel of HBOC -- now McKesson Corp. -- was never an easy one for the government.

The government's central witnesses were snitches of questionable credibility -- so much so that prosecutors declined to bring one key witness to the stand.

DOJ_NMG_0091634

And in an earlier bench trial of another executive, a judge found their testimony was not credible enough to convict.

So it wasn't terribly surprising Friday when a jury acquitted former CEO Charles McCall and ex-GC Jay Lapine of conspiring to commit securities fraud while deadlocking on six other counts.

That's not to say it didn't hit the lawyers involved like a sack of bricks: There were tears on both sides, most notably from Theodore Wells Jr., the Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison partner who represented McCall in the six-week trial.

"I've been living in a hotel in San Francisco since August the 14th working, truly, 20-hour days," Wells told a group of reporters outside the courtroom. "The fact that I was emotional, given the circumstances, is entirely understandable."

Mark Topel of Topel & Goodman, who argued Lapine's case, was similarly relieved after the acquittal and U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins' subsequent declaration of a mistrial on the other counts.

Topel said he saw the case as one in which the people who admitted to the conspiracy -- a brace of lower-ranking executives who entered guilty pleas -- couldn't be trusted when it came to fingering higher-ups.

He pointed to prosecutors' decision to not take testimony from Jay Gilbertson, the company's CFO who in 2003 pleaded guilty to being involved in the fraud scheme which misstated billions of dollars in earnings. Gilbertson blamed it on Lapine and McCall, and was seen as potentially being the key witness before the trial started.

"The fact that they didn't call him sends a strong signal that they didn't think he was credible enough to put in front of a jury," Topel said.

While the conspiracy acquittal was victory for the defense, on three fraud counts 11 of 12 jurors voted to convict -- giving prosecutors an enticing incentive to bring a new trial.

The jury deliberated for six days before deciding that it was hopelessly stuck on the deadlocked counts, creating a source of intense stress for the lawyers.

They spent most of this week pacing the federal building halls, since Jenkins required them to stick around until a verdict was rendered.

"It doesn't usually drag out that long, waiting for a verdict. That made it more exciting," said Michael Shepard, a partner at Heller Ehrman and a lawyer for McCall who conducted cross examinations in the case.

He and the other defense lawyers said the victory was particularly gratifying because of the post-Enron shadow cast over corporate executives.

McCall, Wells said, "is the first CEO or chair of a major corporation to go to trial post Enron, post-WorldCom, and be acquitted."

The McKesson case grew out of a $9 billion scheme to inflate software company HBOC's profits by misstating contract terms to maintain the company's value in preparation for the merger with pharmaceutical distributor McKesson.

Four top executives entered guilty pleas after the scheme was uncovered, and in 2003, their cooperation led to the indictments of Lapine and McCall.

A trial of former McKesson CFO Richard Hawkins brought an acquittal last year. In that bench trial, Jenkins found that a key cooperator, former company Vice President Albert Bergonzi, was not credible. Bergonzi also testified in the latest trial.

Former Latham & Watkins partner Timothy Crudo was the assistant U.S. attorney who led the prosecution. Another AUSA, Brian Stretch, also handled a sizable portion of the arguments.

After the case, Crudo referred requests for comment to office spokesman Luke Macaulay, who didn't return calls or e-mails.

It's not clear whether the government will seek a new trial, and Jenkins said that given the schedules of the various lawyers, there'll be no new hearings until next year.

That's fine with Wells, whose highest-profile client -- former Bush administration official I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby -- is getting ready for his own trial in Washington in connection with the highly publicized leak of a CIA agent's identity.

"I am going to move out of this hotel and I'm going to move into another hotel," Wells told Jenkins.

Fed Warns Of Illicit Bond Activity (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

The Federal Reserve put traders on notice yesterday that it is scrutinizing activity in the bond market, highlighting recent concerns that some traders may have made illicit profits by manipulating securities prices.

Dino Kos, executive vice president of the markets group at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, led an hour-long discussion of such concerns yesterday with representatives of the bank's 22 primary dealers -- the banks and securities firms that trade Treasury securities with the central bank.

DOJ_NMG_0091635

The Fed meets with its dealers periodically to discuss market issues, but this was the first session devoted to suspicions at the Treasury Department about possible manipulation of the market for government bills, notes and bonds, and for futures contracts and other financial contracts linked to the securities.

The government's concerns were detailed in a Sept. 27 speech by James Clouse, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for federal finance. He described ways in which traders could control the supply of highly sought Treasury securities, driving up their prices. Such practices enable traders to borrow money at low interest rates and then invest it at higher rates to earn a profit.

The U.S. Treasury market plays a critical role in the global financial system, allowing the federal government to borrow and pay for its activities, providing benchmarks to lenders setting interest rates, and serving as a tool for the Fed to adjust interest rates in its efforts to control inflation and encourage economic growth. "Ensuring the integrity of the Treasury market is essential," Clouse said in his speech.

Over the past two years, government agencies that monitor financial markets have "observed instances in which firms appeared to gain a significant degree of control over highly sought-after Treasury issues and seemed to use that market power to their advantage," Clouse said. "In the process, prices in the . . . markets appear to have been distorted to varying degrees."

Clouse noted that some of the trading patterns may have innocent explanations. But he warned that others might violate securities laws that prohibit market manipulation. Neither Clouse nor the Fed would identify which firms have engaged in questionable trading. The Fed regulates major banks but does not investigate suspected trading violations.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, which enforces securities laws, declined to say whether it was investigating any specific firms and declined to comment on the Fed's meeting. The Wall Street Journal has reported that the SEC is probing UBS AG, which has said it is cooperating with government authorities.

The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, which represents bond traders, declined to comment on the Fed meeting and statement. But it plans to organize discussions with Treasury to clarify which trading practices are causing concern, said Robert Toomey, the group's vice president and assistant general counsel.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Man Set For Execution For Slaying Of Bank Guard Alleges Prosecutorial Misconduct (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Gelineau, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 7, 2006

(AP) - RICHMOND, Virginia-Attorneys for a man scheduled to be executed Thursday for the 1999 slaying of a bank security guard have appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court and say his life should be spared because a prosecutor withheld information about a key witness.

John Yancey Schmitt, 33, is set to die by injection at Greensville Correctional Center in Virginia for the fatal shooting of 39-year-old Earl Shelton Dunning during a bank robbery.

In their petition to the Supreme Court and in a clemency petition to Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, Schmitt's attorneys criticize prosecutor Warren Von Schuch's actions, which they say could have influenced the jury's decision to recommend a death sentence. In the clemency petition, they also argue the shooting of Dunning was accidental.

Von Schuch said there was no prosecutorial misconduct, and described the killing as cold-blooded and clearly premeditated.

"The court found that we did nothing wrong," Von Schuch said. "This is simply defense attorneys misrepresenting the truth to the public."

On Feb. 17, 1999, Schmitt entered the bank wearing sunglasses and a bulky jacket, attracting the attention of Dunning, who followed him inside. After shooting Dunning, Schmitt fled with nearly $36,000 (â‚¬28,000) in cash. Schmitt had robbed the same bank a month earlier.

In 2000, a jury convicted Schmitt of capital murder and robbery and firearms charges and recommended a death sentence, declaring him a future danger to society.

Last year, U.S. District Judge Robert Payne wrote that Von Schuch did not disclose information the defense contends could have cast doubt on the credibility of one of the prosecution's witnesses, a man who surreptitiously recorded a damning jailhouse phone call with Schmitt.

In the taped conversation, Schmitt discusses the slaying without remorse, at one point laughing as he describes how Dunning's eyes "got real big" when he saw the gun pointed at him. The tape, introduced during the trial's sentencing phase, was described by the district court judge as "a ticket to the death chamber."

DOJ_NMG_0091636

The man who taped the call - a friend of Schmitt's - had been offered a grant of immunity in return for his cooperation with authorities. That information - not turned over by prosecutors - could have made him appear to be less credible and therefore affected the jury's sentencing decision, the defense contends.

"All it takes to prevent a death penalty from being imposed is to convince one juror to vote for life," attorney Dana Finberg said.

But Payne ultimately decided there was no reasonable probability that the verdict would have been different if the information had been turned over to the defense. In July, a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, though not before criticizing the prosecution for failing to disclose the information.

Schmitt - who declined through his attorney to be interviewed - had been in trouble with the law for years and showed no remorse for the killing, Von Schuch said.

"He's a man with a terribly inadequately developed conscience," Von Schuch said. "And that's why he deserves to die."

Polygamist Compound South Dakota Still Growing (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

A compound reportedly occupied by members of polygamist leader Warren Jeffs' sect continues to expand southwest of Pringle, South Dakota, even though Jeffs is behind bars in southern Utah.

The group has built several structures on the 100-acre property since October 2003.

In March, The Salt Lake Tribune reported that members of Jeffs' church had acquired remote land southwest of Pringle.

Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which practices polygamy. He was a fugitive for nearly two years, sought on charges in both Utah and Arizona accusing him of arranging marriages between underage girls and older men. Jeffs was placed on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list last spring. Jeffs was arrested Aug. 28 during a traffic stop near Las Vegas.

He is being held in Washington County, Utah, at the Purgatory Correctional Facility. A preliminary hearing in his case has been scheduled later this month in 5th District Court in St. George, Utah.

Private investigators have said they believed the Pringle compound was among places Jeffs had hidden while he was on the run, but state and federal authorities said they could not confirm that.

United Land Management, a group with ties to the church, bought another 40 acres next to the compound: 15 acres in March for $37,500 and 25 acres on Oct. 13 for $275,000. The second piece of property includes a new 2,400-square-foot log home, documents at the Custer County courthouse show.

Les Struble, Custer County equalization director, said compound members also have begun work on another, larger lodge that will total more than 14,000 square feet. It is to have 18 bedrooms and 14 bathrooms, according to documents.

Struble said one or two lodges a year have been built on the gated compound. The lodges are each about 3,000 square feet, with large kitchens and living rooms, plus separate bedrooms and bathrooms.

``What they use them for, I don't know," Struble said. ``That's just speculation on anybody's part."

He has been on the compound to assess the property for tax purposes. Struble said he saw only the men who escorted him and others either working on the buildings or tending gardens. Struble said he saw no women or children on his visits.

Neighbors last spring said they saw as many as 60 people, including women and children, on the grounds.

The assessed value is about $1.5 million. After the new lodge is done, Struble said the total assessment likely will be between $2.5 million and $3 million.

The compound pays its taxes on time and has met every county rule and requirement, he said. ``It's amazing. I have not found anything that did not match their building plans to the inch. Everything they said they're going to do, they've done."

Its tax bill next year will be about $30,000.

Polygamy is against South Dakota law, but no one has filed a complaint about the Pringle compound, said Rick Wheeler, Custer County sheriff. ``I've got to have some kind of complaint to go in there."

The sheriff said he hopes to establish even minimal communication with compound leaders in case of a fire or other emergency. ``It's something I'm going to be working on," he said.

Sunland Park Man Arrested In Kidnapping (EPT)

El Paso Times, November 7, 2006

A man from Sunland Park has been arrested in connection with the kidnapping of an El Paso teenager in May.

Noe Guadalupe Ochoa, 20, of Sunland Park is facing five separate charges stemming from the May 4 kidnapping at gunpoint of a 16-year-old El Paso boy, whose identity was withheld because he is minor, Federal Bureau of Investigations spokeswoman Agent Andrea Simmons said.

DOJ_NMG_0091637

Ochoa is charged with conspiracy to kidnap; kidnapping a minor; using a firearm in a crime of violence; possession of marijuana with the intent to distribute; and conspiracy to distribute marijuana, Simmons said.

An FBI investigation revealed that the teenager was taken from outside his home and held for ransom in Juárez. The day after he disappeared he was rescued by FBI agents and the Chihuahua state police anti-kidnapping unit.

The teenager was found unharmed and in a car in Juárez near the Paso del Norte Bridge, where a ransom was supposed to be delivered. Mexican authorities have said the boy was held for a $40,000 ransom, which negotiators managed to reduce to $17,000.

Advertisement

Two men -- Pedro Rocha Rios, 35, and Rodolfo Rivera Aguilar, 29, both of Juárez -- were arrested by Mexican authorities when the teenager was found.

The FBI investigation led to the federal indictments of Jonathan Ocon of Albuquerque; his brother, Ivan Ocon, of Las Cruces; and Lucas B. Wittmayer of Albuquerque.

Simmons said they were indicted on May 17 on federal kidnapping charges related to the teenager's disappearance. The Ocon brothers were arrested June 19. Wittmayer, who has an outstanding arrest warrant, remains at large.

Tammy Fonce-Olivas may be reached at tfonce@elpasotimes.com; 546-6362.

FBI Charges Man In Kidnapping (KFOX)

KFOX-TV, November 7, 2006

A Sunland Park man is in FBI custody for his alleged role in a kidnapping.

FBI agents told KFOX that 20-year-old Noe Guadalupe Ochoa was arrested late last week.

In May of this year, a 16-year-old male was kidnapped at gunpoint in El Paso and taken to Juarez where he was held for ransom.

The teenager was recovered safely less than two days later.

Ochoa now faces charges including kidnapping a minor, using a firearm in a crime of violence, and possession and conspiracy to distribute marijuana.

FBI Looking At Whether Duncan Linked To North Dakota Slaying (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

FARGO, N.D. -- The FBI is investigating whether convicted murderer and sex offender Joseph Edward Duncan III might be involved in the slaying of a Montana teenager found dead in North Dakota four years ago.

"We're a long way from saying he's a suspect, but it's certainly a case we're reviewing," said Donald Robinson, an FBI supervisor in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

Russell Turcotte, of Wolf Point, Mont., was 19 when he disappeared in July 2002. He called his mother from Grand Forks, and she promised to wire him money so he could take the bus home. His body was found in a tree grove along U.S. Highway 2 near Devils Lake the following November.

Duncan, 43, who was living in Fargo when Turcotte disappeared, pleaded guilty last month to murder and kidnapping in Idaho, in a deal that leaves him still eligible for the death penalty. He was charged in state court with bludgeoning a man, a woman and a teenager to death at a home near Coeur d'Alene in 2005 so he could kidnap the woman's two youngest children for sex.

Federal authorities are expected to charge Duncan in the abduction of the children and the killing of one of them, a 9-year-old boy.

Authorities say Duncan, a Tacoma, Wash., native, spent most of his adult life in Washington prisons for sex crimes against children. He also is being investigated in the slayings of two children in Washington and one in California.

Bill Turcotte said his family asked the FBI last year whether Duncan might be a suspect in his son's death.

Robinson said the FBI is putting together a timeline on Duncan's whereabouts dating back to the early 1990s.

"Every single day Mr. Duncan was out of custody, we're looking at where he was - and we're looking at all sorts of unsolved crimes," Robinson said.

"There is no direct evidence Mr. Duncan was involved in the disappearance of Mr. Turcotte," Robinson said. "Mr. Duncan was in North Dakota at that time."

Bill Turcotte said the FBI told him there is evidence placing Duncan at the same Grand Forks truck stop "within hours" of the time Russell Turcotte was last seen.

Robinson said he could not comment on "anything that may or may not be evidence."

Bill Turcotte said investigators were skeptical of any possible connection because his son was 19 and Duncan preyed on children.

"Russell was very young in appearance and he was also very vulnerable," Bill Turcotte said. "He was traveling alone and was looking for help, so maybe he reached out for the first person who offered him a hand and it was the wrong person."

Dallas Woman Sentenced In FEMA Fraud Case (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DALLAS (AP) — A Dallas woman who pleaded guilty to defrauding the Federal Emergency Management Agency of $80,000 through false claims for Hurricane Katrina benefits was sentenced Monday to nearly six years in prison.

U.S. District Judge David C. Godbey sentenced Lakietha Diann Hall, 35, to 70 months in prison. She was ordered to pay $83,254 in restitution. In a related case, she pleaded guilty to one count of failure to appear.

Hall admitted in court documents that she conspired with nine others between August and December of last year.

Hall was accused of leading a scam in which she submitted online claims for disaster and unemployment assistance on behalf of several of the other defendants, falsely stating that their primary homes were in areas devastated by Katrina and that the hurricane caused them to lose their jobs.

All of Hall's co-defendants have pleaded guilty.

Hall was initially arrested in December, and authorities seized more than $10,000 in cash during a search of her apartment. She pleaded guilty in July.

Business Owner Pleads Guilty (HARTC)

The Hartford Courant, November 7, 2006

The owner of an East Windsor mail consolidation business pleaded guilty Tuesday to mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said.

Thomas J. Rueli, 48, of Springfield, who owned Total Logistics Services Inc., was charged with establishing a line of credit with a commercial lender of up to $12 million based on fraudulently inflated account data. He was also accused of paying bribes to another business owner and conspiring not to report the transactions to the IRS, O'Connor said in a statement.

Rueli was also accused of leaving mailings he had contracted to deliver at a recycling center. He is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 29 and faces penalties of up to 30 years in prison and $23 million in fines, O'Connor said.

Man Pleads Guilty In Child-porn Case (DESERET)

Deseret Morning News, November 7, 2006

A La Verkin man is facing a mandatory five-year prison sentence after admitting to downloading dozens of images of child pornography off the Internet.

Terence D. William, 53, appeared in U.S. District Court on Monday to enter a guilty plea to one count of receiving child pornography. William was arrested and charged last August as part of a nationwide sting on a Web site based out of Orlando, Fla., that sold images of child pornography.

The federal investigation netted more than 125 people who allegedly subscribed to the Web site, including three Utah men. A St. George man and a Midvale man are also facing child-pornography possession charges.

In court Monday, William admitted to downloading between 10 and 150 images of children engaged in sexual acts.

U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell ordered a psycho-sexual evaluation before William is sentenced on March 6. When sentenced, he faces a mandatory five years, and up to 30 years, in prison.

In exchange for his guilty plea, federal prosecutors dropped an additional possession charge and will recommend that William be given credit for accepting responsibility.

Prosecutor Kills Himself In Texas Raid Over Child Sex (NYT)

By Tim Eaton

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

TERRELL, Tex., Nov. 6 — A prosecutor in this North Texas town killed himself Sunday as the police tried to arrest him on charges of soliciting sex over the Internet from a person he thought was a 13-year-old boy.

The prosecutor, Louis Conradt Jr., 56, had been caught in a sting operation set up by Dateline NBC, the television news magazine, and an Internet watchdog group called Perverted Justice. An NBC camera crew was outside the house to film the scene when the fatal shot was fired.

Mr. Conradt had refused to open the door when police officers arrived at his house, where he lived alone, said Sgt. Snow Robertson of the Police Department in Murphy, a nearby town where officers said Mr. Conradt intended to meet the boy he thought he had communicated with.

Officers eventually forced their way into the house, only to find that Mr. Conradt had shot himself in the head with a small-caliber semi-automatic handgun, Sergeant Robertson said. Mr. Conradt died later at Parkland Hospital in Dallas.

Police officers from Murphy had gone to the house with a tactical team and two officers from Terrell to serve a warrant for Mr. Conradt's arrest. One of the officers from Terrell knew Mr. Conradt from his work as a prosecutor, Sergeant Robertson said.

Mr. Conradt had been a district attorney in Kaufman County and was the chief felony assistant district attorney in Rockwall County at the time of his death.

The police planned to search his computer and his house, Sergeant Robertson said.

The sergeant's department had been working with Perverted Justice and NBC News in a sting operation singling out people who solicit sex from children.

Allison Gollust, an NBC News spokeswoman, said the crew for Dateline NBC's "To Catch a Predator" series was taping as the police approached the house. But Ms. Gollust added that no one from Dateline had had contact with Mr. Conradt and that there was nothing to suggest that he had seen the crew before he turned the gun on himself.

"There's absolutely no evidence that would suggest that he was aware of us," Ms. Gollust said. "We don't anticipate making a change to our reporting."

Xavier Von Erck, director of operations with Perverted Justice, said Mr. Conradt had made contact in an AOL chat room with a decoy from Perverted Justice who was posing as a 13-year-old boy. Mr. Von Erck would not disclose the details of the chat, but he said, "It was sexual in nature."

Unlike some suspects in pedophile stings that appear on "Dateline NBC," Mr. Conradt had not actually met the person he thought was the teenager, but Sergeant Robertson said he planned to do so. Perverted Justice staff members found profiles from Mr. Conradt on AOL, Yahoo and MySpace.com, Mr. Von Erck said. He also said that he thought Mr. Conradt had tried to erase at least one online profile, on MySpace.com, a popular online social networking community used mainly by teenagers, in the moments before he shot himself.

Sergeant Robertson said the police in his town of 3,100 had apprehended 22 other people in stings since last Thursday, mostly from the Dallas-Fort Worth area, with the help of Perverted Justice. He said more would be arrested in the coming days.

"We'll continue to work with them right now," Sergeant Robertson said.

Perverted Justice stings have led to the arrests of 260 people nationwide this year, Mr. Von Erck said.

Several residents in this town of 14,000 about 30 miles east of Dallas said they were shocked to hear the accusations of pedophilia against Mr. Conradt, who had served two terms as district attorney.

Kirby Webb, an investment advisor from Terrell, said he never wanted to hear about people taking their own lives, but he applauded law enforcement's effort to catch online child predators in the town.

"This is a good family town," Mr. Webb said. "We want to preserve that image."

Series Of Deaths Rattles A City (WP)

By Robert Gutsche Jr.

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

LA CROSSE, Wis. -- At night the Mississippi River here is black like pavement. Lights brighten the shoreline, where walkways end with a steep drop at the river's edge. There is no railing. Even to a familiar eye, the river looks like an empty parking lot.

This is where eight young men have apparently drowned in the past nine years, just blocks from the busy downtown bar district where many victims had been reported seen last. The latest victim was found in October.

Officials from the city and the three colleges and universities here -- as well as a group of vocal college students -- say the men became intoxicated and accidentally fell into the river.

Yet as the number of fatalities grows, so does the idea that a serial killer could be loose.

"There just ain't no people who want to walk by the water at night," said Yulonda St. Junious, 34, a hotel worker. "That makes you think someone else has had something to do with it."

All of the victims were young, athletic, and either visiting La Crosse or attending college in the city. Toxicology results have indicated that almost all had high levels of alcohol in their systems when they died.

Still, the similarities among the apparent drowning victims have many concerned that the students are being stalked -- lured into the black waters by a female posing as a police officer or a man wielding a gun, locals say.

DOJ_NMG_0091640

"They must have been following someone they trusted," said resident Rusty Paar, 39, who is sure these deaths are murders.

While the idea of a serial killer is gaining credence in some quarters of La Crosse, other residents say the explanation is merely a way to deflect attention from the criticism that city and college officials are not working hard enough to crack down on underage drinking or to secure the waterline from accidental drownings.

"People would rather blame a serial killer than take responsibility," said Drew Gavrilos, a community services police officer who acts as a liaison between the police and the universities.

The idea among residents and some officials that a serial killer could be lurking in La Crosse and the Upper Midwest is not new.

For decades, this city of 50,000 has turned to that theory to explain missing persons and the few murders that happen, with many saying the river and bluffs along the city's borders are dumping zones for bodies.

"The rumor mill here is still alive and well," said Paula Knudson, dean of students at the University of Wisconsin at La Crosse. "But you can't think about what's happening here from a sober perspective. It is easy for those who drink a lot that they might be able to be disoriented and get lost downtown. It happens."

The chief of police has declined to comment on the cases, but late last month -- to either quell or confirm the serial killer rumors -- local police turned to the FBI for a formal review of the most recent death.

Linda Krieg, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Milwaukee office, told the Associated Press that her office will forward everything the La Crosse Police Department has on the drownings to the FBI's National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime in Quantico.

"They still believe these are drownings and they're accidental," she said. "They just asked if there's anything else they could be looking at."

Still, many say the city is not making efforts to slow or stop the deaths.

"I am frustrated that nothing was done, not only with this death, but with past deaths," said Viterbo University student Travis Bassett, 21, speaking of the most recent victim. "And when the government doesn't meet the peoples' needs, it is time to do it ourselves."

Bassett is one of at least 20 college students who have donated much of their late weekend nights over the past month to patrol Riverside Park, where many of the apparent drownings are suspected to have occurred. The students walk in pairs, wearing reflective vests and carrying police-issued cellphones and flashlights. Their goals are to prevent drinkers from falling into the water and to pull them out if they do.

In the past month, patrollers report having met at least two intoxicated college students in the park and calling police to take them home.

Several attempts to build a fence or barrier along the river have been blocked by the City Council, and city groups have also opposed proposals for video cameras along the walkways.

The city has created several task forces to evaluate limiting access to the park after hours, and it has instituted fees for beer-keg rentals and restrictions on bartenders' drinking as they serve customers.

But officials were slow to replace deteriorating portions of the levee at the park where many of the men apparently fell, and the city does not have plans to continue improving the area, including reducing a steep slope from the park onto the levee and into the river. The City Council is scheduled to vote again in the coming weeks on recommendations to improve the park.

Mayor Mark Johnsrud said the city should not be responsible for a person's drinking or its consequences. He does not entertain the idea of a serial killer, either.

"The thing I keep hearing about these kids is that they are good kids," Johnsrud said. "The definition of a good kid to me is that they know the difference between right and wrong. And this means they didn't make the good choice by getting intoxicated and placing themselves in the situation where they could die."

Johnsrud, who has been mayor since 2005, says he is not interested in making major changes to a public park, including fencing it off at night, just to keep a few people out of a potentially dangerous area.

The debate has made its way to the opinion pages of the local newspaper, with some writers supporting the rumors of a serial killer and others claiming that the victims had simply stopped at the river to relieve themselves and toppled in.

Still, the most apparent sentiment is this: "It is shocking to me, and the government here grinds very slowly," said the Rev. Tom O'Neill, vice president for mission and ministry at Viterbo University. "We've got lots of fine minds in this town that we ought to be able to do other things than say 'College kids shouldn't drink' or blame a serial killer that might not exist."

Jury Duty Is Getting Harder To Shirk (USAT)

By Laura Parker

DOJ_NMG_0091641

USA Today, November 7, 2006

The murder trial in the shootings that left five people dead at Pato's Place Bar was the biggest in the history of Tulare, Calif. However, when the judge in the case tried to pick a jury, only 160 of 500 people summoned to jury duty showed.

The shortage of jury candidates delayed last year's trial of Donald and Timothy Young, brothers charged with capital murder. It also prompted court officials in Tulare, a city of 52,000 between Fresno and Bakersfield, to revamp the jury system in July.

Tulare is among dozens of communities across the USA that are punishing no-show jury candidates.

"We were down to a 50% response rate. That is simply not acceptable," says Tulare County Superior Court Judge Lloyd Hicks.

Tulare jury candidates who fail to show are warned that they could be found in contempt of court. If they do not respond, a second letter is sent, warning that a warrant will be issued for their arrest, Hicks says.

No one keeps national figures on jury duty no-shows, but the American Judicature Society considers the problem an epidemic in some communities, especially large urban areas such as Miami, Houston and Atlanta, where no-show rates routinely top 50%, says David McCord, a society spokesman.

For years, courts across the nation have tried to make jury service more attractive by, among other things, increasing juror pay and offering amenities. This year, for example, Texas increased pay from $6 a day to $40, and no-show rates declined, says Rob Walters, a Texas attorney who worked on a jury service improvement project. Paula Hannaford-Agor, director of the Center for Jury Studies in Williamsburg, Va., says some courts have equipped jury pool rooms with wireless Internet service.

Now, communities are emphasizing the consequences of skipping jury duty. Among them:

·In Danville, Ill., a 19-year-old woman was found in contempt of court and sentenced to 14 days in jail for failing to appear for jury duty.

·In Topeka, no-shows have been fined up to $100 a day.

·In Grand Rapids, Mich., warrants were issued recently for the arrests of 56 people who failed to go to court and explain why they couldn't serve.

Failure to show up for jury duty increases court costs, Hicks says, because court officials have to send out additional summonses. High no-show rates also put at risk one of the most basic tenets of our democracy, he says.

"One of the reasons for our severing ties from England was being deprived of the right to trial by jury," Hicks says. "It is a sacred right."

In Fulton County, Ga., attorneys for Brian Nichols are raising the issue of an unrepresentative jury in his capital murder trial, now set for Jan. 11. Nichols is charged with killing an Atlanta judge and three others in a courthouse rampage March 11, 2005.

Nichols' attorneys say Fulton's high no-show rate for jurors — estimated by the county to be at least 47% — altered the racial composition of the grand jury pool. They have asked that the charges be dismissed because the panel that indicted Nichols was underrepresented by minorities, and that a new representative grand jury be seated.

"We're asking that the jury be properly constructed and meet the mandates of state and federal law," says Gary Parker, one of Nichols' attorneys.

Fulton County officials say incorrect addresses are to blame for much of the problem with juror no-shows. Matthew Sorenson, deputy court administrator, says a plan to fix the situation may not be in place to affect Nichols' upcoming trial.

In Tulare, Hicks says the letters sent to no-shows produced an immediate 10% increase in jury service. Of 1,600 who hadn't responded to the first summons, all but 73 had replied by last week.

"By the time we arrest a few people, the response rate for jury service will go up further," he says."

Abortion Clinics Request O'Reilly Probe (AP-Y)

By John Hanna

AP, November 7, 2006

Two abortion clinics asked the state's highest court Monday to investigate Attorney General Phill Kline and Fox television's Bill O'Reilly over O'Reilly's statements that he had information from Kansas abortion records.

A Kline spokeswoman called the move "a political ploy."

The clinics' attorneys want the Kansas Supreme Court to seize records that Kline, an outspoken abortion opponent, obtained on 90 of the clinics' patients. Kline received edited versions of the records from a district judge on Oct. 24 after arguing he wanted to review the records for evidence of possible crimes including rape and illegal abortions.

The attorneys asked the court to appoint a special prosecutor to determine whether O'Reilly's information came from the records turned over to Kline.

There is no record of the Supreme Court ever appointing a special prosecutor, court spokesman Ron Keefover said.

DOJ_NMG_0091642

O'Reilly said Friday on his show, "The O'Reilly Factor," that an inside source gave him information that a doctor at one of the clinics, George Tiller, had performed late-term abortions because patients were depressed. O'Reilly deemed it "executing babies."

He said on his Monday radio show he "got information" about Tiller's activities "somewhere along the line."

"I'm not going to tell you when or anything else about how we got them," O'Reilly said.

Kline spokeswoman Sherriene Jones has said the attorney general doesn't know how O'Reilly obtained the information.

David Tabacoff, executive producer of "The O'Reilly Factor," issued a statement saying, "We stand by our story."

The two clinics requesting the investigation are Tiller's Wichita clinic and a Planned Parenthood-run clinic in Overland Park. Tiller, one of the few U.S. doctors to perform late-term abortions, has been targeted by protesters for years, his clinic was bombed in 1985 and he was shot by a protester in 1993.

The clinics' request for an investigation was the second in a week targeting the attorney general. On Wednesday, former Attorney General Bob Stephan, a Republican like Kline, asked the state Governmental Ethics Commission to examine Kline's fundraising and activities involving churches. Kline is running for a second term.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Dismisses House Democrats' Lawsuit Over Budget Bill (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DETROIT - A federal judge on Monday dismissed a lawsuit filed by U.S. House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion budget bill because the House and Senate did not approve identical versions.

House Democrats accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush in February. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, sued in April along with 10 other House members to prevent the law from being implemented.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1.

When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months. The lawsuit said the oversight amounted to an additional $2 billion in spending, and the plaintiffs claimed that because they never had the chance to vote on the version signed into law, the law was invalid.

The Department of Justice had sought the lawsuit's dismissal, claiming the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment and were not in "any way personally affected or injured."

Messages seeking comment were left Monday night with Conyers' office and the Justice Department.

The White House and Republican leaders in Congress have said the matter is settled because the mistake was technical and top House and Senate leaders certified the bill before transmitting it to the White House.

Abortion Method Returns To Justices (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Douglas Johnson, the lobbyist for the National Right to Life Committee, first heard a description 14 years ago of a midterm abortion procedure, he felt a sense of revulsion and saw an opportunity.

He was convinced that if most Americans knew about it, they would think differently about abortion.

Johnson and a congressman coined a name for it: "partial-birth abortion." The antiabortion group obtained and widely distributed a set of line drawings that illustrated the procedure. Johnson said he thought "the reaction of many Americans to seeing a drawing of this would be to say: 'This can't be legal.' "

Whether that procedure, known medically as dilation and extraction or D&X, will be legal comes before the Supreme Court on Wednesday, the day after the midterm elections.

With two new Bush appointees on the court — one replacing a justice who supported abortion rights — Johnson and other abortion opponents are optimistic that, for the first time, the court will uphold an outright ban on an abortion method.

The campaign against the procedure has succeeded where other attacks on abortion failed.

By branding it gruesome and unnecessary, Johnson won broad support for a criminal ban, even from lawmakers who usually vote in support of abortion rights. And he tapped into the public's public discomfort with abortions late in a pregnancy. A

DOJ_NMG_0091643

2003 CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll showed, by a ratio of more than 2 to 1, that Americans believe abortion should be illegal in the second trimester.

A win for Johnson and abortion foes would chip away at the court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which held that women have a constitutional right to an abortion.

Those fighting a ban argue that the disputed procedure is sometimes the safest method for aborting a fetus in midterm and, despite the attention it receives, is not commonly used.

Johnson, 55, first heard about it in 1992, when someone mailed an Ohio doctor's account to his organization. In the procedure, performed in the fifth or sixth month, the fetus is pulled partway out of the dilated cervix and the skull punctured to collapse it, allowing the fetus to be removed intact from the uterus.

Working out of a small, drab Washington office, Johnson tried to shift the focus of the abortion debate from the rights of pregnant women to the fetuses. He walked the halls of Congress with a briefcase that included a plastic model of a 20-week-old fetus that he used to make his case.

Relentless, Johnson was dubbed "the most effective lobbyist in Washington" by a conservative magazine.

Twice in the 1990s, Congress passed bills to outlaw the procedure, except to save a mother's life, but President Clinton vetoed them. He said he would sign such legislation if lawmakers added an exception for when the procedure was needed to preserve the health of the woman.

Abortion foes refused. They distrusted health exceptions, believing they would render a ban meaningless. Roe vs. Wade had defined health to include emotional, psychological, familial and age factors.

Based on language drafted by Johnson's office, 30 state legislatures had enacted bans by the late 1990s.

In 2003, President Bush signed the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act without an exception for health concerns.

It's not clear that the ban would affect many abortions. Only 1% to 2% of abortions take place after the 20th week of pregnancy.

Of these, about 3,000 to 5,000 per year are done with D&X. Doctors say only a small percentage of those are done because of medical complications or fetal deformity.

Johnson's attack on the procedure put the abortion-rights movement on the defensive. Its leaders argue that abortion has been and should remain a private matter between a woman and her doctor.

They also say there is something profoundly illogical about a ban on one method: If abortions are legal at the 20th week of pregnancy, why forbid doctors to use a method that might be the safest?

" 'Partial-birth abortion' is a political term. It's about generating public outrage. It's not a medical term," said Dr. Deborah Oyer, a Seattle physician who does midterm abortions but not the D&X procedure. She said she resents legislators trying to regulate the practice of medicine.

"Doctors want to do what is best for the patient. This is all about keeping the abortion issue before the public," she said.

Six years ago, the Supreme Court struck down Nebraska's ban on the procedure. The 5-4 majority, which included now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, said the ban violated a woman's right to abortion because it did not include a health exception.

Dr. Leroy Carhart, an abortion doctor from Bellevue, Neb., had challenged the state law as unconstitutional. During a two-week trial, Carhart and several medical experts testified that the D&X procedure was sometimes safer because there was less risk of bleeding and infection.

"Where substantial medical authority supports the proposition that banning a particular abortion procedure could endanger women's health," the government cannot ban it by law, the court ruled in Stenberg vs. Carhart in 2000.

When Congress took up the issue, many of its members were in a defiant mood. They declared the method, which they described as "gruesome and inhumane," was "never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother."

Carhart sued to challenge the law, and lower courts blocked it from taking effect. On Wednesday, the high court will debate the case, Gonzales vs. Carhart.

The replacement of O'Connor with Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., a conservative and a Catholic, has convinced many legal experts that the court is prepared to uphold stricter regulation of abortion. In Gonzales vs. Carhart, the court must first confront the precedent it established in the Nebraska case. The justices must also decide whether to defer to Congress on its ban of the procedure, as requested by U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, or to side with medical experts who testified.

After the bill became law, federal judges in San Francisco, New York and Omaha conducted trials on lawsuits that sought to overturn it. They heard from doctors who teach in medical schools at Cornell, Yale, Columbia, Northwestern, the University of Pittsburgh and UC San Francisco.

DOJ_NMG_0091644

By the middle months of a pregnancy, doctors remove the fetus with surgical instruments, using the D&X method or the more common "dilation and evacuation," called a D&E. In that procedure, the doctor breaks apart the fetus before removing it from the uterus.

Experts told the three judges that the D&X procedure was not the only safe way to perform abortions after 20 weeks, but was safer than D&E in some cases, especially for women who have a damaged immune system or are in danger of hemorrhaging.

"Congress can 'find' that the moon is made of green cheese. That doesn't make it so," Dr. Nancy Stanwood, who teaches obstetrics at the University of Rochester, said in a recent interview. "When you're doing surgery, shorter and faster is better. If an intact extraction is possible, it's preferable."

In Carhart's case, U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf issued a 474-page opinion that extensively cited medical testimony to explain why the ban was unconstitutional.

Dr. Jill Vibhakar, who teaches obstetrics at the University of Iowa and performs abortions at an independent clinic in Iowa City, is a plaintiff with Carhart in the suit before the court. She said the justices face the same issue Wednesday that they did when they threw out the Nebraska ban.

"Nothing has changed recently in medical practice. The only thing that has changed is that a moderate female justice has been replaced by a conservative male justice," Vibhakar said.

For his part, Johnson is cautious, but hopeful.

"I have given up making predictions about what the Supreme Court will do," he said. "This law is really quite limited, but we hope it is a turning point and the beginning of a return to sanity."

All Eyes On Roberts Court As It Takes On Abortion (CNN)

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The morning after the closely fought midterm elections, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear its first major abortion case in six years.

The hot-button issue has been debated for years among social and religious activists, voters and judges themselves.

At issue in Wednesday's arguments is the constitutionality of a federal law banning a specific late-term procedure its critics call "partial-birth" abortion. (Watch a new Supreme Court meet an old hot-button issue -- 2:16)

After Justice Samuel Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor this year, court watchers have been waiting for a pair of cases to signal whether the court is shifting to the right.

For a quarter of a century, O'Connor, the first woman on the high court, was a key swing vote upholding the basic right to abortion. The views of Alito, a more conservative jurist, could prove crucial in the new debate. So, too, could the views of moderate-conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, who takes O'Connor's place as the key swing vote.

"This case will test how far the government can reasonably go in outlawing so-called 'partial birth' abortion," said Thomas Goldstein, a leading appellate attorney and Supreme Court legal analyst.

"But we'll be able to take the temperature of the justices based on their questions, the opinions they write, whether they've moved one more vote toward overruling Roe v. Wade," he added. "They may well be very close."New justices, old issue

Even with Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts joining the bench in recent months, many legal scholars say the outcome is far from clear.

Three federal appeals courts have ruled against the government, saying the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 is unconstitutional because it does not provide a "health exception" for pregnant women facing a medical emergency.

The federal law has never gone into effect, pending the outcome of nearly three years of legal appeals.

The outcome of the latest challenge could turn on the legal weight given past rulings on the health exception.

In states where such exceptions are allowed, the lists of possible health risks include severe blood loss, damage to vital organs and loss of fertility.

Court briefs noted pregnant women having the procedure most often have their health threatened by cancer, heart disease, high blood pressure or risk of stroke. Doctors are given the discretion to recommend when the late-term procedure should be performed.

"This abortion ban would forbid doctors from providing their patients with the care they believe is safest and best, and would give Congress and states a green light to endanger women's health when they restrict women's access to abortion," said Eve Gartner, a senior staff attorney for Planned Parenthood Federation of America, who will appear before the justices. Prior cases may carry weight

DOJ_NMG_0091645

Many conservatives strongly disagree. "Partial-birth abortion really isn't abortion. It's killing a baby in the process of being born," said Tom Fitton of Judicial Watch. "I think conservatives are hopeful that the court will be more willing to allow further regulation."

The issue of late-term abortions is not new to the high court, and legal precedence may be key when justices review the federal ban.

In 2000, the justices threw out Nebraska's version outlawing the procedure. Using an earlier legal standard, a divided 5-4 court concluded the state law was an "undue burden" on women because it lacked the critical health exception.

Despite that ruling, the Republican-controlled Congress -- backed by the Bush White House -- passed its own version three years later.

The Justice Department had urged the justices to accept the new case, saying the lower courts viewed the issue wrongly.

"That decision overrides Congress' carefully considered finding, following nine years of hearings and debates, that partial-birth abortion is never necessary to preserve a mother's health," said Solicitor General Paul Clement in a legal brief filed with the court. Clement will argue the government's side before the high court.Debate focuses on numbers

Abortion-rights groups object to the term "partial birth" and even "late-term abortion," saying the procedure is done before the fetus is viable and is performed only in the second trimester, sometimes as early as 12 to 15 weeks after the start of pregnancy.

The federal law bans what doctors call "intact dilation and evacuation," which Congress in its legislation termed "gruesome and inhumane."

It is a rarely used second-trimester procedure, designed to reduce complications to the mother.

More common is "dilation and evacuation," used in 95 percent of pre-viability second-trimester abortions, according to Planned Parenthood. Both are generally performed after the 21st week of pregnancy.

About 1.4 percent of all abortions are believed to be performed after the 21st week, according to the latest numbers from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Comprehensive federal health statistics are not kept on a yearly basis. Conventional medical practice puts the earliest point of viability somewhere between the 24th and 28th weeks, although there have been rare earlier cases.

Since the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion, various states have tried to place restrictions and exceptions on access to the procedure, prompting a string of high court "clarifications" on the issue over the years.Political, religious groups weigh in

The abortion question has become part of the political debate this election season.

Many religious groups have filed legal briefs backing the government and plan to gather supporters outside the Supreme Court during Wednesday's arguments.

"We're garnering names on a petition; so far we have well over a hundred thousand," said Dr. Gary Cass, director of the Center for Reclaiming America for Christ. "I think we've come a long way away from our God-given right to life that was secured for us by the Founders. And so we're going to petition the court."

On the other side, abortion rights groups protested the nominations of Alito and Roberts, fearing they would roll back women's rights.

"How does the court preserve its own institutional integrity where this is nothing other than a bold-faced attempt to get the court to change an earlier ruling when the only thing that's changed is the makeup of the court?" said Roger Evans, Planned Parenthood's senior director.

As far as the legal merits, a ruling could turn on the court's newest member.

"It may come down to Justice Alito and whether he is persuaded or not that it would be appropriate to allow the legislature to make some definitions with respect to the time or types of procedures of abortion," said Theodore Olson, former solicitor general in the Bush White House. "It's one that could be overturned."

Abortion Cases Pit Justices Vs. Congress (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 7, 2006

In weighing the constitutionality of a federal law, the U.S. Supreme Court sometimes gives deference to congressional findings of fact. How will it view the critical finding at the heart of its latest abortion challenge?

The justices this week will hear arguments in two cases testing the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380; Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. Partial-birth abortion is a term used for an abortion procedure, intact dilation and extraction, infrequently used in second-trimester pregnancies.

DOJ_NMG_0091646

Although the high court's abortion precedents and the future of a woman's right to choose abortion will dominate discussions, the cases also are very much about separation of powers and the roles of the legislative and judicial branches in making and interpreting laws, say scholars on both sides.

"Our concern is [that] the Court's dislike of Roe v. Wade will drive the amount of deference it's willing to give to Congress," said Mark Moller, senior fellow in constitutional studies at the Cato Institute, which filed an amicus brief on the issue. "We think this is a much larger issue that goes far beyond Roe. It's about who gets to decide what the law is."

The Court's approach to deference in these cases, he added, can affect "a whole array of different rights."

In enacting the 2003 law, Congress made explicit findings in the statute that partial-birth abortion "is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother." A health exception to abortion restrictions has been central to the court's abortion jurisprudence since the landmark Roe v. Wade. The lack of such an exception was a key basis for a 5-4 majority's decision to strike down a Nebraska partial-birth abortion law, very similar to the federal law, just six years ago. Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914.

In the 2003 law, Congress criticizes Stenberg and the findings of the trial judge that gave rise to the Stenberg high court case. The federal lawmakers call for a "high degree" of deference to their own findings, a call echoed by the Bush administration and its supporters in briefs defending the federal law.

NEUTRAL FACT-FINDING?

But opponents contend that that type of deference is not due because Congress did not engage in neutral fact-finding. A fundamental right, requiring heightened court scrutiny and independent review of congressional findings, is at issue, and two district judges, in extensive trials in the two cases, made findings contrary to those of Congress.

The heart of the congressional fact-finding process -- and the reason Congress receives its greatest deference on economic or sociological facts -- is its ability to use a diverse array of means to collect and analyze information, said Charles Tiefer of the University of Baltimore School of Law, a former solicitor to the U.S. House of Representatives.

However, he added, "Where the issue is a matter of weighing social values against civil liberties, Congress may or may not have a good feel for the viewpoint of the voting population, but it doesn't have some superior method of somehow factually establishing where the balance point is."

The high court, with some ups and downs, gave considerable deference to congressional findings from the late 1930s to the mid-1990s and the advance of the Rehnquist Court's federalism movement, said Tiefer and others. In the last decade, a divided court struck down a number of applications of federal laws to the states, often because of a lack of congressional findings or despite extensive congressional findings.

Some lawmakers have voiced considerable unhappiness with the court's "lack of respect," most recently in the confirmation hearings for Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

While scholars agree that it's hard to find a consistent approach across the justices' rulings, Neal Devins of the College of William and Mary Marshall-Whythe School of Law suggests that where the court generally applies a rational-basis standard of review to a law affecting a right or classification, the court gives extreme deference to Congress.

"The whole theory of rational-basis review is essentially these are matters the legislative process will self-correct if mistakes were made," said Devins, who has studied the findings issue. "But then, there are fundamental rights cases, like cases involving abortion, where the court says the nature of the right or the classification involved is such we can't defer to the government."

The government argues that a series of First Amendment rulings by the high court "confirm that the degree of deference owed to congressional findings does not turn on the right at issue or the applicable level of scrutiny."

That position is "astounding and ridiculous," said David Faigman of the University of California Hastings College of the Law, who, with other scholars, filed an amicus brief on the findings issue on behalf of the law's opponents.

When legislation is subject to heightened scrutiny because it burdens a basic right, he said, the court has always made an independent review of factual findings. The government's position -- deference in all cases -- would permit legislative bodies to effectively overrule, through the guise of "fact-finding," the court's most critical decisions, he added, thereby undermining the court's pre-eminent role in constitutional interpretation mandated by Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803).

Ultimately, all agree, the pivotal figure is Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who dissented in Stenberg but holds a very strong view of the Supreme Court's role in the Constitution's scheme.

"He could view what Congress did as an affront to the court," said Devins. "This is where the rubber meets the road for Kennedy -- to find out which is the bigger pull -- the disapproval of Stenberg pull or the judicial supremacy pull."

DOJ_NMG_0091647

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Federal Observers At Polls In 22 States (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 7, 2006

Federal poll watchers will be in 22 states Tuesday, safeguarding against fraud or discrimination in election districts marked by tight races, large numbers of minority voters and faulty ballot machines.

Justice Department monitors and observers are being assigned to Cuyahoga County, Ohio, which has been dogged by problems with computerized touch-screen voting machines. They will be in Bergen County, N.J., a must-win prize for both candidates in the state's Senate race.

And they will watching more than a dozen counties nationwide where polls are on American Indian reservations and in big cities dominated by black voters.

In all, the Justice Department is sending an estimated 850 poll watchers to 69 cities and counties — what officials on Monday called an unprecedented number, and twice as many during the 2002 congressional midterm elections.

The government has dispatched poll watchers to ensure fair elections since the 1965 Voting Rights Act was enacted.

Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, who heads the Justice Department's civil rights programs, told reporters last week that the election districts were selected in part because of close races there.

They include Fort Bend and Galveston counties in Texas, where Republican write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is seeking to keep a GOP hold on the seat vacated by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Texas Democrats have accused Sekula-Gibbs of twice entering early voting locations — which is prohibited by law — to introduce herself to voters and workers.

That race also has been marked by allegations of poll workers offering unrequested assistance if voters need help with writing in a candidate or need help writing in Sekula-Gibbs.

Poll watchers will be in several major cities — including Boston, Chicago, Denver, New Orleans, San Francisco and parts of New York City — where black and other minority voters traditionally have claimed they were denied access to the ballot box.

The federal watchdogs will be in some small cities, too, like Springfield, Mass., where the Justice Department forced officials to hire bilingual poll workers to help Spanish-speaking residents at the polls.

Eight counties in South Dakota alone — which hosts a number of American Indian reservations — will be visited by the observers and monitors. They will also be in largely rural Berks County, Pa., one of about nine counties that won't count absentees ballots on election night.

___

On the Net:

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov/

Justice Department Dispatches Election Monitors (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, Justice Producer

CNN.com, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Justice Department Monday announced it has dispatched an army of election observers and monitors across the country to polling places where it sees a potential for discrimination or other voting rights violations.

After weeks of considering requests for a federal presence, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Civil Rights Division lawyers decided to send 850 poll watchers to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states.

The federal authorities are being sent to monitor a wide variety of specific issues. In New Orleans, Louisiana, however, the observers will be there primarily to provide support to a wobbly post-Katrina election system that could be overwhelmed by residency issues. (Watch what the Justice Department will be looking for -- 1:59)

The federal force includes more than 500 trained observers from the Office of Personnel Management. They are going to places with troubled histories as certified by the Attorney General or the federal courts under provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1965. Those locations include polling places where allegations of racial, ethnic and language discrimination have surfaced in the past -- some as far back as the 1970s.

In Alabama, observers are going to Chambers, Lee, and Tuscaloosa counties. They are three of seven white majority counties where black candidates are challenging white candidates. African-American groups asked for observers to ensure their rights are protected.

In Noxubee County, Mississippi, observers will be watching polling stations where alleged discrimination against white voters by black elections officials triggered a federal investigation and lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0091648

The Justice Department is also sending more than 350 monitors, including attorneys from its Civil Rights Division and U.S. Attorneys offices, to other hot spots where complaints have been registered or tensions have run high.

The Justice Department has declined official comment on why any of the locations were selected.

Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim said the anticipated closeness of races would be one factor in making the final decisions on where to send observers. But in the end, few of the jurisdictions receiving federal scrutiny will be in states with heated Senate races.

Eight counties in South Dakota and five in Arizona with substantial Native American populations are on the list. In Arizona, Native Americans have warned of tensions in a race where there is debate over whether a Native American state senator endorsed a congressional candidate.

Unfettered access to the polls and the availability of minority language ballots are among the issues in Kings County, Queens County and Richmond County in New York and in five counties in New Jersey. Many of the locations have substantial Spanish-speaking communities.

An official with the Leadership Conference for Civil Rights called the Justice Department's announcement Monday "a mixed bag."

"It seems they took some of our recommendations to heart," said attorney Julie Fernandez. "Our biggest disappointment is that they are not sending anyone to North Carolina or Alaska," she said.

In Chatham County, North Carolina, there is a hotly contested referendum on county commission voting districts, which is opposed by black residents who have expressed fear of voter suppression tactics.

Civil Rights groups charge that in Alaska, the state has not implemented the language protections required to ensure the rights of Native Americans. Some small native villages have no polling precincts and have complained about problems with absentee ballots.

However, the Justice Department did send monitors to several other locations recommended by minority groups. Observers will be in St. Landry Parish, Louisiana, where there is a racially heated runoff for a vacant sheriff's seat. In that contest, the black female interim sheriff alleges her opponent used racial slurs at a number of public campaign events.

FBI Looks Into Voter Intimidation (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 7, 2006

The FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb.

Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate.

Jean R. Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office. The FBI is the investigative arm of the Justice Department.

Dee Rybiski, spokeswoman for the FBI here, declined comment.

Jensen said she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County.

Jensen said she later received a report from the Hampton registrar about a call to a voter there. That complaint came in response to an e-mail from Jensen to local registrars about possibly deceptive phone calls.

"Voters should not be intimidated or deceived by phone messages purporting to be from election officials," Jensen said in a written statement. "Any communication from federal, state or local election officials will always be in a written form clearly identifying the official source."

With published polls depicting the Allen-Webb race as a tossup, both sides are mobilizing lawyers and voting experts to watch for irregularities and prepare for a possible recount.

In a written statement issued by the Webb campaign, state Democratic Party counsel Jay B. Myerson suggested that Republicans are behind efforts to suppress votes for Webb.

"We've seen this tactic before, and it is about time the Republicans learned that it will not work," Myerson said.

Shawn M. Smith, executive director of the Virginia Republican Party, said the state GOP and Allen campaign are focusing on mobilizing votes for Allen.

As for voter intimidation or suppression, Smith said: "We are not aware of any such activities taking place and are skeptical of the claims being made. Nonetheless, we condemn such activities if they are being conducted by outside organizations."

J. Tucker Martin, spokesman for Attorney General Bob McDonnell, had no immediate comment.

DOJ_NMG_0091649

Police Look Into Cross Burning Attempt At Grand Coteau Town Hall (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

GRAND COTEAU, La. (AP) — Someone tried to set a cross on fire in the town hall parking lot of Grand Coteau, where the black mayor is in a runoff Tuesday against a white woman.

Authorities said Monday that they had few leads, other than for a pickup truck seen leaving the parking lot without its lights on late Thursday, the night before the cross was planted.

"This is just not our community. This is not a reflection of the community as a whole. Grand Coteau is not like that," said Gail Lark, who had 44 percent of the primary vote to 23 percent for Mayor Jean Coco in the town of 1,000.

Lark said at least 200 people — black and white — had called her, upset by the incident. Mayor Jean Coco did not return a call for comment Monday.

Police Chief Jonty Coco said officers answered a report of a small fire in the parking lot about 9 p.m. Friday, and found a 5-foot tall cross placed into a wooden base. The cross itself never did catch fire, he said.

Chief Coco said the state police and the FBI had been informed. A preliminary investigation indicated the cross had been soaked with used motor oil, he said.

No suspects were reported, but the chief said officers were looking for a gray Chevrolet pickup spotted in the lot the night before.

Suspected Pimp Charged With Sex Trafficking (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

A California man suspected of being a pimp has been charged with sex trafficking.

Twenty-seven-year-old Jeremiah Crayton of San Francisco is charged in Phoenix with two counts of Sex Trafficking of a Minor and two counts of Interstate Transportation of a Minor for Prostitution.

The U-S Attorney for Arizona Paul Charlton says they plan to aggressively prosecute those who trade in the pain and misery of children.

The complaint alleges that in August of 2004, Crayton took a juvenile female, who he knew was under 18 from Phoenix to San Francisco, where he forced her to work as a prostitute.

Authorities allege Crayton met the teen at a bus stop in Phoenix.

N.Y. Plans To Make Gender Personal Choice (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Separating anatomy from what it means to be a man or a woman, New York City is moving forward with a plan to let people alter the sex on their birth certificate even if they have not had sex-change surgery.

Under the rule being considered by the city's Board of Health, which is likely to be adopted soon, people born in the city would be able to change the documented sex on their birth certificates by providing affidavits from a doctor and a mental health professional laying out why their patients should be considered members of the opposite sex, and asserting that their proposed change would be permanent.

Applicants would have to have changed their name and shown that they had lived in their adopted gender for at least two years, but there would be no explicit medical requirements.

"Surgery versus nonsurgery can be arbitrary," said Dr. Thomas R. Frieden, the city's health commissioner. "Somebody with a beard may have had breast-implant surgery. It's the permanence of the transition that matters most."

If approved, the new rule would put New York at the forefront of efforts to redefine gender. A handful of states do not require surgery for such birth certificate changes, but in some of those cases patients are still not allowed to make the change without showing a physiological shift to the opposite gender.

In New York, the proposed change comes after four years of discussion among health officials, an eight-member panel of transgender experts and vital records offices nationwide. It is an outgrowth of the transgender community's push to recognize that some people may not have money to get a sex-change operation, while others may not feel the need to undergo the procedure and are simply defining themselves as members of the opposite sex. While it may be a radical notion elsewhere, New York City has often tolerated such blurring of the lines of gender identity.

And the proposal reflects how the transgender movement has become politically potent beyond its small numbers, having roots in the muscular politics of the city's gay rights movement.

DOJ_NMG_0091650

Transgender advocates consider the New York proposal an overdue bulwark against discrimination that recognizes an emerging shift away from viewing gender as simply the sum of one's physical parts. But some psychiatrists and doctors are skeptical of the move, saying sexual self-definition should stop at rewriting medical history.

"They should not change the sex at birth, which is a factual record," said Dr. Arthur Zitrin, a Midtown psychiatrist who was on the panel of transgender experts convened by the city. "If they wanted to change the gender for all the compelling reasons that they've given, it should be done perhaps with an asterisk."

The change would lead to many intriguing questions: For example, would a man who becomes a woman be able to marry another man? (Probably.) Would an adoption agency be able to uncover the original sex of a proposed parent? (Not without a court order.) Would a woman who becomes a man be able to fight in combat, or play in the National Football League? (These areas have yet to be explored.)

The Board of Health, which weighs recommendations drafted by the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, is scheduled to vote on the proposal in December, and officials say they expect it to be adopted.

At the final public hearing for the birth certificate proposal last week, a string of advocates and transsexuals suggested that common definitions of gender, especially its reliance on medical assessments, should be abandoned. They generally praised the city for revisiting its 25-year-old policy that lets people remove the sex designation from their birth certificate if they have had sexual reassignment surgery. Then they demanded more freedom to choose.

Michael Silverman, executive director of the Transgender Legal Defense and Education Fund, said transgender people should not have to rely on affidavits from a health care system that tends to be biased against them. He said that many transgender people cannot afford sex-change surgery or therapy, and often do not consider it necessary.

Another person who testified, Mariah Lopez, 21, said she wanted a new birth certificate to prevent confusion, and to keep teachers, police officers and other authority figures from embarrassing her in public or accusing her of identity theft.

A few weeks ago, at a welfare office in Queens, Ms. Lopez said she included a note with her application for public assistance asking that she be referred to as Ms. when her turn for an interview came up. It did not work. The woman handling her case repeatedly addressed her as Mister.

"The thing is, I don't even remember what it's like to be a boy," Ms. Lopez said, adding that she received a diagnosis of transgender identity disorder at age 6. She asked to be identified as a woman for this article.

The eight experts who addressed the birth certificate issue strongly recommended that the change be made, for the practical reasons Ms. Lopez identified. For public health studies, people who have changed their gender would be counted according to their sex at birth.

But some psychiatrists said that eliminating identification difficulties for some transgender people also opened the door to unwelcome advances from imposters.

"I've already heard of a 'transgendered' man who claimed at work to be 'a woman in a man's body but a lesbian' and who had to be expelled from the ladies' restroom because he was propositioning women there," Dr. Paul McHugh, a member of the President's Council of Bioethics and chairman of the psychiatry department at Johns Hopkins University, wrote in an e-mail message on the subject. "He saw this as a great injustice in that his behavior was justified in his mind by the idea that the categories he claimed for himself were all 'official' and had legal rights attached to them."

The move to ease the requirements for altering one's gender identity comes after New York has adopted other measures aimed at blurring the lines of gender identification. For instance, a new shelter policy approved in January now allows beds to be distributed according to appearance, applying equally to postoperative transsexuals, cross-dressers and "persons perceived to be androgynous."

The Metropolitan Transportation Authority also agreed last month to let people define their own gender when deciding whether to use the men's or women's bathrooms.

Joann Prinzivalli, 52, a lawyer for the New York Transgender Rights Organization, a man who has lived as a woman since 2000, without surgery, said the changes amount to progress, a move away from American culture's misguided fixation on genitals as the basis for one's gender identity.

"It's based on an arbitrary distinction that says there are two and only two sexes," she said. "In reality the diversity of nature is such that there are more than just two, and people who seem to belong to one of the designated sexes may really belong to the other."

Uncivil Rights (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091651

Today in Michigan, voters face a choice on Proposal 2, which would add the following language to the state constitution: "The state shall not discriminate against, or grant preferential treatment to any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting."

One might think a law banning discrimination would be a triumph for civil rights. Instead, opponents have spent $3 million trying to defeat it, using some of the most low-down arguments of this low-down election year. Consider this ad running on Detroit radio:

"If you could have prevented 9/11 from ever happening . . . would you have? If you could have prevented Katrina from ever happening . . . what would you have done? On Nov. 7th there's a national disaster headed for Michigan . . . the elimination of affirmative action. And on Nov. 7th there's only one way to stop this disaster . . . by voting no on Proposal 2."

We're not against "negative" advertising, but to equate the abolition of racial and gender preferences to the damage done by terrorists and a hurricane seems a tad hyperbolic, not to mention dishonest.

Women's groups are also in on the distortion. They're using statewide ads to claim that ending affirmative action would lead to an end to women's health clinics, programs to tutor girls in math and science, and funding for breast cancer treatment. There's one problem with these scare tactics: The initiative doesn't apply to health clinics or tutoring programs. Two states -- California and Washington -- have passed nearly identical initiatives, and there has been no negative effect on women's opportunities.

The opponents of Proposal 2 have also rolled out Tommy Amaker and Tom Izzo, the men's basketball coaches at Michigan and Michigan State University, respectively. They declared at a press conference that the initiative would hurt the university system by reducing "diversity." Once upon a time, the goal of civil rights legislation was equal opportunity. But with that goal largely achieved, the proponents of racial preferences have now moved the goalposts to "diversity" for its own sake. This sets race above other qualities, which erodes public confidence in individual merit as opposed to group rights.

In any case, the proponents of the Civil Rights Initiative sent the two coaches a question: "Do you use quotas or preferences when you choose the players on your basketball teams?"

In 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Michigan universities may not use race as a primary factor in admissions but could use it as one of several. But a new study from the Center for Equal Opportunity shows that race is an even larger factor now than before at the University of Michigan. In 2005, an Asian or white student with a 1240 SAT and 3.2 grade point average had only a 1 in 10 chance gaining admission, while a black student with the same record had a 9 in 10 chance.

Another reason opponents are spending so much money to defeat this initiative is that it would ban the "setting aside" of minority business contracts -- a practice that has made a lot of people very rich in Michigan. Left unsaid is that those set-asides can cost Michigan taxpayers millions of dollars in inflated contracting costs.

There's nothing wrong with schools or businesses considering a candidate's background when deciding whether to admit or hire. But the application of racial and gender quotas has become a corrupting and divisive process that violates our Constitutional heritage of equal rights and fairness. Polls in Michigan had the Civil Rights Initiative narrowly ahead in the final days, notwithstanding the 3-to-1 funding advantage of the opponents. If it prevails despite the distortions used by opponents, it will be a tribute to the faith among Michigan voters in equal opportunity.

ANTITRUST:

Merrill Gets Justice Department Query On Buyouts, Person Says (BLOOM)

By Brett Cole

Bloomberg, November 7, 2006

Nov. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Merrill Lynch & Co., the world's third-largest securities firm, received a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an antitrust inquiry of the leveraged-buyout industry, a person familiar with the probe said.

Justice officials have already sent letters seeking information to Carlyle Group, Clayton, Dubilier & Rice Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the inquiry isn't public. The Merrill letter was reported earlier today by the Wall Street Journal.

``The DOJ is probably focusing on three to four deals initially, and if it finds any problems then it may widen the probe to include other firms and deals," Sean Boland, co-chair of the antitrust practice at Washington-based law firm Howrey LLP, said today in a telephone interview. Boland said the probe may last more than a year.

LBO firms have teamed up on $201 billion of acquisitions this year, compared with $31 billion in all of 2001, according to data compiled by London-based Private Equity Intelligence Ltd. In July, the industry's biggest deal was announced, the $33 billion takeover of hospital chain HCA Inc. by KKR, Bain Capital LLC, Merrill Lynch's private-equity unit and HCA co-founder Thomas F. Frist Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0091652

Carlyle, Clayton Dubilier and Merrill acquired Hertz Global Holdings Inc. last year from Ford Motor Co. for $15 billion. The Park Ridge, New Jersey-based car-rental company said last month it planned to sell as much as $1.83 billion of shares in an initial public offering.

Offer Prices

Mark Herr, a spokesman for New York-based Merrill, declined to comment. Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, didn't return a call seeking comment. Spokesmen for the buyout firms declined to comment.

Buyout firms form partnerships to spread risk and increase the size of purchases they can make. The Justice Department may be concerned that cooperation among bidders is unfairly pushing down prices, said Robert Burka, an antitrust lawyer at Foley & Lardner in Washington and a former official the Federal Trade Commission.

Report: Regulators Eye Private Equity (AP-YBIZ)

AP, November 7, 2006

Report: Regulators Examining Whether Anticompetitive Behavior Occurs at Private Equity Firms

NEW YORK (AP) -- Regulators are looking into whether private equity firms, which are increasingly the driving force behind some of Wall Street's biggest buyout deals, have engaged in anticompetitive behavior.

The Wall Street Journal reported Monday that the U.S. Department of Justice is seeking documents from Merrill Lynch & Co.'s private equity business as part of a larger informal probe. The newspaper reported that at least four other private equity companies have received letters in recent weeks, including Carlyle Group; Clayton, Dubilier & Rice; Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.; and Silver Lake Partners.

"We never comment on government investigations except to say that we cooperate with them," Merrill Lynch spokeswoman Jessica Oppenheim told The Associated Press Monday.

Carlyle Group, Clayton Dubilier, Kohlberg Kravis and Silver Lake also would not comment. A Justice Department official also declined to comment.

The U.K.'s Financial Services Authority said in a statement Monday it is weighing whether it provides adequate oversight of the private equity market.

Merrill's private equity business, Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, has been on a tear, with profits of more than $300 million last quarter. The operation was involved in the $21.3 billion leveraged buyout agreement of hospital chain HCA Inc. Kohlberg Kravis and Bain Capital LLC also took part in that deal.

The news comes as investors are cheering the premiums that private equity deals can bring; the private equity deals can also generate enormous fees on Wall Street. Monday brought a flurry of private equity news, with offers being made for Four Seasons Hotels Inc. and OSI Restaurant Partners Inc., which is the parent of such chains as Outback Steakhouse.

The Journal reported that the addition of Merrill to the inquiry could mean investigators could be eyeing the auction of Hertz Global Holdings Inc., which was carved out of Ford Motor Co. in December. Carlyle, Clayton Dubilier and Merrill Lynch beat out a rival consortium of Bain Capital LLC, Blackstone Group LP, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP in that deal, the newspaper reported.

An initial public offering for Hertz is slated for next week.

Many private equity firms see opportunity in taking a company private, making changes and then in some cases taking a company public to reap the potential windfall. Some investors are also looking to private equity deals as costs of doing business as a public company have increased. Regulatory requirements have been tightened, increasing some overhead costs at companies, following scandals seen in recent years such as the one that brought down Enron Corp.

Feds Request Info In Smithfield Deal (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

Federal Regulators Want More Information From Smithfield and Premium Standard on Acquisition

SMITHFIELD, Va. (AP) -- Smithfield Foods Inc. and Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's two largest hog producers, said Monday they received requests for additional information from federal regulators related to Smithfield's pending acquisition of Premium Standard.

The request by the Department of Justice's antitrust division extends the waiting period imposed by federal law until 30 days after the two companies have substantially complied with the request.

Under terms of the deal announced in September, Smithfield Foods will buy Premium Standard for about $674 million in cash and stock. Smithfield will also assume about $117 million of Premium Standard's debt.

DOJ_NMG_0091653

Both companies said they intend to respond expeditiously to the request and to work toward a prompt closing, which they hope to achieve in the first quarter of 2007.

Smithfield shares rose 40 cents to close at $26.10 on the New York Stock Exchange. Premium Standard shares picked up 25 cents to end at $18.68 on the Nasdaq.

Ahold Says It Will Sell U.S. Foodservice (AP)

By Toby Sterling, Associated Press

AP, November 7, 2006

Analysts put value at $5 billion

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands – Supermarket chain operator Royal Ahold NV announced plans Monday to sell its U.S. Foodservice unit, which distributes bulk food to cafeterias, as part of a major strategic shift back to its roots in retailing.

As part of the plan, Ahold also said it would sell its Tops stores in New York and Pennsylvania, divest its retail operations in Poland and Slovakia, and sell its 49 percent stake in Portugal's Jeronimo Martins Retail.

"The basic decision we've taken is to commit to retail, to go back to where we come from," Chief Executive Anders Moberg told reporters. "We will keep retail operations in markets in the United States and in Europe only where we can secure and maintain a No. 1 or No. 2 position."

Analysts said the moves were the logical next step for Ahold, which has gradually returned to firm financial footing by refinancing and selling assets after an accounting scandal centered around U.S. Foodservice pushed it to the edge of bankruptcy in 2003.

"It all makes perfect sense," said analyst Bryan Roberts of Planet Retail.

Ahold said last week that third-quarter sales at its Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice operation, which distributes food to cafeterias in hospitals, schools and prisons, increased by 5 percent to $4.5 billion. Analysts put its value at around $5 billion.

Ahold, one of the largest food retailers in the United States and Europe, promised to use the proceeds from the sale of Foodservice and the grocery chains to return at least 2 billion euros ($2.5 billion) to shareholders and reduce net debt by the same amount.

The company also said it would cut annual operating costs by 500 million euros ($638 million) by the end of 2009.

Ahold operates the Stop & Shop and Giant chains in the United States and several large European chains, including its highly profitable flagship supermarket, Albert Heijn, which is dominant in the Netherlands.

Ahold will keep its stores in the Czech Republic, where it holds a leadership position, and the Swedish-based ICA supermarkets, in which it holds a 60 percent stake.

When the smoke clears, Ahold will have around 60 billion euros ($76.3 billion) in consolidated annual sales, Moberg said.

Ahold shares rose 0.1 percent to 8.36 euros ($10.63) in Amsterdam trading. But with the stock still lingering below its level before the scandal struck, Ahold has been under pressure to make a major change.

In August, investment funds Paulson & Co. Inc. and Centaurus Capital Ltd., which hold 6.4 percent of Ahold's shares, said the company should sell Foodservice and split the U.S. and European retail operations, a proposal some analysts agreed with and which caused a spike in share prices.

The Financial Times reported last week Ahold is in talks to sell Foodservice to private-equity firm Clayton Dubilier & Rice Inc., and Dutch media have reported Ahold is in merger talks with Delhaize Group of Belgium. Clayton Dubilier & Rice could not immediately be reached for comment Monday.

Moberg declined to confirm either idea, but noted that "since 2003 there's been speculation we would sell Foodservice. We haven't had discussions with potential buyers ... but there's a lot of interest out there and that's good for getting a good price."

Roberts said Delhaize would be a good match for Ahold.

Delhaize is smaller, with $4.4 billion in sales in the United States from chains including Food Lion, Harvey's, Sweetbay and Hannaford in the second quarter of 2006. Ahold had around $5.3 billion in sales from its U.S chains in the same period.

In Belgium, Delhaize had second-quarter sales of around 1.1 billion euros ($1.4 billion), compared to Albert Heijn's 1.7 billion euros ($2.2 billion) in the Netherlands.

"They obviously have great overlap in the Benelux countries, though there could be some antitrust concerns," Roberts said. "Ahold could benefit from some of Delhaize's best practices in the States, where its stores are outstanding in both price and quality."

Ahold, which will report third quarter earnings Dec. 1, warned last week that margins are slipping at its U.S. stores under heavy competition. Its Albert Heijn stores' sales were up 10 percent in the third quarter.

After the scandal, senior former executives resigned and were later convicted of fraud but let off with fines. Several high-ranking managers at Foodservice are awaiting trial.

DOJ_NMG_0091654

Ahold settled with regulators for a small fine and last year announced a $1.1 billion settlement with shareholders, apparently putting the last remaining issue from the scandal behind it.

Roberts said the company's current management deserved credit for not selling Foodservice under financial distress. He predicted the company would now “get a decent price for Foodservice, given that private equity firms have already been sniffing around it.”

Morgan Stanley, Visa Settle Dispute (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

Morgan Stanley and Visa Settle Dispute Over Access to European Network

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- Morgan Stanley and Visa International have agreed to settle a long-running dispute over business in Europe, the two companies said in a statement Monday.

However, the European Commission cautioned that the settlement wouldn't end its investigation into Visa's commercial practices.

Visa had refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network in Europe because Morgan Stanley runs a competing card service in the United States, Discover. Morgan Stanley complained to the European Union in 2000.

The two companies said they "reached an amicable settlement, without any admission of liability." Morgan Stanley has become a member of Visa in Europe. In return, it withdrew its complaint to European regulators and ended court proceedings in England.

After Morgan Stanley complained, European antitrust regulators formally charged Visa with blocking competitors from its network in August, 2004. It sent Visa a formal "statement of objections," saying Visa's rule barring competitors from using its network squelches competition in a growing segment of the credit-card industry and reduces choice for merchants. This case will continue despite Monday's news.

Jonathan Todd, the EU antitrust spokesman, said the investigation is ongoing.

In a previous case, settled in 2002, Visa agreed to reduce by about 20 percent a fee that is borne by retailers and their banks.

The credit-card cases are part of a renewed drive by regulators to open up competition in Europe's financial-services sector.

Shares of Morgan Stanley rose $1.64, or 2.2 percent, to $75.92 on the New York Stock Exchange in afternoon trading Monday on the New York Stock Exchange. The financial services company is based in New York.

EU To Rule By Dec. 8 On Universal Music Group's Purchase Of BMG Music Publishing (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium — EU regulators on Monday set a Dec. 8 deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for $2.09 billion.

BMG — owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG — has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Vivendi SA's Universal is the world's largest music company.

Its purchase of BMG Music Publishing must be cleared by both EU and U.S. regulators. It is likely to face careful scrutiny in Europe after an EU court in July overturned the European Commission's go-ahead from a merger between the music units of Sony and Bertelsmann AG.

That deal — reducing the number of major record companies from five to four — must be re-examined and analysts warned it could raise the stakes for similar mergers. The Commission has already said it had to watch the music sector closely to check that antitrust rules are not being broken.

EMI suspended $4.6 billion takeover talks with U.S. rival Warner Music Group after the court ruling since it cast doubt on whether an EMI-Warner deal would receive regulatory approval.

The Court of First Instance — the EU's second-highest court — said regulators had not properly shown that there was a monopoly in the recording industry before the deal or that there would not be one afterward.

It also said the Commission did not explain why it dropped earlier charges that the deal could exacerbate "tacit collusion" in the industry, leading to higher CD prices and less choice for consumers in a market where there is already too little competition.

NTP Files Patent Suit Against Palm (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091655

NTP Inc., which successfully sued the maker of BlackBerry devices for infringement of wireless email patents, said it is suing Palm Inc., maker of the Treo smartphone.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, alleges that Palm's products and services have improperly used NTP's wireless email technology. The suit asks the court to bar Palm from "continuing to infringe on NTP's patents" and seeks monetary damages for the alleged past infringements.

In March, BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd. agreed to pay NTP $612.5 million to settle a four-year patent dispute. Though it never conceded wrongdoing, RIM acknowledged that customers had delayed placing new orders due to the threat of a court-ordered shutdown of the BlackBerry system in the U.S.

The Palm complaint also centers on products and services that integrate email systems with wireless communications, including the Treo, Palm VII, Palm i700 and Tungsten products. At issue are seven patents, dating from 1995 to 2001, according to the lawsuit. Five of the patents were part of NTP's lawsuit against RIM.

"We have attempted -- on numerous occasions -- to resolve this issue with Palm without resorting to litigation that is both time-consuming and costly," said Donald Stout, NTP's co-founder, in a statement. "Despite our efforts, Palm has chosen to continue to unlawfully infringe on our patents."

A spokesman for Palm couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Richmond, Va.-based NTP, a closely held patent company, has licensed its technology to Nokia Corp., Good Technology Inc. and Visto Corp.

Write to the Online Journal's editors at newseditors@wsj.com

Swift Transportation Gets $2.2 Billion Bid From Its Ex-CEO By ANN KEETON (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Jerry Moyes, the former top executive and largest shareholder of Swift Transportation Co., has offered to buy the Phoenix trucking company for $2.2 billion.

Swift, a long-haul trucking carrier, said that Mr. Moyes offered $29 a share, a 21% premium to Friday's trading price of $24.05. The company said its board will review the offer.

Swift shares rose $5.79, or 24%, to $29.84 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, an indication that some investors anticipate a higher offer. In a letter to the company, Mr. Moyes said he would consider increasing the offer if an examination of Swift's books and records showed that the shares are worth more than $29.

In the third quarter, trucking companies reported that they hadn't seen the usual seasonal upturn in business, with retailers preparing for the holiday season. A slowing economy would hurt the trucking business.

For 2005, Swift reported net income of $101.1 million, or $1.37 a share, on revenue of $3.2 billion.

Mr. Moyes, 62 years old, started out in the trucking business with a single truck and later helped to found Swift in 1966. In 1984, he became chairman, president and chief executive of the company. He retired from those positions in 2005.

McKesson To Purchase Per-Se For $1.1 Billion, Adding Clients By NICOLE URBANOWICZ (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

McKesson Corp. agreed to buy Per-Se Technologies Inc., which sells administrative services to doctors and hospitals, for about $1.1 billion, expanding the drug-distribution giant's customer base and transaction-processing capabilities.

McKesson also will assume Per-Se's debt outstanding under the deal. As of Sept. 30, Per-Se had long-term debt of $510.6 million.

The buyer will pay $28 in cash for each Per-Se share outstanding, a 14.5% premium to the Alpharetta, Ga., company's Friday closing share price. Per-Se shares rose $3.09, or 13%, to $27.54 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. McKesson rose $1.17, or 2.4%, to 49.69 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

McKesson Chief Executive John Hammergren said the acquisition will strengthen customer relationships in existing McKesson businesses while adding a pharmacy transaction business to the San Francisco company's portfolio.

Hedge fund ValueAct Capital, which controls about 15.5% of Per-Se's voting common stock, and certain of its affiliates agreed to vote in favor of the transaction. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter.

After the deal, the scale of McKesson's transaction-processing services and associated offerings is expected to more than double to about 560 million transactions annually, representing an estimated $300 billion in billed charges.

McKesson distributes medicines to more than 25,000 U.S. health-care locations such as pharmacies, including those at Wal-Mart Stores Inc., plus hospitals, nursing homes and doctors' offices.

Per-Se's customers include about 100,000 physicians in small practices, 17,000 hospital-affiliated physicians, 3,000 hospitals and 50,000 retail pharmacies.

DOJ_NMG_0091656

McKesson expects pretax synergies from the deal of $50 million to $75 million by the third year.

Last week, drugstore company CVS Corp. agreed to acquire McKesson's biggest customer, Caremark Rx Inc., in a $21 billion deal to create an even bigger customer that could negotiate lower prices. A combined CVS-Caremark might try to shift more business to Cardinal Health Inc. and away from McKesson, according to analysts.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

One Chemical At A Time (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

An industry association, a labor union and a public health group recently settled a court case over a new standard for worker exposure to a cancer-causing chemical, hexavalent chromium. It was a rare example of agreement in worker-safety regulation.

Under the Oct. 25 settlement, the Surface Finishing Industry Council , whose members use the chemical to coat metals, agreed to move faster to improve ventilation and make other engineering changes to reduce workers' exposure levels. In return, the United Steelworkers union and an ally agreed that workers would have to wear a respirator only for certain jobs, unless they requested one.

"It's a good trade-off," said Scott Nelson , a lawyer with Public Citizen Litigation Group , which worked with the union in getting the Occupational Safety and Health Administration to revise the standard.

"How often, when you have zealously guarded positions, do you achieve common ground?" agreed Baruch Fellner , an attorney for the industry group.

OSHA said last week that it was amending the final rule to incorporate the settlement, a promising development.

Unfortunately, it's not a harbinger this election day of a real breakthrough in one of Washington's most contentious issues.

The problem is that the hex chromium rule covers hundreds of thousands of other workers not part of the settlement, and several other court challenges remain. They involve Nelson's clients and other unions, as well as the specialty steel and electric utility industries and the National Association of Manufacturers .

More significantly, there is no sign that the single agreement will cure the paralysis that for years has crippled the process for setting "permissible exposure limits" for chemicals in the workplace.

Exposure limits for some 400 chemicals were set when OSHA was set up in 1971. Only about 20 have been reviewed and revised since, according to the agency. In some cases, including hexavalent chromium, the science underlying the rule hasn't been updated since the 1920s.

The American Industrial Hygiene Association , in a 2002 study of the problem, called it "a disservice to worker health that the majority of OSHA permissible exposure limits are based on recommendations that were made almost 30 years ago."

This means hundreds of companies operating in the shipyard, construction and chemical industries have only to adhere to woefully outdated standards for protecting workers from harmful chemical exposure.

In 1988, OSHA proposed a wholesale upgrade of 212 of the existing standards, as well as an additional 164 exposure limits for substances that never had been regulated. Industry groups sued, claiming the proposals were too stringent; the AFL-CIO sued, saying some weren't strong enough and monitoring plans were weak.

In 1992, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit in Atlanta ruled that while the agency could propose generic rules, it had to justify the limit chosen for each chemical.

"The lesson learned was that it was difficult to update 400 permissible exposure limits under the OSHA rulemaking process," said Randel Johnson , an official at the Labor Department at that time. He now is vice president of labor, immigration and employee benefits at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce .

There was another unsuccessful attempt in 1996, when OSHA said it intended to update the exposure limits for about 20 substances. That idea never reached the proposal stage.

Canada, European countries and several states have stricter exposure limits than OSHA's for some chemicals. No one involved in the federal rulemaking process likes the inertia.

Almost everyone blames the legal requirements the agency has to meet, including exhaustive administrative reviews, such as considering a rule's possible effect on small business. Time-consuming peer reviews of the science backing the rule add to the delays.

"We can't simply say a substance is dangerous. We have to do quantitative analysis and determine there is a significant risk. It's not a simple undertaking," said Joseph Woodward , an associate solicitor for OSHA at the Labor Department.

DOJ_NMG_0091657

Peter Lurie , deputy director of Public Citizen's Health Research Group, doesn't buy the explanation. He blames Democrats and Republicans alike for ignoring the issue, and the agency for dragging its feet.

"The underlying problem is both parties are on the take from major industry and, as a consequence, their enthusiasm for regulating those industries is practically nil," Lurie said. Some of the few standards that have been updated emerged only after groups like his sued the agency to force action.

OSHA has exposure standards for two substances -- crystalline silica and beryllium -- on its regulatory to-do list. They have been listed there for years, and some agency work has been completed, but no proposals made.

Public Citizen petitioned the agency for an emergency standard for beryllium in 1999 and 2001. OSHA has said since 1996 that it was a priority to regulate silica.

Unions, employer groups, and safety and health professionals formed a committee in 2002 to examine whether the timeliness of exposure standards could be improved by action in Congress.

"We made some progress, but after a while we ran out of gas, I guess," said Frank White , senior vice president of ORC Worldwide , a management consulting firm in Washington, and a participant in the talks. The group sensed a lack of interest on the part of OSHA and Congress.

Perhaps the recent accommodation between one industry group and union on the hex chromium rule points the way to more bite-size progress on chemical-exposure standards, White suggested. Maybe OSHA could try proposing 20 at a time.

In Maine, A Public Park In Search Of Public Support (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

MILLINOCKET, Me., Nov. 1 — Roxanne Quimby could be forgiven if she thought she was emulating the likes of Henry David Thoreau, Percival P. Baxter, John D. Rockefeller Jr. and other lovers of Maine's landscape when she started to buy bits of the vast northern woodlands near here to be the core of a new national park.

Who knew that when she began using some of the fortune she had earned from her organic personal-care business, Burt's Bees, to buy up woods to preserve, she would be greeted with "Ban Roxanne" T-shirts? Or, that her efforts at preservation — banning snowmobiling, hunting and all-terrain vehicles on 50,000 of her acres — would be taken as an attack on the old-time values of the timberland?

Who knew that even some conservation-minded groups would be reluctant to support the decade-old vision of a national park that had inspired Ms. Quimby?

Still, one might have guessed, looking at the streets of this town of 4,700 people, where hunter's blaze orange is the fall fashion statement of choice during this month's deer hunting season.

Millinocket residents fear that turning timberland into parkland will further cut timber jobs, strip them of their accustomed hunting grounds and prevent the development of resorts and snowmobile parks they see as one way out of the downward economic spiral.

"What Roxanne and the others want to do, they want to create a park up here the size of Connecticut and take it out of the heartland of the Maine forest," Eugene Conlogue, the town's manager, said in an interview. "That's a nonstarter for us."

Other environmental groups, while sympathetic to the idea of a national park, see it as an unwelcome distraction from their fight to block a proposed 420,000-acre resort development that the Plum Creek Timber Company has unveiled for Moosehead Lake, just west of here.

As Brownie Carson, executive director of the Natural Resources Council of Maine, said, "You can't pour energy into protection of a single area, even though it's large and hugely important, without risking losses, big losses, in other really important areas of Maine's North Woods forest."

Thirty years ago, Ms. Quimby was living a subsistence counterculture life in the North Woods. After building her financial empire, she was taken with an idea conceived a decade ago by Jym St. Pierre and other local conservationists for a Maine Woods National Park that would envelop Baxter State Park, in the conservation equivalent of Russian nesting dolls. The new park would be the size of Yellowstone and Yosemite combined.

"I find it pretty ironic, or humorous, that people make a national park out to be such a radical idea," said Ken Spalding, the project coordinator for the moving force behind the park, Restore, a group with offices in Hallowell and in Concord, Mass. "American people love their national parks."

Ms. Quimby, 56, hopes Mr. Spalding and Restore's director, Mr. St. Pierre, are right. The idea of a park, she said, "floats my boat."

She prefers that her 75,000 acres become a base on which Restore's 3.2-million acre park could be built.

DOJ_NMG_0091658

But in the past few weeks, she has started to explore conservation alternatives and has met with her opponents to see if her goals to bring the northlands back to their pre-logging state can be reconciled with their goals of finding economic value and personal freedom in the same woods.

In the last six years, more than six million acres of timber company land have changed hands. Timber companies have come and gone like truckers at a roadside stop.

"What has happened over the years," Ms. Quimby said, "is that there were very few landowners and they had a very permissive policy toward land use as long as you stayed out of the way of the logging operation. So people had this unrestricted access."

"So now that the ownership is changing," she said, "it's becoming quite clear that this is private property. And as a private property owner I don't have to let anybody on it."

That, she added, "is becoming the alternative to public land."

When Ms. Quimby banned snowmobiling and hunting and all-terrain vehicles from the first two tracts she bought, which totaled more than 50,000 acres, the "ban Roxanne" cries were heard everywhere here. When she bought her third tract, 23,000 acres, earlier this fall, adjacent to the critical parcel in a state-brokered deal to expand Baxter park, opponents erupted again.

This time, Ms. Quimby sat down and met with them and made a deal. For at least a year, snowmobiles and hunters could continue to use the new purchase, called Sandy Stream. In the meantime, the competing visions of the North Woods' future could be debated with less pressure.

"Mainers are more individualistic." she said. "They're used to having more space about them. They are very self-sufficient, including in the way they think about things."

It is not clear whether Ms. Quimby's efforts at appeasement will beget a more conciliatory attitude to other conservation deals, particularly the not-yet-completed purchase of land around Katahdin Lake. This is a place whose haunting views of Maine's largest mountain, have been a magnet for American landscape painters, from Frederic Church on.

Patrick McGowan, the commissioner of Maine's Department of Conservation, has spent months trying to put all the pieces in place to add 6,000 acres to the eastern side of the 204,800-acre Baxter State Park, ensuring that Katahdin Lake, the artists' beaches and the surrounding woodlands would be preserved. The deal was buffeted on its way through the Maine Legislature, but survived, with two provisos.

Mr. McGowan, aided by the nonprofit conservation group, The Trust for Public Lands, had to get $14 million in private donations to complete the purchase. Facing a Dec. 15 deadline, he is more than $3 million shy of the goal. The Trust is organizing fund-raising events, and artists like Evelyn Dunphy are donating canvases of Katahdin.

The second proviso was that one-third of the new parkland— though not the area around lake — had to be open to "traditional" uses like hunting and snowmobiling.

That deal was barely done when Ms. Quimby announced the purchase of her latest, 23,000 acre, tract from a local logging operator.

Hunters saw the Quimby announcement as a double blow. They were losing access to 23,000 acres, and those acres were the main way in to the 2,000 acres of proposed parkland set aside for them.

"Everybody perceived this as a threat," said Bob Cram, a local hunter and a director of the statewide hunters' group, the Sportsmen's Alliance of Maine. "I did, too."

How Ms. Quimby's talks with the hunters' groups will change the landscape is unknown. Acadia and Baxter parks faced opposition before their creation. It took decades to assemble the land and gain legislative approval. Mr. Spalding, of Restore, said: "The opposition is very much a minority. It is clear that the Maine public, statewide, overwhelmingly supports the acquisition of more public land for conservation."

For the moment, the conservation will likely continue to be ad hoc, with individuals like Ms. Quimby, groups like the Appalachian Mountain Trail Club and state-private partnerships raising the money for individual tracts. These might be combined in a national park, a national forest or a state preserve. They might also remain private, part of a checkerboard of conservation areas and resort development.

A national park, Ms. Quimby said, is not the only solution. "I think a national forest is a possibility, like the White Mountain National Forest," she said. "It has much broader usage."

"Everyone has to give up something in a compromise," she said. "But you get your most important things if it's a good compromise."

Female Leader Would Be First For Navajos (WP)

By Felicia Fonseca

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091659

WINDOW ROCK, Ariz., Nov. 6 -- One candidate in Tuesday's Navajo Nation presidential election promises accountability and staunch protection of tribal land. The other vows to build on the reservation's economic progress in the past four years.

But in the race between incumbent Joe Shirley Jr. and challenger Lynda Lovejoy, the overriding issue is sex.

A win would make Lovejoy the first female leader on the largest Indian reservation in the United States, which extends into New Mexico, Arizona and Utah.

"She is a woman, and that is going to be an issue no matter what her stance on policy," said Dale Mason, an associate professor of political science at the University of New Mexico at Gallup. "She represents something entirely new."

Lovejoy, a former New Mexico state lawmaker and current member of the Public Regulation Commission, hopes to unseat Shirley, 58, a former tribal council delegate who has been leading the tribe for four years.

"I can't control people making their decision to vote for me because I'm a woman," she said. "I certainly appreciate and welcome that. Any vote is important to winning this ticket on November 7."

Shirley, who has focused on economic development in his campaign for reelection, acknowledges some people will vote based on sex, but he says he is hopeful that most won't.

Some traditional Navajos believe that women and men have distinct roles in society -- women as caretakers of the home and of children, and men as providers and leaders, said Tommy Begay, a Navajo and University of Arizona doctoral student who is studying the evolution of cultures.

Although Navajo is a matriarchal society, traditional Navajos will probably stick to the belief that only men should serve as president, Begay said.

"When you live your life in a very traditional way, the beliefs really dictate your action," Begay said. "They become sort of the boundaries of existence."

Less traditional Navajos either have not been taught those beliefs, dismiss them, or have a hard time maintaining them because of the dominant society's influence, Begay said.

Lovejoy has based her campaign on ensuring an open and accountable government, creating jobs, protecting land and natural resources, and cutting unnecessary spending.

Shirley often participates in sweat lodges, where he says he learns songs about the tribe's religion and culture and also draws inspiration from the elders as they talk about how to regain the tribe's economic independence.

Many Navajos are poor, and unemployment hovers around 50 percent.

Shirley has been pushing projects that include the coal-fired Desert Rock Power Plant and the construction of six casinos. The first could be built next year, he said.

The president said those projects would bring in thousands of jobs and provide tribal members with basic necessities -- a home, transportation and income.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit FBI Chief Earns A Promotion (DEN)

Detroit News, November 7, 2006

Special agent will help lead criminal division, which handles everything but terror-related cases.

WASHINGTON -- The special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI has been promoted to a top job overseeing criminal investigations nationwide.

Michigan native Daniel D. Roberts, who has led the Detroit field office of the FBI since July 2004, will become the deputy assistant director of the FBI's criminal division in Washington. The criminal division oversees all investigations except terror-related cases, which are handled out of a separate division.

The criminal division handles public corruption; organized crime; financial crime, including corporate fraud and health care fraud; violent crime; gangs; and civil rights violations. It also is involved in many of the most high-profile investigations -- like the numerous investigations into congressional corruption.

In an interview Monday, Roberts said he would start his new job -- his fourth in Washington -- by Jan. 1.

"I would have loved to stay here, but I am looking forward to the new challenge," Roberts said, calling the job "a natural fit."

He said he wasn't looking forward to uprooting his family again, finding a buyer for his Oakland County home or facing the high cost of living in Washington.

Last month, FBI director Robert Mueller asked Roberts to take the new job; his replacement will come from outside Detroit, as is standard policy.

DOJ_NMG_0091660

The FBI is in the process of filling many jobs at FBI headquarters and reshuffling the top agents at the nation's 56 field offices. The top agents in Kansas, Cleveland, Boston, Knoxville and Oklahoma City have been moved in recent months.

Roberts said he was most proud of his office's handling of many special events without incident -- from last month's World Series to Super Bowl XL in February -- not to mention the NBA Finals, 2004 Ryder Cup and 2005 Major League Baseball All Star Game.

"These are huge challenges when you're talking about getting multiple agencies to the table and coordinating a lot of resources," Roberts said, praising the cooperation between the dozens of agencies involved.

Roberts said he was proud that there haven't been any terror incidents in Detroit under his watch.

Roberts, 46, who grew up in Franklin and is a former Franklin and Oak Park police officer, graduated from Groves High School in Birmingham.Roberts' 19-year FBI career has had many highlights. In 2002, he was in the spotlight as acting special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City bureau during the first few weeks of the Elizabeth Smart disappearance and he also oversaw the FBI's role in security at the 2002 Salt Lake Olympics.

Roberts' most visible assignment in Detroit came when the FBI began digging for the remains of former Teamsters President James. R. Hoffa in May at a Milford horse farm -- a search that prompted intense international coverage. A day after U.S. Rep. Joe Knollenberg, R-Bloomfield Township, was quoted questioning the cost of the search, the two-week dig was called off. Roberts defended the cost. "Dan's a consummate professional," U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy III in Detroit said. "He's an excellent law enforcement leader with great judgment and it's been a real honor to work with him."

Roberts made it a priority to recruit FBI agents to the Detroit office, making the pitch that the area gets an unfair rap, and also got funding to boost the size of the office, which is the 11th largest U.S. FBI field office.

Detroit FBI Chief Promoted To Post In Washington (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DETROIT (AP) — The special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI has been promoted to a job overseeing nationwide criminal investigations in Washington.

Detroit native Daniel D. Roberts, 46, will become the deputy assistant director of the FBI's criminal division Jan. 1. He has led the Detroit field office since July 2004.

Roberts joined the FBI in 1987 and was assigned first to Chicago, as a SWAT team member and later as a supervisory agent directing the city's joint task force on gangs. Following a stint as chief of the violent crimes/fugitive unit at FBI headquarters, he served as an assistant special agent in charge in Salt Lake City, where he helped oversee security during the 2002 Winter Olympics.

He got his start as a police officer in suburban Franklin and also worked in the Oak Park Police Department in the 1980s.

"I would have loved to stay here, but I am looking forward to the new challenge," Roberts told The Detroit News for a story Tuesday.

Roberts presided over the search earlier this year at an Oakland County farm for the remains of former Teamsters President Jimmy Hoffa. He said he's most proud of his office's handling of several high-profile, incident-free events in Detroit such as last month's World Series and Super Bowl XL in February.

His replacement will come from outside Detroit.

Five Indicted On Cocaine Charges (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 7, 2006

FORT PIERCE — A federal grand jury has formally charged five people with conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine in a drug case spawned by an investigation into the killing of a family found shot to death last month on the side of Florida's Turnpike.

Investigators say four of the West Palm Beach-area residents indicted in the federal drug case are connected to the Oct. 13 slaying of the Escobedo family on the side of the highway in Port St. Lucie - though no one has been charged in the homicides. The federal indictment was issued Friday by a grand jury in West Palm Beach and made public during a court hearing Monday morning in Fort Pierce.

Also released Monday were dozens of photographs investigators took inside the West Palm Beach home where the five defendants were arrested on Oct. 26. These photos show bags of cocaine, a 50 -gram "crack cookie," guns including an assault rifle, cash hidden inside a shoe, translucent plastic masks, black wigs and black ski masks.

One photo shows 18-year-old defendant Liana Lopez's student ID card for John I. Leonard High. That ID, along with her driver license, was sitting next to a Chanel makeup bag inside the house at 6458 Garden Court, in the gated Briar Bay community.

DOJ_NMG_0091661

On Monday, another of the five defendants, Ricardo Sanchez Jr., was led by U.S. marshals into the federal courthouse in Fort Pierce where family members and friends packed one row in a courtroom to watch his attorney ask that he be released on bond.

Defense attorney Michael Cohen argued Sanchez, 23, has lived in Palm Beach County for more than a decade and has a wife and 3-year-old child.

"He apparently has an extensive family network in Palm Beach County," Cohen argued.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Ann Vitunac, however, said Sanchez was a flight risk and danger to the community and ordered he be held in jail without bail. Sanchez also pleaded not guilty to the indictment's single count of conspiracy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack cocaine.

Afterward, Sanchez's family declined to comment. No information about the homicide investigation was released during the hearing, and Cohen said he has not heard anything official about that investigation.

"I have no knowledge of him being involved," Cohen said of Sanchez.

Suspected drug ledgers and notebooks found in the Greenacres home where Jose Luis Escobedo Jr., 28, his wife, Yessica, 24, and sons Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3, lived before they were killed led investigators to the defendants now being held on drug charges. Investigators believe Escobedo was involved with cocaine trafficking, and items found in his home link him to Sanchez and defendants Daniel Troya, 23, Danny Varela, 26 and Lopez. Drug defendant Jose Gutierrez, 20, is not connected to the killings, officials say.

A federal magistrate on Friday denied Troya and Varela's requests for bond. The drug charges carry a maximum sentence of 10 years to life in prison.

Bond hearings for Lopez and Gutierrez have not been scheduled.

Grand Jury Indicts Four In Escobedo Case (STCN)

Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers, November 7, 2006

FORT PIERCE — All four people described as "persons of interest" in the Escobedo family killings have been indicted on federal drug charges, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Monday.

Daniel Troya, 23, Daniel Varela, 26, Ricardo Sanchez, 23 and Liana Lopez, 18, were indicted by a grand jury in West Palm Beach on Friday on a single count each of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute crack cocaine, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Steve Carlton.

The charge carries a punishment of 10 years to life in prison and a fine up to $4 million.

The four also are suspected of being linked to the deaths of Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, his wife Yessica, 25, and their two sons, Luis Damien, 4, and Luis Julian, 3, whose bodies were found on the side of Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie on Oct. 13.

No one has been charged in the killings, which authorities say were related to the theft of drugs and money.

A fifth man who is not linked to the homicide investigation also was indicted as part of the drug case.

All five charged in the drug investigation lived together in a sparsely furnished home in a gated community in West Palm Beach, where most of the bedrooms had only mattresses on the floor. Carlton said masks, wigs, gloves and handcuffs were found in a bedroom shared by Varela and Lopez that were believed to have been used in "drug rip-offs."

Troya and Varela were denied bail last week after being deemed dangerous to the community and flight risks. Sanchez went before a magistrate Monday and pleaded not guilty. He also was ordered held without bail.

Sanchez and Troya have been identified as the suspected gunmen, according to WPTV NewsChannel 5, which cited "reliable sources" in its report.

"I have no knowledge of him being involved," said Sanchez's attorney, Michael Cohen. "I've heard speculation, that's all."

Investigators were led to the drug operation by apparent references to several of the defendants in ledgers found in the Escobedo home, which recorded payments next to names, according to court records. Agents who raided the West Palm Beach home found a powder and crack cocaine, Ecstasy pills and guns.

In Sanchez's room, investigators found about half an ounce of cocaine powder. A crack cocaine "cookie," a large, round piece that is broken up into smaller pieces for sale, was found in a kitchen drawer in the house, along with wrapping material to pack cocaine, Carlton said.

Man Thought Connected To Turnpike Killings Denied Bond (AP)

AP, November 6, 2006

FORT PIERCE, Fla. - A federal magistrate denied bond Monday for a man considered a person of interest in the killings of a family of four found along Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie.

DOJ_NMG_0091662

Ricardo Sanchez, 23, of suburban West Palm Beach, was arrested Oct. 26 on cocaine charges with four others. Police believe four of the five people arrested that same day are connected to the slayings of the family.

Sanchez also Monday entered a plea of not guilty on a charge of participating in a drug conspiracy, Michael Bruce Cohen, his attorney, said.

"It's very early on in the case. I really have no other information," Cohen said.

Two men arrested with Sanchez, Daniel Troya, 23, and Danny Varela, 26, were denied bond Friday. Two others, Liana Lopez, 18, and Jose Gutierrez, 20, have not had their bond hearings.

Lopez is considered a person of interest in the slayings, but police do not believe that Gutierrez had any connection to them.

All five are being held on drug charges. A federal grand jury in West Palm Beach on Friday indicted all five on one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. The charge carries a maximum penalty of 10 years to life in prison.

Killed in the Oct. 13 slaying were Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, his wife Yessica, 25, and their sons Luis Damian, 3 and Luis Julian, 4. The family was found shot to death. They had been living in Greenacres.

Medical Marijuana Remains In Legal Limbo (SDUT)

By Jeff Mcdonald, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 6, 2006

Prop. 215 approved by voters decade ago

Paul Cody has titanium rods jutting up either side of his spine. Without them, he couldn't sit upright in his wheelchair.

Over the years, doctors prescribed Vicodin, Valium and a medicine chest of other drugs to soothe his constant pain, but the narcotics killed his appetite and kept him awake at night. Until he started smoking marijuana, Cody could barely sit still for a movie.

Ten years ago, 56 percent of California voters decided that people with medical problems like Cody's should be able to grow and smoke marijuana on their physician's recommendation.

But the potential of Proposition 215, which conflicts squarely with federal laws that classify marijuana among the most dangerous drugs, has never been realized.

Thousands of California patients have no legal access to medical marijuana. Thousands of others worry they may be found out and arrested for cultivating too many plants or storing too much dried pot, because most cities and counties haven't passed the laws needed to regulate the dispensation of marijuana used for medical purposes.

Unscrupulous and profit-minded dispensary operators have taken advantage of the absence of uniform rules, opening storefronts anywhere they can and selling marijuana to unqualified patients.

Two years ago, drug agents raided Cody's house in Jamul and uprooted his tiny garden.

“They took 'em – three lousy plants,” said Cody, 32, who was paralyzed in a 1991 motorcycle crash. This year, he harvested his modest crop weeks before it matured for fear of losing it to another bust.

It was no secret that most of the law enforcement community opposed the medical use of marijuana when the issue landed on the state ballot in 1996.

Lesser known, however, is the detailed and coordinated assault many federal, state and local officials conducted once it passed.

In the past decade, police departments in dozens of California cities have joined federal drug agents in more than 100 raids on medical marijuana farms, cooperatives and dispensaries.

After a July sweep across San Diego County, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and San Diego County District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis used a news conference to issue a warning to dispensary operators: Close or face the consequences. They all closed, and the local marketplace for medical marijuana dried up almost overnight.

Three San Diego County supervisors are so strongly opposed to Proposition 215 that they voted to sue the state to try to overturn medical marijuana laws rather than implement them. Oral arguments in the case, which was driven by Supervisors Bill Horn, Dianne Jacob and Pam Slater-Price, are scheduled to begin this month.

Ten states have joined California in passing medical marijuana legislation, and public opinion polls show that respondents favor medical use of marijuana by 3 to 1.

Yet no one has come up with a way to resolve the impasse between states and the federal government, which can impose criminal penalties for what the states have made legal.

“It's a study in politicians evading the will of voters, which they do not agree with,” said Mark Bluemel, an attorney who has defended medical marijuana patients. “We have San Diego being among some rogue counties that refuse to obey this law.”

But Horn, chairman of the county Board of Supervisors, said the state has put cities and counties in an impossible position.

DOJ_NMG_0091663

“I'm not going to enact a state law that's in violation of federal law until I hear from a judge that it's legal,” he said. “I'm not necessarily challenging the will of the people.”

State politicians also contributed to the failure to implement Proposition 215. It took seven years to get clarifying legislation through the statehouse and signed into law by the governor.

When Senate Bill 420 finally went into effect on Jan. 1, 2004, it established statewide guidelines outlining the number of marijuana plants a patient could legally grow and directed county health departments to issue identification to qualified patients so police would know when drug use was legitimate and when it was being abused.

But by a measure of nearly 4 to 1, California cities have chosen to outlaw pot dispensaries rather than to regulate them. In communities such as San Francisco, Santa Rosa and Santa Cruz, which have all embraced Proposition 215, elected leaders say the dispensary model has worked fairly well.

Government officials didn't waste any time reacting to the passage of Proposition 215.

Hours after polls closed Nov. 5, 1996, former state Attorney General Dan Lungren, now a congressman from Gold River in Northern California, sent a memo to every district attorney, sheriff and police chief across the state.

The three-page letter laid out what would become the standard for dealing with Proposition 215. It advised police and prosecutors to judge marijuana cases on the basis of whether suspects could reasonably cite medical need as a defense at trial – a legal position called an affirmative defense – rather than simply letting them go if their paperwork was in order.

“We were confronted with both the underlying law (prohibiting marijuana) and the proposition,” Lungren said in a recent telephone interview. “We were trying to inform law enforcement officers what would be proper conduct.”

Two weeks later, Lungren and the attorney general of Arizona, which had also passed a medical marijuana initiative, warned their counterparts across the country to be wary of the rising medical marijuana movement.

On Dec. 6, local, state and federal officials convened a strategy session in Washington to deal with the Arizona and California propositions. The meeting focused on ways to undermine the voter-approved initiative, including going after physicians who recommended the drug, establishing a national group to fight legalization of marijuana and calling a special election to repeal the law in California.

Records of the session contend that medical marijuana supporters seek to “legitimize illicit drug use through 'medicalization' approach” and take the effort nationwide.

Three days later, another memo from Lungren's office to federal drug enforcement officials clarified that local police officers could arrest people suspected of breaking federal law.

Medical marijuana proponents complain that government officials deliberately undercut Proposition 215 as soon as it passed.

“Once they came up with affirmative defense as a legal interpretation, it was game, set and match,” said Patrick McCartney, a medical marijuana activist and freelance journalist who has compiled an extensive history on the government response to the growing political movement.

“If law enforcement who were so inclined could arrest and prosecute qualified medical marijuana users, then what did voters vote on?” McCartney wondered.

Legal scholars question the federal government's role in medical marijuana debates within individual states. Several believe U.S. drug agents should enforce federal laws but also respect state rights.

However, the Drug Enforcement Administration has recruited local agencies to join task forces that continue to raid dispensaries and cooperatives.

“The California medical marijuana law created an exception to California law, but could not do so for federal law,” said Erwin Chemerinsky, a constitutional law professor at Duke University. “I wish federal authorities would use their discretion to respect the California initiative, but they clearly have not done so.”

Gerald Uelman is a Santa Clara University law professor who is awaiting an appellate decision on a medical marijuana lawsuit he is fighting on behalf of the city and county of Santa Cruz. Those two governments have led many of the efforts to implement Proposition 215.

Uelman said federal authorities “crossed the line in their effort to impose their agenda” on state officials.

“This is still an issue where the politicians are behind the curve, in terms of the will of the voters,” he said. “That's true across the board, not just in California.”

Jessica Reeves lives in a Hillcrest studio and usually relies on friends to get the marijuana she needs to relieve her constant pain. Sometimes she drives to dispensaries in Riverside County or in Los Angeles that have not yet been raided.

Two years ago, the 29-year-old medical assistant contracted necrotizing fasciitis, the flesh-eating bacteria. Doctors saved her life, but she lost much of her right arm.

Nineteen operations later, Reeves said smoking pot is the only thing that helps her live a near-to-normal life.

DOJ_NMG_0091664

"When I turned 18, I voted for Proposition 215," she said. "I didn't know 10 years later that I would need it. Now I can't get it because they closed all the dispensaries down."

Ex-gang Member In Jail For Drugs (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 7, 2006

Bailey barely off parole for role in 5-year-old's drive-by death in 1996

Add one more to the growing list of gang members convicted in the drive-by shooting of a 5-year-old Lonsdale girl who are back in trouble with the law.

Jessie Rondale Bailey, 31, had been off the parole hook for his role in the May 1996 slaying of Brittany Shenice Daniels only a few months when he started racking up new charges.

But the stakes for Bailey got a sudden boost last week with his arrest on a federal indictment alleging four drug sales, including two involving more than 50 grams of crack cocaine.

He faces a minimum 20-year prison term and as much as life if convicted.

Bailey appeared before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton on Monday on that indictment. Noting Bailey's prior murder conviction, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck asked Guyton to keep Bailey behind bars pending a trial.

Defense attorney Phil Lomonaco did not disagree, and Guyton approved Winck's request.

Bailey's criminal woes are not limited to federal court. He faces four counts of aggravated assault in Knox County General Sessions Court and has drug charges pending before a Knox County grand jury.

In the aggravated assault cases, Bailey is accused of threatening three women and a baby with a gun on Aug. 26.

"(Bailey) pointed a big gun with a curved ammo clip towards the victims, one of whom was holding her 6-month-old son, and yelled, 'This is my block,' placing the victims in fear of death or serious injury," the warrant stated.

Knoxville Police Department officer Rachel Bachorek and others responded to the corner at the intersection of Martin Luther King Jr. Avenue and Chestnut Street, but Bailey allegedly fled.

Bachorek wrote in a separate warrant that she found six Ecstasy pills in Bailey's ashtray when she finally stopped him.

Bailey was convicted in 1999 of facilitation to commit second-degree murder in the gang-related drive-by shooting death of Brittany, who was playing on a sidewalk in Lonsdale when three carloads of East Side gang members opened fire on a courtyard crowded with people.

He also racked up a felony drug conviction. He got a package plea deal, ordered to serve eight years for both crimes. With jail credits, he was freed after having served about a third of that time, records show.

He began racking up new charges last year, records show. KPD officers Doyle Lee, Donald Scott Clark and Sgt. John D. Shelton nabbed him in July 2005 with 222 Xanax pills and 325 Soma pills in his possession, warrants allege.

Then, in April, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Todd Lee and KPD officer Bruce Conkey began building a federal drug case against Bailey, records show.

The federal indictment alleges Bailey sold cocaine on April 26. Two days later, he allegedly sold more than 50 grams of crack, the indictment alleges. On May 2, he again sold more than 50 grams, then another five grams or more the following day, the indictment alleges.

He joins former East Side gang members Melvin "Little Melvin" Davis and Robert D. Campbell as participants in the fatal drive-by who have wound up back in trouble.

Lopez 'ashamed' Of Schwartz Case Role (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, November 7, 2006

A former Pima County prosecutor who was once engaged to former murder suspect Bradley Schwartz says no words are adequate to describe how "remorseful, ashamed and embarrassed" she is about the events leading up to her possible disbarment.

Last November, the State Bar of Arizona filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez, 38, saying she had engaged in criminal conduct that "reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects."

The bar alleges Lopez not only was indicted in September 2002 on prescription drug fraud charges along with Schwartz, but she continued having a relationship with Schwartz despite being ordered not to, and lied about it.

Schwartz is now serving a life sentence for conspiracy to commit murder in the October 2004 slaying of his former medical associate, Dr. David Brian Stidham.

DOJ_NMG_0091665

Monday was the first day of a two-day hearing before Bruce G. Macdonald, a hearing master who must file a report with the Arizona Supreme Court's Disciplinary Commission. Macdonald will decide if the complaint against Lopez is valid and, if necessary, what punishment is appropriate.

At best, Lopez could be placed in a diversion program or on probation. At worst, she could be disbarred.

Lopez, who now works as a defense attorney, told Macdonald that although she believes all lawyers should conduct themselves with the "highest degree of integrity," she also believes a distinction should be made between mistakes made in one's personal life and those made in one's professional life.

"I will agree I've done things in my personal life that I'm ashamed of, but I've always tried to conduct myself in my professional life in a way that I can be proud of," Lopez said.

The mistakes she's made have "nothing to do with" helping her clients or her respect for the criminal justice system, she said.

At the same time, Lopez said she wishes she had the words to express her deep remorse and shame.

"Anything I say would just fall short," she said.

Lopez admitted she allowed Schwartz to write two prescriptions for Vicodin in her name in the summer of 2001, and that she picked up one of the filled prescriptions — using her insurance to pay for it.

She further acknowledged that she lied to DEA agents about her relationship with Schwartz when they initially questioned her.

Lopez insisted that although she knew it was a crime to lie to the DEA, she didn't lie to protect her job or career.

Instead, she said, she lied to protect Schwartz.

It wasn't until May 2004 when they broke up for the last time, Lopez said, that she began to consider her needs above Schwartz's.

Schwartz and Lopez, who resigned from the Pima County Attorney's Office one month before being indicted, entered plea agreements with federal prosecutors to have the charges dismissed if they completed community service and stayed out of trouble.

Schwartz was arrested, accused of Stidham's murder, before he completed his diversion program — in part because Lopez went to the authorities to tell them Schwartz had often spoken of having Stidham killed.

The charges against Lopez were dismissed on Nov. 1, 2004, after she, her attorney and her pretrial services officer told U.S. Magistrate Judge Bernardo Velasco she had been fully compliant with everything that had been asked of her.

However, Lopez admitted Monday that was not true — she continued to see Schwartz during a 6 1/2-month time frame when she wasn't supposed to.

In fact, the couple got engaged two months before the "no contact" order was lifted.

State Bar attorney Bill Culbertson repeatedly asked Lopez how much contact she had with Schwartz during that time frame.

Lopez couldn't be specific, she said, but it was regular contact and included overnight visits and religion classes.

"Too much contact, sir — I don't know," Lopez said at one point.

Lopez also acknowledged it was during this time frame that Schwartz was "ranting and raving" about his desire to see Stidham dead.

During one conversation, Lopez admitted, she told Schwartz he shouldn't hire a drug addict to carry out the slaying because of the potential for blackmail.

Lopez insisted she was just trying to convince Schwartz how "ridiculous, outrageous and insane" the whole topic was.

When Culbertson asked Lopez if it was true she didn't call pretrial services about the threats, an emotional Lopez replied, "I could've phoned, faxed, said something in person or e-mailed, but I didn't do it and I should have, yes sir."

Under cross-examination by her attorney, Mark Harrison, Lopez said she and two friends discussed Schwartz's threats and discounted them.

"There was absolutely no way, absolutely no way on this Earth, those threats were going to come to fruition — they were just the ugly rant-ings of a man obsessed," Lopez said.

When pressed as to why she told Velasco — and later the State Bar — that she had been compliant with his orders when she had not been, Lopez said it didn't occur to her because eight months had passed since the order had been lifted.

In addition, it was a stressful time for her.

"I was thinking about the murder. Brad was in custody. I was thinking about how horrible the family must be feeling and I was thinking about finally being done with my community service and being able to move forward," Lopez said.

Harrison spent much of his cross-examination asking Lopez to describe her background, her relationship with Schwartz and how the events of the past few years have affected her life.

Lopez worked her way through college and the UA law school on scholarships, grants and loans, and is the sole support of her two children.

Since the bar complaint was filed, Lopez said, she has lost a defense contract with the county, a law partner and two-thirds of her business.

She's deeply in debt, getting psychiatric help and participating in the State Bar's Members Assistance Program, which helps lawyers deal with substance-abuse issues, stress, depression and family or money problems.

She's also being sued by Stidham's widow.

Lopez acknowledged she was arrested in July on suspicion of driving under the influence after a crash but said her doctor has told her she suffers from post-traumatic stress syndrome, not alcoholism.

Lopez said her doctor is working with her to address why she became so captivated by someone like Schwartz.

Lopez said she wasn't trying to shift the blame to Schwartz.

"I'm blaming myself for involving myself with someone like him," she said.

Culbertson is expected to wrap up his case with three law-enforcement officers. Harrison said he intends to call Velasco and Pima County Superior Court Judges Kenneth Lee and Michael Cruikshank.

Early Morning Detroit Blaze Destroys Businesses, Apartments (DEN)

By Oralandar Brand-Williams

Detroit News, November 7, 2006

DETROIT --The Detroit Fire Department is investigating a two-alarm fire that destroyed several businesses and apartments and produced more than a $1 million in damage near Lahser and Grand River on the city's northwest early Monday morning.

The National Response Team from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and ATF special agents from the Detroit Field Division were called in to assist the Detroit Fire and Arson Squad in their investigation, according to the ATF.

"We are involved because of the dollar amount of the fire. We don't look at this suspicious or not," said Vera Fedorak, an ATF spokeswoman in Detroit. "The Detroit Police Department asked us for assistance."

The blaze was reported by a resident around 1 a.m. The building contained four businesses and several store fronts that were unoccupied. Six apartments on the second floor of the building were occupied.

There was no deaths reported in the blaze.

You can reach Oralandar Brand-Williams at (313) 222-2027 or bwilliams@detnews.com. You can reach Oralandar Brand-Williams at (313) 222-2027 or bwilliams@detnews.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Paulson Adviser In Line For Treasury Position By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said he intends to nominate Anthony Ryan, a senior adviser to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, to serve as assistant secretary of the Treasury for financial markets.

Mr. Ryan, who was one of Mr. Paulson's first hires at Treasury, will have primary responsibility for managing Treasury's debt-market portfolio, such as the 30-year Treasury bond. The position has been vacant for a year since Timothy Bitsberger left to join mortgage giant Freddie Mac.

If confirmed, Mr. Ryan will help fill out Mr. Paulson's domestic finance team. Last month, Robert Steel, a former executive at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., was sworn in as Mr. Paulson's top financial-policy adviser. Also rounding out the group is Emil Henry, assistant secretary for financial institutions, who focuses on banking and insurance issues, as well as helping coordinate Treasury's hedge-fund review.

Mr. Ryan, 43 years old, has spent 20 years in the financial-services industry. Prior to joining Treasury, he was a partner at Grantham, Mayo, Van Otterloo & Co. LLC, a Boston-based investment firm that manages $121 billion for corporate clients, public entities, endowments and others.

Next Up: House Leader Races (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091667

While control of the House won't be determined until tonight at the earliest, contested leadership elections already are brewing on both sides of the aisle.

For the GOP, much of the current leadership's fate rests on today's outcome, as the chances of retaining their current posts become more vulnerable with each seat lost. Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio) are guaranteed a challenge, as are Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.).

House Democrats remain committed to holding their Caucus elections on Nov. 16, but House Republicans are increasingly likely to postpone their scheduled Nov. 15 elections even if they hold on to House control.

Here is the rundown of leadership races on both sides of the aisle:

Republicans

Speaker: If Republicans defy expectations and retain the majority, Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) has reiterated in recent weeks that he intends to run again for an unprecedented fifth term for the top job. Hastert is the longest serving Republican Speaker in history, and while he has been criticized by the rank and file for how he and his top aides managed the fallout from the scandal sparked by former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), he still enjoys a significant reservoir of goodwill from his colleagues.

However, long before the Foley story broke, an increasing number of House Republicans were doubtful that Hastert, who suffers from health problems including diabetes, would serve out a full Congress. Boehner is a likely candidate, but the Ohioan is seen as unlikely to mount a challenge to Hastert, rather waiting for him to exit the House on his own terms.

If Hastert opts to retire, the field could be wide open, with Boehner a likely frontrunner.

Majority/Minority Leader: If for no other reason than that he took over mid-Congress, Boehner is the most likely current Republican to stay in leadership in the 110th Congress.

Rank-and-file Members frequently have cited Boehner's February elevation to the post as the reason to give him another round at the leadership table. Affable and widely credited for shaking up the top-down leadership style trademarked by his predecessor Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Boehner is in a strong position to hold onto his job. Even in the minority, Boehner could be difficult to defeat, although he will be challenged for the post.

Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (Texas) is mulling a bid if Republicans lose the House. Similarly, Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), the chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, will run for Minority Leader only if Republicans lose the majority.

With the floodgates beginning to open, more Members with leadership ambitions could jump into the race, breaking the field wide open.

Majority/Minority Whip: No one has announced a bid against Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.), but most House Republican sources believe Blunt will be challenged regardless of what happens today. Blunt lost his bid for Majority Leader to Boehner earlier this year, and has largely kept his head down since, focusing on fundraising and maintaining the majority through a packed campaign schedule.

Blunt remains liked by his colleagues, and by most accounts he and Boehner have put rivalries aside, but he is viewed as vulnerable if the House Republican Conference pushes for more drastic shake-ups in the leadership slate. GOP Reps. Todd Tiahrt (Kan.), Mike Rogers (Mich.), Zach Wamp (Tenn.) and Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) announced earlier this year that they would run for the post if Blunt had been elected Leader.

All four Republicans continue to be seen as potential leadership candidates, but none have shown any indication they will run. House GOP sources also said Monday that Rep. John Shadegg (Ariz.), who also launched an unsuccessful bid for Majority Leader, is increasingly viewed as a potential Whip candidate if Republicans lose the majority. Cantor was the strong favorite in January, but House Republican sources doubt that Cantor would ever mount a direct challenge to Blunt, who has played a mentor role to the third-term Virginian.

If the field opens up, the popular Cantor could be recruited by his colleagues to step into this — or any other — leadership race.

Republican Conference chairman: Long before the House Republican majority was in doubt, it was clear that Conference Chairwoman Pryce would face a challenge for the 110th Congress. For now, Pryce has said she will run for the post again if she can survive today's challenge from Democratic candidate Mary Jo Kilroy, although some House Republicans are doubtful Pryce will run for the Conference position again.

Rep. Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.) has been plotting a bid for Conference chairman for the past several months and is increasingly viewed as the favorite in this race. Conference Vice Chairman Jack Kingston (Ga.) also is expected to attempt a step up the Conference ladder, and sources have suggested that House Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) also could make a bid.

DOJ_NMG_0091668

Republican Conference vice chairman: Rumored candidates to succeed Kingston include GOP Reps. Kay Granger (Texas) and Mark Kirk (Ill.). Conference Secretary John Doolittle (Calif.) could make a bid for a higher Conference position, but he is not viewed as a top-tier candidate in any race. Rep. John Carter (Texas) has been actively seeking the Conference secretary slot.

Win or lose the majority, the Conference team is expected to have an entirely new slate.

Republican Policy Committee chairman: Unless Putnam makes a bid for another leadership position, this will not be a competitive leadership race. Putnam has earned high marks from his colleagues, and he is another Republican regularly dubbed a rising star in the party.

If he wants to remain at the Policy Committee, he should be safe. If Putnam is out, Reps. Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.), Phil Gingrey (Ga.) and Darrell Issa (Calif.) are all potential contenders as they all waged bids earlier this year when Shadegg vacated the post to run for Majority Leader. House GOP sources also have said that Rep. Michael Burgess (Texas) is another Member to watch for this post.

National Republican Congressional Committee chairman: This leadership race has been well under way for most of the 109th Congress as current chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) is term-limited. Right now it is a three-man race, with Reps. Pete Sessions (Texas), Tom Cole (Okla.) and Phil English (Pa.) vying to head up the campaign committee as they head into a presidential election year. There is no clear favorite in the race.

Democrats

Speaker: Should Democrats win control of the chamber, it is widely expected that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) would be elevated to the Speaker's office, which would make her the first woman to hold the post.

Elections for the Speakership typically are ceremonial, with Members generally voting along party lines, but should Democrats hold only a slim majority in the chamber in January, the party's leadership may need to enforce unity among maverick Democrats to guarantee a victory. Candidates for the Speakership must receive a majority of the votes cast, which does not include absences or "present" votes, to win the post.

Majority/Minority Leader: A Democrat-run House would bring a simmering fight for the Majority Leader's office to a boil leading to the scheduled Nov. 16 leadership elections.

Although conventional wisdom gives Hoyer, as the party's current No. 2 leader, a claim to the Majority Leader's post, Rep. John Murtha (Pa.) surprised colleagues in June when he announced that he would also seek the office.

While Murtha shelved his public campaign within days — chastised by disgruntled Members who argued a divisive leadership race would distract the Caucus from the November elections — and Hoyer has remained reserved about his own ambitions, the would-be contest has continued as both lawmakers hit the road to campaign for fellow Democrats.

While the Maryland lawmaker, who has served as Whip since 2002, significantly out-paced Murtha in the final weeks, visiting 39 districts and raising his tally for the cycle to 80 districts in 32 states, Murtha has been credited with raising considerable funds for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee through a series of letters focused of his opposition to the Iraq War.

Hoyer also has contributed heavily to fellow Democrats, however, doling out more than $4.3 million to candidates and incumbents, as well as $3.8 million to the DCCC.

If Democrats don't take control of the House, it is unclear whether any lawmakers would challenge Pelosi for Minority Leader.

Majority/Minority Whip: Although Caucus Chairman Clyburn is the only candidate to announce his bid for the Majority Whip's office before Election Day, he's expected to have company in the race.

Among the potential contenders is DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who has said he will not seek another term in his current post.

While Clyburn already has begun rounding up support for the would-be race, Emanuel has refused to address his own aspirations, other than to state that he wants to spend more time with his young family, a proposition made difficult by the extensive travel required by his current DCCC post.

Nevertheless, the Illinois lawmaker is expected to seek a leadership office, and many Democrats have suggested he should be rewarded for his efforts if the party wins control of the chamber.

But should Emanuel opt for another post — or even rescind his decision and accept a second DCCC term — Rep. Diana DeGette (Colo.) could enter the race instead.

DeGette, the current Chief Deputy Minority Whip, has demurred from discussing a potential leadership bid.

If the GOP retains the House, Hoyer could try to stay in the Minority Whip post, though he might have to beat the above-mentioned candidates to do it.

DOJ_NMG_0091669

Democratic Caucus chairman: The House Democratic Caucus also would see leadership changes in a Democratic majority, with Rep. John Larson (Conn.), the current vice chairman, likely to ascend to the top post unopposed.

The Connecticut lawmaker won an unexpected victory earlier this year in a three-way contest, defeating Rep. Jan Schakowsky (Ill.) and Joe Crowley (N.Y.).

Democratic Caucus vice chairman: By contrast, the competition to fill a vacant vice chairmanship already has drawn a number of candidates, with more expected to enter the would-be race this week.

Rep. Xavier Becerra (Calif.) announced in late-July that he would campaign for the post, winning an endorsement from his fellow Hispanic Democrats and actively seeking support from other House lawmakers.

In addition, Rep. Mike Ross (Ark.) issued a letter in late-September expressing his interest in the post, while urging fellow Members not to commit to other candidates.

Also considered potential contenders are Crowley and Rep. Hilda Solis (Calif.), although neither has publicly declared their interest.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman: Although many House Democrats have said they would like to see the DCCC chairman retain his post for another cycle, Emanuel's declarations that he will retire from the campaign committee after one term has stirred the interest of a handful of would-be replacements.

Among the likely contenders — some who have even called for Emanuel to serve a second term, while none have acknowledged seeking the post themselves — are current DCCC lieutenants Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (Fla.), Chris Van Hollen (Md.) and Artur Davis (Ala.) as well as Rep. Kendrick Meek (Fla.), who chairs the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation.

Unlike other leadership posts, the DCCC chairmanship is an appointment made by Pelosi and is not subject to approval by the Caucus.

A Mess Of Spending Measures Awaits (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

Regardless of which party emerges victorious today, the current Republican majority still must find a way to fund the government, at least through the winter holidays, as well as finish other year-end business during the lame-duck session, which begins next week but is destined to last well into December.

In order to give themselves some breathing room after what is expected to be a bruising Election Day for the GOP, one of the first orders of business in both chambers next week is likely to be the passage of a continuing resolution that would allow Congress to punt the issue of fiscal 2007 appropriations until the first full week in December.

CRs keep the government running at current-year funding levels in the absence of new spending bills. As of now, nine of 11 spending bills have yet to be enacted, and the current CR expires Nov. 17.

"We just have limited time," House Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) said last week. "With elections late and Thanksgiving early, that only gives us one week for [internal] leadership elections, if that's when they occur. ... To me, it seems it may be time for a retrospective or introspective look."

GOP leaders plan to make at least a passing attempt to complete the remaining nine spending bills as stand-alone measures, rather than cobbling them together into a massive omnibus appropriations measure — a necessity if Congress wanted to finish up within one week.

But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) finally acknowledged last week that Congress will have to extend its lame-duck session into December after taking a two-week break for Thanksgiving. That gives Congress more time to take up at least a few more of those appropriations bills in regular order.

Indeed, the Senate plans to take up the military construction and Veterans' Affairs appropriations bill next week, Senate GOP aides say.

Senate passage of at least one more appropriations bill is necessary to create a vehicle for any omnibus bill, noted Frist budget aide Bill Hoagland. While the House has passed 10 of its appropriations bills, the Senate has passed only two — both of which were signed into law.

Hoagland said the Senate's spending bills are ready for floor action and that "with cooperation [from Democrats], I believe you could do at least three the first week back."

The Senate's lack of appropriations work so far this year caused Cantor to express skepticism that the two chambers can complete the remaining bills individually "in two to three weeks' time."

"The president has expressed strong interest in making sure we don't go the omnibus route. ... Easy for him to say," he said. "Is the Senate going to be able to go along with that? I mean, we're ready" on the House side.

DOJ_NMG_0091670

But Senate Republican aides predicted that if Democrats win control of the House, Republicans in that chamber may feel so demoralized that they'll want to punt all appropriations issues to the 110th Congress.

"It just depends on what kind of mood they'll be in," said Hoagland. "If the House is so dejected, ... you're probably talking about another CR" through next January.

Depending on the outcome of the elections today, Democrats could be emboldened by their expected gains in both chambers and make new demands on both spending bills and other measures, Republicans warned.

"If Democrats take over — God forbid — they're going to be so eager to put everything under their control that they're not going to want to do anything," predicted one Senate GOP leadership staffer.

Even if Democrats don't win control of at least one chamber, the current situation in the Senate still will make it difficult to move any legislation. "We are still in charge, but we don't have 60 votes," said the staffer. "Nothing that requires 60 votes will get done."

Neither chamber's Democrats have hinted about what they would or would not do in a lame-duck session.

Besides spending bills, Congress left town with a to-do list of other issues that won't necessarily change if control of either chamber flips from Republican to Democratic.

Those agenda items include extending several middle-class tax cuts that are set to expire at the end of the year, preventing a cut in Medicare physician payments from taking effect and renewing the business research and development tax cut.

All three items have bipartisan support in both chambers, but attempts to add more controversial measures to those "must-pass" bills could derail them.

"There will be plenty of things folks will want to do, but the system will only be able to stand so much," said one senior Senate GOP aide. "We'd still like to get it all wrapped up by Thanksgiving, but in the Senate, we are apprehensive about the appropriators and the House being able to get all the work done on time."

In addition, the Senate is looking at completing action on a Vietnam trade deal and a U.S.-India nuclear technology pact, the aide said.

Senate Republicans said they also may make another run at approving the controversial nomination of John Bolton to be United Nations ambassador. His consideration by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has been held up by embattled Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who is at serious risk of losing his re-election bid today.

Chafee has remained mum on his intentions on the Bolton nomination if he wins or loses, but Democrats on the panel have threatened to filibuster his nomination if it makes it to the Senate floor. Bolton's temporary appointment to the post expires at the beginning of the 110th Congress, which is set to start on Jan. 3, 2007.

Board Decision Makes It Clear: Hire The Vet (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

A federal board has reaffirmed the government's obligation to show a preference for military veterans in hiring, even when federal agencies use a special program designed to quickly fill jobs with applicants who have a high grade-point average.

The decision by the Merit Systems Protection Board, which hears appeals in federal personnel disputes, is a setback for the Outstanding Scholar program, which permits agencies to bypass regular civil service hiring procedures, and for the Office of Personnel Management, which had petitioned the board to reconsider its rulings from last year.

The dispute points up some of the underlying tensions in federal employment policies. Since at least the Civil War, Congress has shown its appreciation for military service by granting a hiring preference to veterans who seek civil service jobs. The government also has tried to provide remedies for racial discrimination, a goal of the Outstanding Scholar Program.

Kerry B. McTigue , general counsel at the OPM, said government lawyers are studying last month's decision and whether to file a federal court appeal.

The American Legion, a veterans service organization with 3 million members, welcomed the board's decision. "The American Legion doesn't want to see the veterans' preference laws ignored when federal agencies use special hiring procedures, such as the Outstanding Scholar program," said Peter Gaytan , director of veterans affairs and rehabilitation for the Legion.

As a general practice, veterans who meet minimum qualifications for a federal job have 5 or 10 points added to their numerical rating when competing for civil service positions.

But two veterans, David Dean and Matthew S. Olson , filed suits contending they were wrongfully passed over for jobs and that non-veterans were hired instead through the Outstanding Scholar program.

DOJ_NMG_0091671

The program, which permits agencies to use streamlined methods to hire applicants with high grade-point averages or class standing, was created as a supplemental hiring process as part of a 1981 consent decree known as Luevano.

The decree grew out of a civil lawsuit brought by a group of minority job applicants who contended that they failed a written civil service test because it was biased. In recent years, critics have faulted the Outstanding Scholar program for moving away from its original purpose and for not necessarily helping improve diversity in the federal workforce.

In its decision, the merit board said the program cannot be relied upon to avoid fair and open competition for federal jobs when veterans' rights are at stake.

"Luevano did not authorize use of the Outstanding Scholar program to override veterans' preference," the board decision said.Mark Your Calendars

Forums to help federal employees and retirees select a health-insurance plan to meet their needs will be held this month in Montgomery and Fairfax counties.

Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) are sponsoring the forums in cooperation with the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association.

Speakers will provide an overview of the 2007 Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which is open for enrollment Nov. 13 to Dec. 11. Representatives from health-insurance companies also will be on hand to answer questions.

The Van Hollen forums are scheduled for Monday, Nov. 13, 7:30 p.m. to 9 p.m., at the Universities at Shady Grove in Rockville, 9630 Gudelsky Dr., Building II; and for Tuesday, Nov. 14, 10 a.m. to 11:30 a.m., at the Holiday Park Senior Center in Wheaton, 3950 Ferrara Dr. For additional information, call 301-424-3501.

The Davis forum is scheduled for Wednesday, Nov. 29, 10 a.m. until noon at the Fairfax County Government Center, 12000 Government Center Pkwy., in Fairfax. For additional information, call 202-225-1492.

OTHER NEWS:

Greenspan Unconcerned About Housing (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan said yesterday that home sales and prices may continue to slide for some time, but the broader U.S. economy appears poised for a rebound.

"It looks as though the worst is behind us" in terms of the effect of the housing slump on economic growth, he told financial advisers at a conference in Washington organized by Schwab Institutional, a division of Charles Schwab & Co.

"We're obviously going through a significant slowing period, which as best as I can judge is quite likely to be temporary," said Greenspan, 80, who retired in January after more than 18 years leading the world's most influential central bank and whose words are still closely monitored in financial markets.

U.S. economic growth slowed sharply, to a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate, in the July through September period, largely because of a steep drop in home construction. Home sales and prices have also fallen recently in many markets.

Greenspan, a private consultant, said the housing downturn has "a way to go" before it hits bottom, but its effect on the rest of the economy should abate in the months ahead.

Other U.S. industries are enjoying healthy profits, consumer spending has remained solid and "the global economy is in extraordinarily good shape," he said. "Things don't look bad."

Greenspan made his comments during an hour-long question-and-answer session. Since leaving the Fed, he has created a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates LLC, started work on a memoir and made various appearances before paying audiences. During his last year as Fed chairman, Greenspan often said he did not see a national housing bubble, but rather "froth" in some markets. At the conference yesterday, however, he attributed much of the recent housing boom to a "speculative surge" caused by global financial conditions that pushed mortgage rates down to very low levels until the last year.

Greenspan said he could not predict when home sales would begin rising again or when home prices would stabilize. He said of prices, "it's hard for me to believe that they can stabilize at the level they are now because we had too much of a speculative surge. We have to lose some of that."

Greenspan said nothing about current Fed policy, but he defended the central bank's actions during his tenure, disagreeing with one former colleague about whether the Fed fueled speculative investment in housing by holding interest rates too low for too long in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0091672

The Fed cut its benchmark short-term rate from 6.5 percent at the beginning of 2001 to a four-decade low of 1 percent in mid-2003, providing cheap credit to support consumer spending through a recession and the initially weak recovery. The Fed held that rate steady until June 2004, before raising it steadily to 5.25 percent this past June.

Richard W. Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, said in a speech Thursday that because of faulty price data during this period, the Fed's benchmark short-term rate, adjusted for inflation, was cut to a level that "turned out to be lower than what was deemed appropriate at the time, and was held lower longer than it should have been."

The Fed's policy "amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets," Fisher said. Now, he added, the correction in the housing market is "inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country" and complicating the Fed's task of containing inflation.

Greenspan disputed such criticism, saying the recent housing boom resulted not from Fed cuts of short-term interest rates, but rather from global financial conditions that lowered long-term mortgage rates worldwide. "In retrospect, I know of nothing we would have done differently," Greenspan said of Fed policy during those years.

Greenspan also said globalization had helped dampen inflationary pressures during his years as Fed chairman, as low-wage workers in China, India and the former Soviet Union started providing low-cost goods and services to the world's market economies. But he said that transition "is a one-shot event, not a permanent change" that will hold down price pressures indefinitely.

Eventually, he said, inflationary pressures will revive, making life more difficult for his former colleagues at the Fed.

Several Signs Point Toward Robust Stock Resurgence (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK — Bolstered by a fresh wave of takeovers and buyouts, blue-chip stocks Monday snapped a six-session losing streak ahead of the midterm elections as investors grew confident that stocks still offer value.

News of deals in the hotel, restaurant, pharmaceutical and trucking sectors sparked a rally that sent the Dow Jones industrials soaring 120 points to 12,106.

The Dow's resurgence may be signaling that its recent slump was just a normal pause after a heady three-month rally that saw it crack its old record set in January 2000, top 12,000 for the first time and close at an all-time high of 12,163.66 on Oct. 26.

“The deals are telling us that investors still see real value in the market,” says Todd Leone, trader at Cowen & Co. “They've been a very big catalyst.”

The attention now turns to today's congressional elections, says Bruce Bittles, chief investment strategist at Robert W. Baird. Rather than emphasize the possibility that the market may be nearing a top, Wall Street has been more vocal in pointing out the reasons why stocks are likely to regain upward momentum.

·Election cycle is bullish. History shows that stocks tend to go up in the third year of the four-year presidential cycle, notes Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America. While he doesn't expect the broader market to post anything near the average returns of 23.1% it has in similar third years dating back to 1946, he still expects stocks to grind higher.

Even if the Democrats capture one chamber of Congress from the Republicans, stocks should still fare well, Quinlan says. “With no change at the White House, there is a feeling of predictability and continuity regarding Washington,” he says.

·A season for gains. Stocks have historically posted their best gains in the October through April period, notes Price Headley, chief analyst at BigTrends.com. Year-end portfolio rebalancing, new money inflows into 401(k)s and fresh cash invested by funds contribute to this seasonal phenomenon.

·Fear of selling too early. Bittles says money managers fear missing out on late-year gains. “The only thing that can really upset the market is if the economy tanks, and I don't see that,” he says.

Since the Dow's high, stocks have been buffeted by economic reports that could be signaling a sharper slowdown than expected. The government said third-quarter growth came in at a weaker-than-expected 1.6% annual rate. Wal-Mart, the nation's biggest retailer, warned that sales this month would be flat.

But investors have “a lot more confidence in the economy” than data and consumer confidence surveys show, says Howard Silverblatt, senior index analyst at Standard & Poor's. “Optimism is back,” he says.

Dow Industrials Rally 119.51 Points Before Election Investors Celebrate Conclusion Of Tumultuous Political Season, Hope 'Pricing In' Was Right By PETER A. MCKAY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

The stock market snapped a six-day losing streak as bargain hunters swooped in to buy shares. A spate of merger talks, a pullback in natural-gas prices and the approaching end of a tumultuous election season also raised investors' mood.

DOJ_NMG_0091673

The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 119.51 points, or 1%, to 12105.55, its biggest point and percentage gains in a month. In just one trading session, the blue-chip indicator recouped about two-thirds of its losses over the previous six days and now stands 13% higher on the year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 1.1%, or 15.48 points, to 1379.78, ending a three-day pullback up 10.5% on the year. And the Nasdaq Composite Index rose 1.5%, or 35.16 points, also its first gain after three days of losses, to 2365.95. It is up 7.3% on the year.

David P. Prokupek, chief executive of Geronimo Partners in Denver, said his asset-management firm lately has been unwinding bearish bets using options contracts that were intended to guard against losses in its stock portfolio. He said it was likely other Wall Street firms were doing the same yesterday, following a market pullback that represented exactly the sort of rainy day they had anticipated.

Mr. Prokupek said markets over the past several weeks have "priced in" expectations that the Democratic Party will gain a majority in the U.S. House of Representatives, while Republicans will retain control of the Senate in voting today. Any deviation from that scenario, however, could lead to a strong market reaction in the days ahead.

Companies in a number of industries, including health care, restaurants and gold mining, announced mergers. Such activity often puts investors in a good mood. Some start betting that other takeover targets might get snatched up; others broadly interpret risk-taking by deal-making executives as a cue to become more aggressive in their own investing.

Natural-gas prices were down because of unseasonably warm weather in much of the U.S. December futures fell 5%, the biggest drop since mid-October. Natural-gas contracts fell 39.4 cents to $7.49 per million British thermal units.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks and bonds rose. The 10-year note rose 2/32 point, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.711%. The 30-year bond rose 9/32 to yield 4.795%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.29 yen from 118.01 yen. The euro rose to $1.2723 from $1.2717.

Stocks Jump On Flurry Of Equity Buyouts (WP)

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 6 -- Wall Street roared back Monday, erasing last week's losses after private-equity buyout deals involving such companies as Four Seasons Hotels and OSI Restaurant Partners revived investors' belief that stocks still have room to run.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 119.51, or 1 percent, to 12,105.55, closing once again over the benchmark 12,000 level. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 15.48, or 1.13 percent, at 1379.78, and the Nasdaq composite index advanced 35.16, or 1.51 percent, to 2365.95.

The gains came a day ahead of the U.S. midterm elections, though the prospect of a power shift in Congress didn't seem to unnerve investors.

Investors shrugged off a moderate rise in the price of crude oil. Last week, a price increase prompted by attacks on facilities in Nigeria helped push stocks lower. Although those fears receded after the violence was less widespread than feared, an OPEC official said further production could be needed this year. Light, sweet crude was up 88 cents at $60.02 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The private equity deals announced Monday were worth about $20 billion. Interest in private equity has increased, with public companies facing higher costs for regulatory compliance. In addition, many private equity firms see opportunity in taking a company private, making changes and reaping the windfall if a company again goes public.Movers

Four Seasons increased $18.63, to $82.50, after the luxury hotel chain received an offer to be taken private for $3.7 billion.

OSI Restaurant , owner of chains such as Outback Steakhouse, rose $7.32, to $39.75, after agreeing to be acquired by a private investor group for about $3 billion.

Abbott Laboratories fell 17 cents, to $47.47, after agreeing to acquire Kos Pharmaceuticals for about $3.7 billion in a bid to expand its cholesterol drug holdings.

Kos surged $26.97, to $77.06.

XM Satellite Radio Holdings rose $1.78, to $13.17, after its third-quarter loss was narrower than expected.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 102.86, to 8819.62.

American Stock Exchange index rose 17.71, to 1992.07.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 10.35, to 763.08.Volume

NYSE: 2.53 billion shares, up from 2.44 billion on Friday. Advancers outnumbered decliners 3 to 1.

Nasdaq: 1.93 billion shares, up from 1.85 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 9 to 4.Commodities

DOJ_NMG_0091674

Crude oil for December delivery: $60.02, up 88 cents.
Gold for current delivery: $625.80 a troy ounce, down from $626.90 on Friday.

'Takeover Monday' Eases Slowdown Fears (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera In New York, Bernard Simon In Toronto And Roger Blitz In London
Financial Times, November 7, 2006

A takeover wave worth more than $15bn swept through global markets on Monday, boosting stock indices as big deals by investors such as Bill Gates and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts eased fears of a slowdown in merger activity.

The flurry of activity – dubbed "Takeover Monday" by analysts – was led by a $3.7bn bid by Mr Gates and Prince Alwaleed, the billionaire Saudi investor, for Four Seasons Hotels, the Canadian chain.

Other big deals – including a €4bn takeover by KKR and Goldman Sachs of the lift-truck unit of Germany's Linde and the $3.2bn sale of the OSI restaurant chain to Bain Capital and Catterton Partners – were led by private equity groups.

The main exception was a $3.7bn offer by Abbot Laboratories, the drugmaker, for Kos Pharmaceuticals, its rival.

The growing influence of buy-out funds, which have dominated recent activity thanks to their huge cash resources and favourable debt markets, has led to fears over the privatisation of large portions of the global economy and the amount of debt taken on by private equity groups.

But equity investors put those worries to one side and welcomed the raft of deals, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average 100 points higher to 12,105.55 – its biggest one-day rise in a month. The broader S&P 500 and the technology-focused Nasdaq index also rose more than 1 per cent.

The takeover offers for Four Seasons and OSI, owner of Outback steakhouses, were supported by the companies' managements and founders. The trend has marked much of recent buy-out activity, raising concerns among corporate governance experts that the interests of companies' managements might clash with shareholders' rights to get the highest possible price.

The proposed Four Seasons deal would trigger a $288m payment to Isadore Sharp, chairman and chief executive, who opened the first Four Seasons hotel in 1960. He said the deal would provide "continuity and stability for owners, customers and employees for the long term".

Prince Alwaleed and Mr Gates are already Four Seasons shareholders through their respective investment companies, Kingdom Hotels and Cascade Investment. Mr Sharp and his family control 65 per cent of the votes through multiple voting shares.

The two billionaires were reported by a Microsoft website monitor two years ago to have collaborated on plans to expand Microsoft's operation in Saudi Arabia and on Saudi humanitarian projects.

Mr Gates has hosted the prince at his Washington home, where they discussed shared investments such as Four Seasons.

The three groups have offered $82 cash for each limited voting share, or a 28.4 per cent premium over Friday's closing price. The shares, listed in Toronto and New York, rose about 30 per cent to slightly above the offer price.

Merger Market Arrives At 'good Spot' (USAT)

By Matt Krantz
USA Today, November 7, 2006

Monday looked like the day of the deal again, for this week at least, as a wave of mergers and acquisitions swept Wall Street, enveloping half a dozen U.S. companies.

Among the highlights, luxury hotel chain Four Seasons said it received an offer to be bought for $3.7 billion; Outback Steakhouse operator OSI Restaurants said it is selling itself for $3 billion; and biotech firm Kos said it agreed to a $3.7 billion takeover.

While none of those fall into the blockbuster category, they come on top of an avalanche of deals announced this year and virtually ensure that 2006 will be the busiest period for takeovers since the end of the '90s bull market.

Just four trading days into November, there have already been $28.3 billion worth of U.S. deals this month, bringing the tally of announced deals in 2006 to 9,461 worth $966.9 billion, says FactSet Mergerstat. That nearly tops all of last year, and you'd have to go all the way back to 2000 to find a busier year so far, Mergerstat says.

"The merger market is in a good spot right now," says Robert Filek of PricewaterhouseCoopers.

Monday's deals had a little bit of everything. Several were a continuation of the trend for companies to go private in the current version of what used to be known as leveraged buyouts. A private equity firm with Bill Gates as an investor offered to buy

DOJ_NMG_0091675

Four Seasons for $82 a share, sending the stock up 29% to $82.50. OSI saw its shares gain 23% to $39.75 on a $40-a-share offer from a private equity firm.

Many of the others, though, were takeovers for strategic reasons, such as Abbott Labs buying Kos in a deal worth $78 a share. Audio semiconductor maker PortalPlayer's shares fell 1 cent to $13.35 on news it is being bought by Nvidia for $357 million, or $13.50 a share. Swift Transportation stock jumped 24% to $29.84 after the trucking company said it received an offer to be bought by its former CEO for $2.2 billion, or $29 a share.

This is all part of a broader M&A boom this year in which:

·Private equity is playing a bigger role. Firms that buy public companies and take them private with hopes of selling them later at a profit accounted for a quarter of the deals based on dollar value, says Dealogic, up from 14% last year and just 3% in 2000.

·Megadeals are blooming. The number of buyouts valued at $1 billion or more has hit 174 this year, 5% more than all of 2005 and the most since 212 in all of 2000, says Mergerstat. "It's been the year people have decided if they're going to do a big deal, this is it," says Mergerstat's Kurt Kunert.

·Cash is swelling. Many of the buyouts are being done with cash: 70% of the 22 mergers announced around the globe Monday were for cash, says Sara Moeller, professor of finance at Wake Forest University. That's partly due to private equity firms, which pay cash, but it shows corporate buyers are confident the deals will succeed, she says.

·Banks are eager to lend. Only 1.7% of commercial loans were delinquent or charged off in the first quarter, says PricewaterhouseCoopers. That's below the 2% rate in first quarter of 2005 and well below the recent peak of 5.9% in the third quarter of 2002.

But as hectic as the recent merger activity is, it still falls short of the banner year of 2000. Merger activity tends to pick up when stocks rally, and it's unlikely that stocks will boom like they did in 2000, says Hemang Desai, professor of accounting at Southern Methodist University: "I can't imagine that kind of activity again."

Yellen: Income Gap Poses Risk (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 7, 2006

U.S. income inequality has risen to such a level that "there are signs that (it) is intensifying resistance to globalization, impairing social cohesion, and could, ultimately, undermine American democracy," San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank President Janet Yellen said Monday.

In language rare for a central bank official, Yellen suggested that high priority be given to improving education, tax credits and other aspects of the social safety net, despite the cost in dollars and possible impact on economic efficiency, according to the text of her lecture at the University of California, Irvine.

"Inequality has risen to the point that it seems to me worthwhile for the U.S. to seriously consider taking the risk of making our economy more rewarding for more of the people," Yellen said.

Separately Monday:

·Former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan said that while the housing market has not hit bottom, "The worst is behind us."

Greenspan also told a Washington meeting organized by financial services firm Charles Schwab that he is "reasonably confident" the nation will not slide into recession because businesses appear strong.

·Chicago Fed President Michael Moskow said inflation remains too high, even with slower economic growth, suggesting the Fed might have to raise rates again if price pressures do not moderate.

The Fed boosted short-term rates 17 times from mid-2004 to mid-2006. It has held rates at 5.25% since August. While the economy has slowed significantly, inflation is still running above the Fed's 1% to 2% comfort range.

Yellen's remarks focused on a longer-term economic trend: the growing U.S. income and wealth gap. She noted that during the past three decades, much of the gain from U.S. economic performance had gone to the people at the top of the income ladder.

From 1973 to 2005, real hourly wages of those in the highest 10% income bracket rose 30% or more, with big gains in the top 1%. Those in the bottom half of the scale saw 5% to 10% gains. The pattern altered a bit in the past decade, when people near the bottom actually saw faster gains than those in the middle, and the top continued to prosper.

Yellen attributed the growing gap to the higher premium for education, changes in technology and globalization. Controversies regarding executive pay "quite naturally raise concerns for the public and contribute to feelings of dissatisfaction," she said.

Yellen said inequality is higher in the USA than in other industrial nations and the safety net less generous.

DOJ_NMG_0091676

Bush Campaigns, Dems Assail Status Quo (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 7, 2006

On the eve of midterm elections, Democrats criticized Republicans as stewards of a stale status quo while President Bush declared, "we're closing strong" in a final drive to preserve GOP control of Congress.

"They can't run anything right," countered former President Clinton, taunting Republicans about the war in Iraq, the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and even the scandal involving the House page program that complicated GOP efforts to win two more years in power.

Bush campaigned on Monday from Florida to Arkansas and Texas. But the day brought one more reminder of his poor standing in the polls when Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist skipped the presidential rally in Pensacola, Fla., to make a speech of his own hundreds of miles away.

Bush made no mention of the evident snub in public, but not so his aides. "Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice, versus 8,000 or 9,000 people" expected for the president's speech, said Karl Rove, the White House's top political strategist.

Some late polls suggested momentum was swinging the Republicans' way, and Ken Mehlman, the party chairman, told allies the surveys summoned memories of 1998, when the GOP lost seats but held power.

Democrats steadfastly refused to say so in public, but some Republicans signaled privately they expected to lose more than 15 seats, and control of the House with them.

Among GOP-held open seats, those in Arizona, Colorado, New York, Ohio and Iowa seemed likeliest to fall. Republican Reps. John Hostettler, Chris Chocola and Mike Sodrel of Indiana; Charles Taylor of North Carolina; Curt Weldon, Don Sherwood and Melissa Hart of Pennsylvania; and Charles Bass of New Hampshire were in particularly difficult re-election struggles.

Democrats also boasted of several election targets in New York, where Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic candidate for governor, were expected to win landslides at the top of the ticket.

Easily two dozen more Republican seats were in jeopardy, including one in Texas that may not be settled until next month. There, Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla and former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez, a Democrat, were the leading contenders in an eight-candidate field. A run-off between the two top vote-getters would follow if no one won a majority on Tuesday.

In contrast, only a few Democratic incumbents appeared in jeopardy, including Reps. John Barrow in Georgia; Melissa Bean in Illinois and — in a race that bore no impact on the broader party struggle — William Jefferson in Louisiana. Jefferson, ensnared in a federal corruption investigation, faced a likely runoff on Dec. 9, possibly against fellow Democrat Karen Carter.

After months of pursuing the Republicans, Democrats declined to say they would catch them.

"From the Iraq war to the economy to how the Congress does its work, the American people want a different direction — and that's what Democrats offer," Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the head of the House Democrats' campaign committee, said Monday.

"We have never said we're going to take control of the Senate. We have said we're on the edge. That's where we are," said Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., chairman of the Senate Democrats' organization.

Democrats needed to gain six seats to win control of the Senate. GOP Sens. Mike DeWine in Ohio and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania appeared in deepest trouble, Sens. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Conrad Burns in Montana somewhat less so.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, in line to become the first woman speaker in history if Democrats win, was in Washington after a weekend of campaigning for candidates in Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

Neither Bush nor Clinton, the president and ex-president, was on Tuesday's ballot, but both campaigned energetically toward the finish line.

In Bentonville, Ark., where he campaigned for Asa Hutchinson, the party's gubernatorial candidate, Bush said Republicans had late momentum because they were stressing that Democrats would raise taxes if they gained power.

"The Democrats want to raise taxes when you're born, when you're working, when you retire and when you die," Bush said in Florida as his audience laughed appreciatively. "In other words, the Democrats' philosophy is this: 'If it breathes, tax it. And if it stops breathing, find their children, tax them."

Campaigning in Missouri, Democratic senatorial candidate Claire McCaskill said it wasn't so. She was in a supermarket meeting voters when one shopper asked her whether she wanted to raise taxes.

"There's nothing to that allegation," she replied. "We're going to cut taxes for the middle class."

She added that previous tax cuts "that just help the very wealthy should be retargeted to the middle class."

As he has repeatedly, the president attacked Democrats for their position on the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0091677

"Oh, they've got some ideas. Some of them say, 'get out right now.' Some of them say, 'get out at a fixed date,' even though the job hasn't been done. One of them said, 'let's move our troops to an island some 5,000 away.'"

Clinton, the former president, provided the rebuttal to that charge from a stage in Rochester, N.Y..

"On this 'stay the course in Iraq' deal, they say we're the cut-and-run crowd," he said. "These people don't look like cut and run to me," he said, gesturing at Eric Massa, a House candidate and Navy veteran, and former Sen. Max Cleland, a triple amputee from war wounds suffered in Vietnam a generation ago.

The campaign's final hours brought fresh evidence of the enormous cost.

Spending by the two national parties surged in the final week as Democrats and Republicans invested in television commercials designed to sway the outcome in more than 60 House races and 10 Senate contests. In all, the two parties have spent about $225 million thus far in campaign activities independent of the candidates themselves.

Candidate A No-show At Bush Rally (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, FLA. — The schedule for the GOP's Florida "victory rally" said that President Bush would be introduced to the crowd by the party's nominee for governor, Charlie Crist.

The president was there, but Crist was not. And the White House signaled its unhappiness.

With Bush doing poorly in opinion surveys, some Republican candidates have indicated that they did not want to appear with him at election season events.

Crist's campaign said that was not the case this time. It said the candidate had no need to spend his final campaign day in conservative Pensacola, the site of Monday's rally.

Still, Karl Rove, Bush's chief political strategist, made a snippy remark to reporters about Crist's decision to appear in other cities instead.

"Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice, versus 8,000 or 9,000 in Pensacola," Rove said.

He overestimated the size of the Pensacola crowd by several thousand.

Crist is Florida's attorney general. If elected governor, he would replace Bush's brother Jeb, who is retiring due to term limits.

A spokesman for Crist's opponent said voters should consider the canceled appearance to be "a snub."

"Despite how much [Crist] has in common with President Bush, President Bush isn't very popular right now," said Josh Earnest, a spokesman for Democratic nominee Jim Davis. "Sensing that this race is getting a lot closer, I think Mr. Crist decided that he didn't want to take a political risk."

Still, Bush on Monday enthusiastically endorsed Crist, who has been leading Davis in most opinion polls.

"He's experienced, he's compassionate and he'll work hard on behalf of all the citizens of this important state," Bushsaid.

Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), whose candidacy was discouraged by GOP leaders and who is trailing badly in opinion polls in her bid to unseat Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson, also appeared at the Pensacola rally. Bush did not mention Harris, who appeared well before him.

Bush also spent his last hours before election day campaigning in Arkansas for a struggling Republican gubernatorial candidate, Asa Hutchinson. The president ended the day in Dallas supporting Gov. Rick Perry, who succeeded Bush in 2001.

With the president having campaigned almost exclusively for House and Senate candidates, his shift on the final day to campaigning for those seeking state offices suggested he had touched base in most of the districts where his presence would help, rather than hinder, Republican candidates.

Crist Snubs President On Election Eve; Davis Calls To 'The Disgusted' (FLSUNSEN)

By Mark Hollis

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, November 7, 2006

ST. PETERSBURG -- Republican Charlie Crist and Democrat Jim Davis ended their 18-month campaigns for governor Monday amid a flap over Crist declining to campaign with President Bush.

Crist fended off criticism on election eve from both the White House and Democrats for not appearing with the president at a Republican rally in the Panhandle. Crist visited eight other cities, including a stop with U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a possible 2008 Republican presidential contender.

Davis seized on the Crist-Bush controversy and made it a theme of his final day of campaigning, which included rallies with union members, black Democrats and even a push into Florida's politically conservative Panhandle.

DOJ_NMG_0091678

Both candidates hop-scotched around the state on chartered aircraft, telling supporters they sensed victory coming their way.

"I want you to get out and work your heart out," Davis, a Tampa congressman, told about 100 supporters at a Jacksonville union hall. "Tomorrow is the day we're not only equal in the eyes of God, but in the eyes of one another."

Crist also relied on an upbeat message, telling 200 supporters in Jacksonville, "I feel victory. But I want to do more than feel it. I want to deliver it for you tomorrow night."

But it was irritation shown by the White House and pestering by Democrats over Crist's snub of the president in Pensacola that captured media attention. Crist's spokesman said Sunday the candidate was skipping a rally there because he needed to spend his final day of campaigning elsewhere in the state, including vote-rich South Florida.

On Monday, speaking to reporters in Texas, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove mockingly questioned what kind of alternate rally Crist would put together that would rival the crowd Bush was expected to attract in Republican-heavy Pensacola. The White House had to hastily recruit outgoing Gov. Jeb Bush to introduce his brother, having already distributed schedules saying Crist would play that role.

"Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice versus 8,000 or 9,000 people" in Pensacola, said Rove, the president's top political strategist.

Crist told supporters he still backs the president.

"We're delighted that he came to Florida," Crist said before waving signs with supporters at the corner of Oakland Park Boulevard and Federal Highway in Fort Lauderdale. "But it's important for me to get all over Florida."

Pensacola's market is among the most Republican, and campaigning there has been a priority for Crist. It's the heart of a region that is home to many active and retired military members. After the 2000 election, when Florida's vote was disputed for 36 days, Bush picked Pensacola for his maiden voyage to the state as president -- the one place he was certain to be enthusiastically welcomed. Now polls show widespread dissatisfaction with him statewide.

Davis took notice during his campaign stops. "Now that the president is so unpopular, Charlie refuses to stand side by side with him," he said. "It says when the going gets tough, Charlie won't stand up."

Buoyed by polls that show the governor contest to be close and knowing turnout is the key to victory, Davis in recent days stepped up his appeal to moderate Republicans and voters who have no political affiliation.

On Monday, he made stops in Panama City and Pensacola, only hours after the Bush appearance. Davis' running mate, Air Force Reserve Col. Daryl Jones, a former fighter pilot and state senator from Miami-Dade County, has spent time in the area trying to woo the votes of military retirees.

In their closing pitches to voters, Crist and Davis strayed little from their well-honed stump speeches.

Crist, the state's attorney general and a former state senator, promised voters lower taxes and property insurance rates, while warning that Davis would not deliver either.

Davis urged voters to send him to Tallahassee as a reformer. While pounding Crist for running a campaign supported by special interests, Davis opened welcoming arms to "the disgusted, the disillusioned and the mildly curious Republicans and Independents" looking for change in Washington and Tallahassee.

Both campaigns expected to have phone-bank and sign-waving operations in full swing until polls close tonight.

At frequent stops, Crist and Davis urged supporters to keep pushing for votes. Many of their supporters indicated they were feeling good about their candidates' chances.

Several union leaders, for instance, said during a Davis visit to Jacksonville that while their organizations traditionally support the Democratic nominee, they are working harder for Davis.

"It's different this time," said Minerva Faire, secretary of the North Florida Central Labor Council. "We feel it's within our reach. Congressman Davis is a working family man and that makes a big difference."

Crist's backers were equally enthusiastic.

"When you have a good candidate, people respond," said Ernesto Gonzalez, an Orlando architect standing near Crist during the Republican's stop there. "We all want lower taxes and cheaper insurance. With the right leadership, maybe it happens."

Bush Stumps (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, Fla. - The closer the election came to the finish line, the more President Bush's aides battled the perception he was doing his party as much harm as good and was unwanted in many districts.

DOJ_NMG_0091679

On Monday, Bush jetted to a conservative corner of Florida's Panhandle, about as far as he could get from the state's three in-play House districts. To the White House's embarrassment and irritation, Republican Charlie Crist, whom Bush came to help in his bid to succeed the president's brother as governor, decided at the last minute to skip the chance to be by the president's side.

In a speech bracketed by raucous foot-stomping to country music and an explosion of metallic red-white-and-blue confetti, Bush won cheers for applauding Saddam Hussein's conviction, lambasting Democrats on the war on terror and accusing the opposition party of plotting to raise taxes.

"The Democrat philosophy is this: If it breathes, tax it, and if it stops breathing, find its children and tax them," Bush shouted.

Next up was Arkansas, where Republican Asa Hutchinson remained well behind in his race to keep that governor's mansion in Republican hands. Still Bush was upbeat.

"You know, I knew we were going to finish strong," Bush told supporters gathered in an airplane hangar with Air Force One parked outside. "I knew that we were going to come roarin' into Election Day because we've got the right position on taxes, we've got the right position on what it takes to protect you from attack."

Finally, Bush was calling it a wrap Monday night in Texas. It was somewhat of a sentimental stop for the president, taking him to his home state and specifically to Dallas, where Bush has headlined rallies the night before most elections.

It was still remarkable that, with so many Republicans around the country facing too-close-to-call races and with GOP majorities in the House, Senate and the nation's statehouses in jeopardy, Bush decided to spend capital on GOP Gov. Rick Perry, who hardly needed the president's assistance to get re-elected.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush's travels on Monday to races more on the periphery of this high-stakes midterm campaign represented the president honoring "long-standing promises" to his brother, Hutchinson and Perry.

But Bush's final five-day sprint to Election Day took on little of the urgency of the last days before the 2002 midterm election, or certainly the close of his own re-election race two years ago.

He's been starting later in the day and finishing by bedtime, with just one stop on Saturday and two on Sunday - all in smaller, very GOP-friendly areas. The last three nights, he even slept in his own bed in Crawford, Texas.

Republican leaders say that the president's get-out-the-vote push in GOP strongholds was helping. The free media coverage that accompanies a presidential visit was keeping his party from having to spend precious dollars in those districts. And some new polls showed a lift in Republican enthusiasm for voting.

"The president's travels are part of the difference," Snow said.

White House aides mocked Crist's choice to duck the Bush rally, which they only learned about on Sunday morning - too late to change the printed schedules that had Crist introducing the president at the rally.

Crist chief of staff George LeMieux said the conservative Pensacola area was so firmly in his camp, and so hard to get to, that it made more sense to campaign elsewhere in the state. Said Crist: "I'm glad he's come to our state, but I've got to get around Florida."

Still, Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser, suggested that reporters see whether Crist would be able to hastily assemble anything like the Pensacola event, which drew about 7,000.

Bush ignored the flap. "I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist to be governor of the state of Florida," he said.

With Crist as a no-show, Bush was joined on stage by a host of Florida Republican officeholders and candidates - but not by Republican Rep. Katherine Harris. She has run a much-panned Senate race that has had her Republican elders cringing and both the president and retiring Gov. Jeb Bush largely avoiding her.

Attack Of The Hacks (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Has there ever been a more negative, dispiriting election? Is there any hope and optimism left in this country, or is our political culture based on nothing but seething dislike and sour resentment?

Democrats and Republicans sought to win voters with the same basic message: You may not think much of us, but at least we're better than the other guys.

Anyone who owns a television or a radio already knows that candidates and parties in this midterm smackdown spent tons more on negative political ads than on positive ones. Every contest seemed to feature a scoundrel vs. a knave, a hack vs. an idiot, a doofus vs. a dolt.

In fact, politicians use so many negative ads because they work. UCLA psychiatry professor Marco Iacoboni described for the Associated Press his research from the 2004 presidential campaign. Using magnetic resonance imaging, he found that when test subjects were initially shown pictures of their favored candidates, an area of the brain associated with empathy lit up. But after the subjects had been exposed to negative ads about their candidates, that same area of the brain failed to respond. Politicians have known this for a long time.

DOJ_NMG_0091680

The depressing nature of this endless campaign went beyond negative ads, however. Examine the messages that were delivered by the two parties and then try to find a reason to be filled with hope about the future.

The Republican Party was saddled with an unpopular president who led the nation into an unnecessary and unwinnable war, mocked traditional American notions of justice and privacy, reasserted the powers of an imperial presidency, and generally showed himself willing to disregard objective facts if they were not to his liking. That wasn't much for Republican incumbents to work with.

Still, the party did manage to come up with a coherent message: We might be making a mess of things, but if you vote for the Democrats they'll raise your taxes and let terrorists threaten your family.

The Democratic Party had the advantage of having been out of power during the whole Iraq misadventure, which gave every Democratic candidate an even simpler message to transmit to voters: Look, I'm not George W. Bush.

In terms of politics, that was smart. But "not George Bush" doesn't qualify as much of a vision for America's future. At some point, it can't be enough just to list all the problems the Republicans have created or failed to address. What are the solutions?

It's no wonder that so many voters call themselves independent these days. And no wonder that so many candidates stood out from the pack this year by highlighting the ways in which they departed from the party line -- Republicans who openly questioned the war, or Democrats who spoke about faith and family values.

Americans deserve more from their political leaders than they got this year. The party that gets to define the next era in America will be the party that has a more compelling, forward-looking story to tell than what we heard this year, which was, in a nutshell, "Those other guys are so lame."

Vote Republican, America Is At War: Bush (AFP-Y)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, November 7, 2006

President George W. Bush made his final plea to voters ahead of knife-edge congressional elections, telling them to vote Republican if they want America's full protection.

Bush, on a final three-state swing of a campaign dominated by the war in Iraq, branded Democrats as soft on the "war on terror" and also predicted Republicans would crush their rivals' hopes of seizing back control of one or both chambers of Congress.

But he suffered one final campaign trail indignity, as the Republican candidate to succeed the president's brother Jeb as Florida governor snubbed him at a rally, apparently wary of Bush's low poll ratings.

Despite polls showing public discontent over his management of the Iraq war, Bush delivered a hard-hitting warning to voters, staking out political ground on national security that helped him win past campaigns.

"As you go to the polls remember if you want your taxes low vote Republican," Bush said at a rally in Pensacola, Florida.

"As you go the the polls, remember we are at war and if you want this country to do everything in its power to protect you and at the same time lay the foundation of peace for generations to come, vote Republican."

Bush again taunted his rivals with the death sentence handed down to former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein on Sunday, saying it was vindication for the US invasion in 2003.

"My decision to get rid of Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better for it," he said, as the crowd burst into a chant of "USA! USA!"

"The only way we will not win is if we leave before the job is done," he said. "If you listen for the plan from the Democrats, there isn't one."

But the low opinion poll ratings which have dogged Bush during the campaign were highlighted again when Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist skipped an appearance with Bush in the state which handed him the presidency after a protracted recount drama six years ago.

He quickly made clear he did not bear Crist a grudge.

"Tomorrow you get to vote for a new governor, and I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist" and praising him as "experienced" and "compassionate."

But Bush's political guru Karl Rove was not impressed.

"All I know is that yesterday morning they apparently made a decision that rather than being with the governor and the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last minute decision to go to Palm Beach," said Rove.

Asked whether this reflected Bush's low popularity, Rove replied: "Let's look at the comparison, let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice versus eight or nine thousand people in Pensacola."

DOJ_NMG_0091681

Bush was later to head on to Arkansas and Texas, to wrap up a 10-state campaign blitz buoyed by signs his Republican party was picking up steam in the final hours.

One Republican who did not snub Bush here was Katherine Harris, the former senior Florida official reviled by Democrats for her role in the dramatic recount controversy.

But though Harris addressed the crowd, she was not seen alongside Bush, frustrating photographers clamouring for a shot of them together.

Harris trails badly in a statewide Senate race to Democrat Bill Nelson, after what many analysts decried as a chaotic campaign.

Several national polls in the final hours of the campaign showed a narrowing of the race, prompting Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman to proclaim voters were discovering new "enthusiasm" for Republicans.

A Washington Post and ABC television poll showed likely voters favoring Democrats to Republicans by 51 percent to 45 percent. In an October 22 survey, the Democrats had led 55-41.

The non-partisan Pew Research Center found a 47-43 lead for Democrats among likely voters, down from 50-39 two weeks ago.

A new USA Today/Gallup survey published Monday showed Democratic challengers ahead in Senate races in Montana, Rhode Island, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

A poll for McClatchy newspapers and MSNBC meanwhile suggested Republicans had also come from behind in Rhode Island and Montana, to lead or tie Democrat opponents.

GOP Hopefuls Absent From Bush Rally (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Lipman, Deana Poole, Brian E. Crowely, And SV Date

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA — Florida voters head to the polls today to pick a new governor and at least two new members of the Cabinet, as well as to help decide whether President Bush will face an unfriendly Congress for his final two years in office.

To support his party's candidates in Florida, Bush wrapped up a 10-state campaign tour Monday in Pensacola. But the state's top Republican candidates were conspicuously absent from the presidential rally, which drew about 7,500 people.

The only statewide candidate to attend the event featuring the president and his brother Gov. Jeb Bush was U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris. But Harris, who trails far behind in the polls in her bid to unseat Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, did not appear on stage with them.

While the president was in Pensacola, Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor, was visiting the Lox Around the Clock bagel shop west of Delray Beach.

Republicans Bill McCollum, who is seeking to succeed Crist as attorney general, and incumbent Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson were campaigning along the Interstate 4 corridor. Tom Lee, the GOP candidate for chief financial officer, also was not in Pensacola.

Their Democratic opponents - Alex Sink (chief financial officer), Skip Campbell (attorney general) and Eric Copeland (agriculture commissioner) - had appeared with Nelson, gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis, former President Clinton and former Sen. Bob Graham at a rally Saturday in Miami.

Crist's absence drew sarcastic remarks Monday from Davis and even from the president's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

"Charlie Crist has been campaigning standing up with George Bush this entire campaign," Davis told nearly 200 cheering supporters at a Pensacola church. "Next to the insurance industry, George Bush has probably raised more money for Charlie Crist than anybody else. But now that the president is so remarkably unpopular, once again, Charlie Crist refuses to stand up.

"Charlie Crist may have forgotten that you are part of Florida. I will never forget."

Rove also questioned Crist's decision to skip the appearance.

"Rather than being with the governor and the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last-minute decision to go to Palm Beach," Rove told reporters in Texas. "Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice versus 8,000 or 9,000 people in Pensacola."

Crist said he was not snubbing the president. Appearing with Bush "is always a great opportunity," he said, "but it's much more important to me to get to all the cities."

Asked whether he was concerned about his future relationship with the White House, Crist said, "No, it's a great relationship."

The McCollum and Bronson campaigns said the president's declining approval ratings had nothing to do with their absences.

DOJ_NMG_0091682

"If you look at the statewide numbers, they say that the I-4 corridor and up to Jacksonville are important to shore up," Bronson said. "If it had been around the Orlando-Tampa area where we could have still made the stop, we'd have been more than happy to be with the president."

Bush did not mention the absences and urged the crowd to vote for all GOP candidates for statewide office.

Bush said of Crist: "He's experienced, he's compassionate and he'll work hard on behalf of all the citizens of this important state. And while you're in there voting for Charlie, vote for Katherine Harris for the United States Senate."

White House spokesman Tony Snow also downplayed the absences of Crist and the Cabinet candidates.

"You've got to keep in mind, these events are not only important for revving up Republicans who are in the vicinity, but people all around the country are now looking at these speeches and looking at these events, and they're getting a sense of the energy of the crowds," Snow said.

During his speech, Bush concentrated on low taxes and terrorism.

"If you want your taxes low, vote Republican," Bush said. "And as you go to the polls, remember we're at war. And if you want this country to do everything in its power to protect you, and at the same time lay the foundation of peace for generations to come, vote Republican.

"Some of the folks in Washington think they've already figured out the results. That's what happened in 2004. Some of them up there started listening to the prognosticators and started picking out their offices in the west wing. Then the people in Florida voted and people around the country voted, and the movers weren't needed."

Bush was joined on stage by his wife, Laura, U.S. Rep. Jeff Miller of Pensacola, U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez and a few state legislators. Harris, who was actively discouraged from running for the Senate by the governor, White House advisers and other key state and national Republicans, spoke to the crowd about an hour before the president arrived.

During Bush's appearance, Harris and her husband, Anders Ebbeson, stood among the crowd. Asked why Harris wasn't on stage, spokeswoman Jennifer Marks said, "It's not a matter of where you sit, but where you stand on the issues."

Crist spent his day touring the state, with stops in St. Petersburg, Tampa, Orlando, Jacksonville, Delray Beach, Fort Lauderdale, Miami and Cape Coral.

Davis began his final, marathon campaign day with a visit to a longshoremen's union hall in Jacksonville. Davis urged about 200 dock workers to go to the polls today and take their friends with them. He urged them to ignore Republicans' boasts of tax cuts.

"Anybody in this room get a tax cut? No. Because you all don't have your own lobbyists," Davis said.

In Tallahassee, Davis, who was trailing by about five points in polls conducted by Republicans and Democrats, took a shot at Crist's remark that he couldn't be in Pensacola because he needed to be "in Florida."

"So I'm running against a fellow who doesn't know when the FCAT is given, doesn't know who his member of Congress is and doesn't know Pensacola is part of Florida," Davis said.

Crist explained that he meant he needed to be in "peninsular Florida."

In Orlando, Crist said he was "excited" about today's election. "I'm ready for the conclusion, and I'm sure the voters are, too. It's a long race, it's challenging and it's fun."

Crist took his own shot at Davis, telling supporters: "If they want their taxes cut, they ought to vote for Charlie Crist. If they want higher taxes, they ought to vote for Jim Davis. The choice is crystal clear."

Crist was joined in Jacksonville by U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a likely 2008 presidential candidate who predicted that if Crist wins, "it puts him on the national stage, particularly in the ranks of Republican leaders."

Besides attending the rally, Harris stopped at Pensacola's Coffee Cup Restaurant, a popular local diner known for its grits.

After working the crowd, she gave a brief version of her usual stump speech, criticizing Nelson's stances on taxes, traditional values and immigration.

For Nelson, the final day before the election was a trip down memory lane as he met with about 60 longtime supporters in the Melbourne building that once housed his junior high school - the scene of Nelson's first political speech, when he was elected student body president in the eighth grade - and then stood waving a sign on street corners in Melbourne, Cocoa and Orlando.

Nelson said that if he is reelected, he plans to speak out more on national affairs and try to formulate bipartisan solutions to Social Security, energy conservation, education and the war in Iraq.

Nelson said he would not run for president but left open the suggestion he would welcome being a vice presidential candidate.

Bush Ends 10-state Blitz To Keep A GOP Congress (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091683

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

DALLAS -- President Bush last night wrapped up a 10,000-mile, 10-state campaign blitz, but now he can only wait to see whether he will have a friendly House and Senate to help him push through his agenda over his final two years in office, or a Democratic majority that will fight him at every turn.

Before about 10,000 screaming supporters gathered at Reunion Arena for his last rally of the midterm congressional campaign, the president predicted that Republicans will keep control of both houses.

"We're closing strong because we're right on the issues," Mr. Bush said. "For the next 2½ years, I'm going to sprint as hard as I can to make this country great."

Mr. Bush spent the last two weeks of the campaign cycle trying to turn out the Republican base, visiting states he won in 2004. But many election strategists say dispirited conservatives may not go to the polls today, and Democrats say they are poised to take control of the House, and possibly the Senate as well.

Still, several new polls showed that the race for control of Congress may be narrowing, and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman proclaimed that voters are discovering new "enthusiasm" for Republicans.

In his final campaign swing, the president stoked that enthusiasm at events attended by a total of more than 75,000 Republicans. At events in Montana, Nevada, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Florida, Arkansas and Texas, Mr. Bush urged supporters to get out the vote.

"I thank you for what you have done to help these candidates, and I thank you for what you're going to do for the next 24 hours. You're going to pick up the phone, you're going to make the phone calls, you're going to turn out your friends and neighbors, and we're going to win," he said to cheers from supporters in Florida.

In an odd twist -- showing the difficulties Republicans face this year as polls show voter dissatisfaction with Mr. Bush and the war in Iraq -- the man who had invited the president to Pensacola, Fla., did not show up. Florida gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, who holds an eight-point lead on his challenger in the most recent poll, said he skipped the event because he needed to campaign in other parts of the state where his support was weak.

Here in Texas, Mr. Bush headlined a rally for the man who succeeded him as governor of Texas, Rick Perry. But his final stop of this campaign will likely turn out to have been overkill: Mr. Perry leads his closest challenger by 16 percentage points in the latest poll.

At every stop on the road, Mr. Bush extolled the achievements of the Republican-controlled Congress: Tax cuts, low unemployment, steep reductions in the deficit. He also hit hot-button conservative issues -- defining marriage as between a man and a woman, lambasting Democrats for stalling his judicial nominations, and touting Republicans' strength on national security.

"We're closing strong in this election because the American people have finally figured out our tax cuts work, and the Democrats are going to raise your taxes," the president said in Arkansas.

As the Bush administration's top officials fanned out across the country in last-ditch efforts to ramp up Republican voters, Democrats also called out their own top guns in the final days. Former President Bill Clinton, who made 30 campaign stops in 15 states in October, stumped Sunday for Democratic candidates in Maryland and yesterday for Virginia Senate candidate James H. Webb Jr.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who said he is considering a presidential run in 2008, campaigned for Tennessee Senate candidate Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., as well as for candidates in Missouri, Maryland and Pennsylvania. Even House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, absent from the campaign trail for weeks, attended rallies for candidates in Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

But Republicans countered with their own stars, including former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who campaigned for Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, Michigan gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Virginia Sen. George Allen. Arizona Sen. John McCain, also expected to run for president in 2008, campaigned for Tennessee Senate candidate Bob Corker and for Mr. Allen.

President Who Sees In Absolutes Awaits Voters' Definitive Answer (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, Fla., Nov. 6 -- These are trying times for President Bush. On the last day of the last campaign that will affect him directly, he came here as a favor to his brother on behalf of the Republican candidate for governor. Only the Republican candidate for governor skipped the event. Too busy, he said, to be with the president of the United States.

So it goes these days. Bush shrugged it off and delivered a robust speech, firing up a crowd of Republicans and defiantly predicting victory. Any doubt he may harbor, he kept to himself. Any feelings of regret are locked tight inside. The rest of the world may see an unpopular president in the midst of an unpopular war. But Bush soldiers on. He does not publicly stew as other presidents have. He powers through event after event as if he were still the leader the country rallied behind after Sept. 11, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0091684

To his critics, it sometimes seems as if Bush lives in his own world, oblivious or unwilling to accept the shifting reality around him. His is a world of absolutes. "I view this as a struggle of good versus evil," he said the other day about the war with terrorists. To Bush, that is strength, not weakness -- the certitude of conviction, the power of principle. He's "the decider" in a business afflicted by equivocation and thumb-sucking.

Few deciders have gone through such a period in which the decisions seemed so out of their hands. He told North Korea not to test nuclear weapons, but Pyongyang detonated a bomb anyway. He tells Iran to stop pursuing nuclear weapons, only to have Tehran thumb its nose. He orders generals to find a way to stabilize Iraq, but bombs and bullets claimed more U.S. lives in October than in any other month in two years.

Now the voters are the deciders, and it's a verdict Bush can no longer influence. They will decide whether to give him back a Congress that stands by him more often than not or to turn over at least one house to the opposition to force change. Bush insists he's not worried. But at least one person who saw him in private a few days ago interpreted his body language to mean that he did not think Tuesday will be a great day for him.

Bush woke up Monday at his ranch in Crawford, Tex., and was briefed by strategist Karl Rove on the shifting races. Rove told reporters later that of 20 recent polls in critical places, 16 had moved in the Republican direction and three were flat. "I knew we were going to finish strong," Bush said here.

Bush is not a nervous election-eve politician, obsessively poring over precinct-by-precinct reports, but he can be edgy or impatient and understands what is on the line, according to associates. As he embarked on his last day on the trail, Laura Bush came along, a calming presence during moments of pressure.

The president and his staff were offended by the last-minute snub by Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate to succeed term-limited Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. The White House scheduled the stop here in the conservative Panhandle as a favor to Jeb Bush entirely for Crist's benefit. But Crist decided to go elsewhere in the state. The White House schedule Monday morning still listed Crist as introducing the president.

Rove did not hide his consternation: "Rather than being with the governor and the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last-minute decision to go to Palm Beach. Let's look at the comparison. Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice versus 8,000 or 9,000 people in Pensacola."

The president was left with a rainy-day rally here for no one. The local congressman does not face a competitive race and the Bush brothers are estranged from Rep. Katherine Harris, the GOP Senate candidate, who polls show losing in a rout. Harris was given a three-minute speaking slot more than an hour before the president arrived and was not on stage during his appearance. Bush mentioned her only once in passing.

At times, Bush appears confounded by the political problems confronting him. He is absolutely certain that, as he puts it, "they're coming after us," meaning terrorists, but does not understand why many others do not see it with the clarity he does. "I am in disbelief that people don't take these people seriously," he told National Review and other conservative outlets last month.

That conversation provided a glimpse into Bush's aggravation and isolation. One participant, Lawrence Kudlow of CNBC, told Bush that he has supported the war but was discouraged and looking for hope.

"I need some good news, sir," Kudlow said.

"Yes, I do, too," Bush said.

"I really do," Kudlow repeated.

"You're talking to Noah about the flood," Bush said. "I do, too."

Bush seeks solace in history, certain that he will be vindicated, much as Harry S. Truman was unpopular in his day but is revered today. And Bush expresses exasperation that he cannot find a tangible yardstick to point to victory in Iraq.

"I don't know what Harry Truman was feeling like, or Franklin Roosevelt," he told the conservative journalists. "I'm sure there were moments of high frustration for them. But I do know that at Midway, they were eventually able to say two carriers were sunk and one was damaged. We don't get to say that. A thousand of the enemy killed, or whatever the number was. It's happening; you just don't know it. And there's no scorecard."

The elections, at least, come with a scorecard. But Bush has not maintained a particularly hectic pace. Whereas he hit 15 states in the final five days before the 2002 midterm elections, he visited 10 in the same period this year. He dropped off the trail for 24 hours over the weekend to celebrate the first lady's 60th birthday and their 29th anniversary.

When he went back out, he stuck to conservative areas without major races. That's because Crist is not the only Republican eager to keep a distance from a president with a 40 percent approval rating -- just the only one impolitic enough to snub him after inviting him on election eve.

DOJ_NMG_0091685

Bush's last stops were chosen out of loyalty to allies rather than any effort to make a difference in a tossup race. He flew to Bentonville, Ark., for Asa Hutchinson, a former administration official running for governor, then to Dallas for Gov. Rick Perry. Neither race is close; Hutchinson trails by 17 points, and Perry leads by 14.

Bush's stump speech the past few weeks has underscored a with-us-or-against-us worldview. Democrats and some Republicans opposed warrantless surveillance of telephone calls of people with suspected ties to terrorism, objecting to unchecked executive power and arguing that officials should still get warrants from a secret intelligence court. Likewise, Democrats and initially some Republicans opposed redefining Geneva Conventions protections for prisoners and permitting harsh interrogation, preferring more traditional practices.

In the version Bush offers campaign audiences, that boils down to the Democrats not wanting to fight terrorists at all. Democrats, he said in Missouri, "oppose listening in on terrorist conversations" and "oppose letting the CIA detain and question the terrorists who might know what those [next] plots are." As for Iraq, he said in Texas, if Democrats get their way, "the terrorists win and America loses."

One way or the other, someone loses Tuesday. Bush and Rove have remained outwardly confident in the face of the polls in part because they have so often prevailed over conventional wisdom. If polls were right, then John F. Kerry would be president, they tell doubters. Both bristle at the idea that the Washington elite has already counted them out.

Still, Bush advisers understand the odds against them. They have written off 10 or 12 "scandal seats," where ethical lapses have dominated. Democrats need 15 to take over the House, so victory in just a few tossup races would be enough. If that happens, the White House argument is likely to be that Republicans lost because of isolated corruption cases, not broader discontent with Bush or the war.

What Bush would do then becomes the next question. He arrived in Washington promising to be a uniter, not a divider, but the political polarization in the country is worse than when he took over. As recently as last month, his spokesman said that if nothing else, Bush wants to use his last two years to "detoxify" Washington -- and then Bush headed out to the campaign trail to warn that if Democrats win, "America loses."

How would he reconcile these competing instincts? The desire to be a healer and the surety that his way is the right way? The decider will have to decide.

Gubernatorial Candidates Scramble For Votes In Final Hours (HC)

By Julie Mason And Gary Scharrer

Houston Chronicle, November 7, 2006

The four major candidates for Texas governor made their final pitches to the voters today, with Gov. Rick Perry getting a personal boost from President Bush and independent Carole Keeton Strayhorn blitzing the state with Bush's former press secretary and the president's former Medicare chief.

Democrat Chris Bell campaigned in Amarillo, Dallas and Austin before returning to his home in Houston, where he will vote today) and await election returns.

Independent Kinky Friedman rallied in Temple.

In his last event of the campaign season, Bush touched down in Dallas for a rally with Perry, telling an estimated 10,000 people at Reunion Arena that ``You elected us to get things done."

``Let me put it to you this way," Bush told the cheering crowd. ``Everything I learned, I learned here in Texas."

Joined by local Republican officials and statewide officeholders, including Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst, Bush said, ``When you get in there to vote for Rick, make sure you vote for Dewhurst as well."

Strayhorn held airport news conferences in Harlingen, San Antonio, Houston and Dallas with her four sons, including Scott McClellan, the former White House press secretary, and Mark McClellan, who, until recently, was Bush's administrator of the Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services.

``A couple of his (Bush's) senior advisors think there's a better candidate for governor," Mark McClellan said.

Scott McClellan likened Strayhorn's style to the ``uniter, not a divider" theme that Bush used in his first presidential race.

``We think that spirit is what this campaign is all about - setting aside partisan politics and doing what's best for Texas," he said.

Also touring with Strayhorn were Brad McClellan, her campaign manager, and his twin brother, Dudley. Strayhorn's sons have campaigned with her throughout her political career, beginning in 1972 when she ran for the Austin school board.

At the various stops, the comptroller also was joined by Democratic and Republican officeholders to emphasize her cross-party message.

``We are going to prove the pundits wrong," she said of recent media-sponsored polls indicating she will finish third as Perry is reelected.

DOJ_NMG_0091686

Bell and Friedman made similar comments about the voter surveys.

Bell urged Democrats who have been flirting with Strayhorn or Friedman to come home to their party.

He acknowledged the difficulty of a Democrat regaining the governor's office after 12 years, but he said there's also an advantage in running against ``one of the least popular governors in the history of Texas."

``I'm the only one now in a position to take him out," he added.

In Dallas, where Bell was born, he campaigned with his father, Peter Bell, 83, a former Republican.

``If they (voters) just get to know him, he's a beautiful man," the elder Bell said of his son.

Friedman rallied about 100 voters in Temple at the office of Tejano star Little Joe Hernandez. He said he will be joined on election night by former Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura, the former wrestler who rode a wave of voter turnout to an upset victory as a Reform Party candidate in 1998.

``I think we're going to surge a lot stronger than the pollsters and the politicians and the pundits have predicted," said Friedman, for whom recent polls have predicted a fourth place finish with about 11 percent of the vote.

As Friedman was talking about the ``very strange coalition" supporting him, about 20 uniformed students from Holy Trinity, an area Catholic school, showed up.

The candidate vying to be the first Jewish governor of Texas gave the students a history lesson about one of his heroes, Father Damien, a Belgian Catholic missionary who ministered to lepers in Hawaii during the late 1800s.

President Bush raised a record $194 million for Republican candidates this year, but his diminished popularity nationally has limited his value in tightly contested races.

Instead, the president has stuck to largely conservative areas where his handlers believed he could make a positive difference. In two other stops today, Bush addressed rallies in Arkansas and Florida.

Today, the president and first lady vote at their local polling place in Crawford before heading back to Washington, where they plan to watch the election results at the White House.

Slightly more than 1 million people voted early in person or by mail in the 15 most populous counties, a slight increase over the 2002 gubernatorial election.

The number of early voters increased in several suburban, Republican-dominated counties, including Fort Bend and Montgomery (outside Houston), Williamson (outside Austin) and Collin and Denton (in the Metroplex), while early voting in Travis and Hidalgo counties, two Democratic strongholds, was down.

Secretary of State Roger Williams has predicted that 36 percent of the state's 3 million-plus registered voters will cast ballots, the same percentage as voted in 2002.

Bush Warns Against Presuming Democratic Victories (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, November 7, 2006

DALLAS -- After nearly six mostly tumultuous years as president, George W. Bush has come home to Texas to cast his own lone vote on a day when his party's national fortunes hang in the balance.

On Monday, the last day of his final political campaign that could effect his presidency, Bush brandished the unrelenting optimism which he has carried to his own personal battle for his party's control of Congress for months.

Bush also carried the added burden of his own unpopularity as president, with the war in Iraq having taken a toll on the president after nearly four years of combat. A Republican candidate for governor snubbed the president's appearance in Florida during an eleventh-hour, day-long campaign tour for governor's races in three states.

"Some folks in Washington think they've already figured out the results," said Bush, warning against presuming any Democratic victories on Tuesday. "That's what happened in 2004… Some of them started listening to the prognosticators and started picking out their offices in the West Wing. Then the people… voted… And movers weren't needed."

In Florida, where the president joined his younger brother, retiring Gov. Jeb Bush, for their final campaign appeal as president and governor, their own party's candidate for governor skipped a rally with thousands of people in Pensacola staged for the party's candidates in the Sunshine State. It was overcast outside the civic center where the president spoke, and the candidate's absence hung like a pall over the rally inside.

Republican Charlie Crist, running for governor in Florida, insisted that last-minute scheduling and a desire to concentrate his efforts in seven other cities across the state, was behind this sudden cancellation.

Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, said somewhat ruefully: "All I know is that yesterday morning they apparently made a decision that, rather than being with the president and 10,000 people in Pensacola, they made a last-minute decision to go to Palm Beach."

DOJ_NMG_0091687

Some insisted that yet another Republican had decided to seek some distance from the president in a year when many of the GOP's members of Congress and candidates have campaigned with reminders of how they disagree with Bush, with his job-approval hovering below 40 percent.

Karen Thurman, Florida Democratic Party chairman, said: "Charlie Crist and President Bush say, 'stay the course,' but clearly Charlie Crist has 'cut and run' from the president today."

Susan MacManus, professor of political science at the University of South Florida, suggested that Crist {ndash} favored to win the governor's race {ndash} has drawn support from independent voters and even some Democrats, and these swing voters also tend to be late-deciding. The view of Crist standing alongside Bush might not serve well as their final image, she agreed.

Crist did make time Monday for an appearance with Arizona Sen. John McCain, eyeing the Republican nomination for president in 2008, and was introduced as part of the party's "next generation" of leaders.

Yet Rove insisted that he had found cause for optimism in the final days of the midterm congressional elections. The results of many polls have revealed trends favoring Republican candidates, insisted Rove, architect of Bush's campaigns for president and chieftain of the midterm campaigns.

"Last week, for example, on one day we had some 20-odd polls," Rove said on the runway at an airport near Waco, Tex., as he prepared to head out with Bush for election-eve campaigning.

"Wherever the candidate was, their comparable position versus the previous day's tracking or the previous week's poll, like in a group of say 20-some-odd, you'd have 16 of them approve, three of them stay flat," Rove said. When "you see that in races from the West Coast to the Northeast, Senate, House and governor, then it presages something."

For months, Bush, First Lady Laura Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and party leaders have fanned out on their own, campaigning in more than 200 cities for the GOP's candidates. On Monday, the president and first lady walked hand-in-hand onto stages for the closing day's rallies.

The president, promising lower taxes and stronger national security if Republicans win on Tuesday, unleashed the same criticism of Democrats as tax-happy and weak at war that he has voiced for months.

"The Democrats' philosophy is this… if it breathes, tax it," Bush said, shirt-sleeves rolled to his elbows. 'Remember, if you want your taxes low… vote Republican…And, as you go to the polls, remember we're at war."

In Florida, the state that handed Bush the presidency after a 36-day court battle over the disputed 2000 election there, the president spoke of the local congressman asking him not to forget the people of the panhandle.

"I said, 'Congressman, how could I forget 'em?'" Bush said. "I wouldn't be president without 'em."

And in Florida, where the Bush brothers have campaigned side-by-side many times, this final campaign brought an emotional farewell.

"This'll be my last chance to introduce him as president of the United States while I'm governor," Jeb Bush told the crowd.

"Mr. President, brother George, thank you for the tax cuts in Washington that made it possible for our state to grow," he said. "Mr. President, brother George, thank you for supporting our military."

In Arkansas, the president campaigned for Asa Hutchison, the Republican candidate for governor who had served the Bush administration for four years, most recently as a senior Homeland Security official. The White House voiced a sense of obligation.

"We're closing strong," Bush said in Little Rock

And in Texas, Bush closed his campaign with a rally for Gov. Rick Perry, the Republican who succeeded Bush in the Lone Star State and could become Texas' longest-serving governor if he wins on Tuesday.

A Last Hurrah Of Sorts For Bush-Rove Partnership (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

PENSACOLA, Fla., Nov. 6 — President Bush and his political partner, Karl Rove, ended it where they started it: in this sliver of Northwest Florida that arguably gave them their 2000 victory.

Like then, the two have utilized a symbiotic relationship in which, friends say, Mr. Rove, the president's chief political adviser, is both mastermind and supplicant, and Mr. Bush is both leader and follower.

While several members of the team that got Mr. Bush to the White House in 2000 are gone, Mr. Rove remains.

Mr. Rove helped to give Mr. Bush a winning strategy, first guiding him to the governor's seat in Texas, then to the White House. Mr. Bush brought Mr. Rove along on a remarkable journey to the pinnacle of the political world. They have won every election they have taken on together.

DOJ_NMG_0091688

Mr. Bush, who is more involved in the nitty-gritty of politics than he lets on publicly, gave Mr. Rove the clearance to run the White House midterm elections plan according to his standard playbook, even as other Republicans began to question Mr. Rove's reputation for strategic brilliance and detach themselves from Mr. Bush and the Iraq war.

This year has not been easy on the two men, but in public at least, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove usually seem to be enjoying themselves. In the campaign's waning days, Mr. Rove emerged as the campaign jester of Air Force One, a role he has taken on in all of Mr. Bush's big campaigns.

On almost every leg of every trip, Mr. Rove appeared before the traveling group of journalists to alternately tease them or flatter them, all the while spinning scenarios pointing to yet another Republican victory in the face of forecasts to the contrary.

Thus, there last week was the man Mr. Bush calls "the architect" — and some liberal bloggers call an evil genius — walking into the Air Force One press cabin to distribute chocolate-covered caramels to the traveling reporters. His prediction for Election Day: "Victory, victory, victory."

Another day while dispensing candy to the press, he shouted, "Sweets for my sweets!"

Mr. Bush is reveling in being on the campaign trail too, rolling up his sleeves and going into arenas where audiences explode at lines that get polite applause from the more moneyed crowds he has addressed this year. An aide to Mr. Bush recalled how, just before taking the stage at a booming gymnasium in Le Mars, Iowa, the president turned to him and several others and said, "All right, boys, I have some new chestnuts for 'em tonight," adding, "They ain't seen nothing yet."

Despite several requests, the White House would not arrange an interview with Mr. Rove to discuss what is, in effect, his last big campaign for Mr. Bush. Indicating that he still plans on being relevant, along with Mr. Bush, two years from now, a White House aide said that Mr. Rove "disputes the premise."

Post-Tuesday Thinking

Indeed, what happens after Tuesday is something of a sore subject with several of Mr. Bush's advisers.

They refuse to discuss the possibility of life with a Democratic speaker of the House, presumably Representative Nancy Pelosi of California. And whenever the subject of the president's last two years come up, the aides make sure everybody knows that Mr. Bush intends to go out with a bang, not a whimper.

Asked Monday about plans for a possible Democratic-controlled Congress, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, repeated his standard refusal to discuss the topic, then added, "Here's the thing that you do need to know, which is that the president plans for a very active final two years of his presidency."

He added, "So the president is going to be very aggressive, and he's not going to play small ball."

Everywhere, though, there are reminders that Washington will soon begin to focus on 2008 — like, say, Wednesday. Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor in Florida, skipped out on an appearance in Pensacola with Mr. Bush, choosing instead to appear in Jacksonville with Senator John McCain of Arizona, a favored contender for the Republican presidential nomination should he run.

A person close to Senator McCain said that his advisers had checked with the White House last week to make sure there was no conflict and noted the events were two hours apart. The senator is expected to start his 2008 political strategy sessions on Wednesday.

And last Saturday, Mr. Bush beckoned a reporter, Nedra Pickler of The Associated Press, to his cabin at the front of Air Force One, to say goodbye. She is leaving her job as a White House correspondent to begin covering the 2008 campaign.

Not-So-Sunshine State

Florida has been good to Mr. Bush over the years. Yet, there are signs of wear here, like elsewhere, and Mr. Crist is not the only Republican in the state with whom the White House has had its differences.

Representative Katherine Harris, the state's former Secretary of State and onetime Bush loyalist who was credited with helping to secure Mr. Bush's victory in 2000, is running for the seat held by Senator Bill Nelson, a Democrat.

But Ms. Harris and the Bushes — that includes the president's brother, Florida's outgoing governor, Jeb Bush, are no longer allies; she defied their wishes that she not run for the Senate seat, and, despite a lot of trying, they were unable to persuade anybody else to run.

When Mr. Crist backed out of the Pensacola rally, Ms. Harris was the most prominent Republican candidate on the state ballot this year in attendance. Yet she was not up on the stage with Mr. Bush, his wife Laura, Governor Bush and Senator Mel Martinez.

Asked before landing in Pensacola whether Mr. Bush was "excited" to campaign with Ms. Harris, Mr. Snow said flatly: "He wants Republican candidates to win."

If enough of them do not, it is going to be a very different world for him come Wednesday.

Tuesday May Bring Bush Worry Either Way (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0091689

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 7, 2006

Running out of time and influence, President Bush faces a rough road in the twilight of his presidency regardless of who controls Congress.

The once-unshakable loyalty of congressional Republicans is weakening. After marching in lockstep with the White House for six years, GOP lawmakers are looking at the political calendar and thinking about their own futures rather than Bush's legacy in his last two years in office.

Republicans are in a sour mood, scarred by corruption scandals, held in low esteem by voters and divided over issues from deficit spending to immigration reform. Many GOP candidates shunned Bush in their campaigns, fearing he would hurt rather than help them.

With the end of the midterm elections and the opening of the 2008 presidential race, Republicans as well as Democrats will be telling the country how they would do things differently from Bush.

Already a huge headache, the Iraq war hangs over Bush as the dominant issue for the remainder of his presidency. Even before this year's elections, Republican senators — from Virginia's John Warner to Texas' Kay Bailey Hutchison — were questioning Bush's approach to Iraq, which this month will eclipse World War II in the length of U.S. involvement.

If Democrats should take the House or Senate, Bush's problems would only get worse.

Shut out of power for a dozen years and bitter at Bush for ignoring them, Democrats would demand a role in setting the nation's agenda and throw up roadblocks to the president's plans. Pressuring Bush on Iraq, Democrats would have subpoena powers to investigate the president's conduct of the war and to demand accountability.

The White House also could get snarled in Democratic-run investigations of issues ranging from Vice President Dick Cheney's secret energy policy deliberations to White House links with Republican corruption scandals.

"It won't be a happy place to work in the next couple of years," said John Podesta, who has firsthand knowledge about running a White House in troubled times. He was Bill Clinton's chief of staff during the tumultuous days of the Monica Lewinsky scandal and Clinton's impeachment.

"Whereas you had a kind of lapdog Congress in the past, you're going to have a significant challenge," Podesta said of Bush. "Even if the Republicans retain control, you'll see even more questioning on the Senate side."

With Democrats in charge, there would be little chance that Bush's prized tax cuts would be renewed. His drive to expand his executive authority and national security powers would be blocked.

Even with Republicans in control, Bush's agenda has been stalled, his blueprints for overhauling Social Security and immigration collecting dust.

Time and history are not on his side.

"It seems like most presidents get less done in the last two years than they did in the earlier part of their term," said Charles Black, a GOP strategist with close ties to the White House. "Some of it is you don't have as much influence. People are paying attention to who might come next instead of who is there now."

Before they leave, presidents sometimes try to shape their legacy with foreign policy victories. Clinton desperately sought a Middle East peace agreement in the closing days of his presidency but failed. The Middle East offers scant hope for Bush, too. Trouble spots like North Korea and Iran look bleak.

Bush insists he has a lot to do and isn't slowing down. After the election, he plans to send Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to Capitol Hill to see what's possible in terms of overhauling the financially troubled Social Security and Medicare programs.

"The general approach is to be activist and tackle big stuff," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "You've got a very energized and motivated White House. We're going to see how Congress is in dealing with this. Maybe it's just wishful thinking but we may be approaching the point of mudslinging burnout."

Even if Democrats win, Bush still would have clout. As commander in chief, he is responsible for American forces. There isn't much talk about Congress cutting off funds for war.

Probably the most potent weapon in Bush's arsenal would be his veto pen and, almost certainly, a veto-sustaining minority if Democrats took the House.

He also would have the power of executive orders allowing him to make big moves without Congress' approval. Clinton used that authority, for example, to protect vast tracts of public land from road-building, logging and mining.

Democrats and Republicans alike suggest there are areas of possible agreement on issues such as alternative fuel sources and the No Child Left Behind education law that has to be renewed next year.

A key question is whether Democrats, Republicans and the White House decide it's in their political interest to get some things done.

DOJ_NMG_0091690

"An awful lot can happen in two years," said Leon Panetta, a onetime Democratic congressman who became Clinton's chief of staff. "In many ways it can determine his legacy as president of the United States. If there's nothing but gridlock these last two years, mark my words: He's not going to have a very high place in history in terms of his presidency."

___

EDITOR'S NOTE — Terence Hunt has covered the White House for The Associated Press since the Reagan presidency.

Candidates Make Dash For Finish Line (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 — Exhausted candidates across the country delivered their final appeals on Monday, closing a campaign that will determine the balance of power in Washington for the next two years and render a judgment about President Bush and the war in Iraq.

Candidates, party committees and interest groups flooded voters with a flurry of late advertising and heavy spending on turn-out-the-vote operations on the last day of the most expensive, and one of the nastiest, midterm elections in American history.

Most independent analysts predicted a strong Democratic wave on Tuesday, but Republicans found a glimmer of hope in a handful of weekend polls that showed the percentage of voters saying they planned to vote for Democrats dipping slightly. And Democratic officials acknowledged that Senate seats they thought they had wrapped up — in Maryland, Montana, New Jersey and Rhode Island — were no longer sure things.

After months of attacks on the stump and on the airwaves about sex and race, scandal and war, candidates and parties turned most of their attention to closing the sale and driving their voters to the polls on Tuesday.

In Georgia, Representative Jim Marshall, one of fewer than a half dozen threatened Democratic incumbents, spent the day making phone calls to answer questions from undecided voters.

The candidates in a tight race for a seat along Florida's east coast, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., the Republican, and Ron Klein, his Democratic challenger, spent the day trolling for votes in complexes for the elderly, talking about prescription drug benefits under the new Medicare program.

In the contest for an open House seat in Colorado's Seventh District, around Denver, Republicans contacted more than 50,000 households over the weekend by telephone and door-to-door canvassing.

Some 4,500 members of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as Acorn, donned bright red T-shirts were out campaigning in favor of ballot proposals to raise the minimum wage in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri and Ohio.

In Arizona, the actor Michael J. Fox appeared with two Democratic candidates to advocate lifting restrictions on stem cell research, an issue that has come to play a prominent role in several races around the country.

In Texas, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the Republican write-in candidate for the seat vacated by Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, closed a hectic day Monday night with a party in the affluent Clear Lake area of Houston. She scoffed at predictions made by some news outlets about her candidacy.

"They may have jumped the gun when they said two months ago that there was no way that Congressional District 22 would stay Republican," Ms. Sekula-Gibbs told the crowd, "but guess what, it's going to stay Republican."

Mr. Bush spent the day on the fringes of contests for the House and Senate, seeking to rally Republican voters in Arkansas, Florida and Texas. But Karl Rove, his senior adviser, expressed open irritation at the last-minute decision by Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor in Florida, not to appear with the president at a large and spirited rally in Pensacola, a development that underscored the reluctance of his own party's candidates to be too closely linked to Mr. Bush.

Mr. Bush, with his shirtsleeves rolled up and his wife, Laura, and brother Jeb, Florida's governor, at his side, told the crowd that Republicans were more devoted to the nation's security than were Democrats. He received some of his most sustained applause — mixed with chants of "U.S.A., U.S.A.!" — when he reminded the crowd, "Saddam Hussein was convicted and sentenced to death."

Ending his day of campaigning in Dallas, he told thousands at the Reunion Arena, "We're closing strong because we're right on the issues," and exhorted volunteers to work the telephones and get voters to the polls.

In addition to contests for Congress, 36 governor's chairs and thousands of state legislative seats are to be decided. Polls indicate that Democrats could pick up as many as 10 governor's offices now held by Republicans without losing a single one now in Democratic hands.

Voters in 37 states will consider dozens of ballot initiatives on embryonic stem cell research, the minimum wage, same-sex marriage, abortion, the environment and other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0091691

Democratic Party officials have sought from the beginning of the campaign to frame the election as primarily about Mr. Bush, and particularly about his conduct of the war in Iraq.

"We've always wanted this to be a national referendum," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, "and it's helping us from one end of the country to the other."

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said that most races would be decided on local issues and that party volunteers were knocking on an average of three million doors a day nationwide, part of the Republicans' so-called 72-hour strategy for turning out their voters.

Mr. Mehlman, however, introduced a cautionary note in contrast with confident predictions by Mr. Bush, Mr. Rove and Vice President Dick Cheney that Republicans would retain majorities in the House and Senate.

Asked about his party's prospects in the House, Mr. Mehlman said that although he saw signs of new hope that Republicans could retain control, "I believe it's going to be very close; I think it remains an uphill climb."

He sounded more confident about the Senate.

Independent analysts predict Democratic gains of 20 and 40 seats in the House, giving the party control for the first time since 1994. An analysis accompanying a Gallup Poll released over the weekend said that based on calculations from Congressional elections from 1946 to 2002, the Democrats were poised to gain 11 to 58 seats, with a gain of 35 the most likely outcome.

More than 100 optimistic but anxious House Democrats took part in a party conference call Monday afternoon, getting an update on races and some guidance from Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, on how to proceed should Democrats prevail. According to participants, Ms. Pelosi told her colleagues that the first 48 hours after the election would be important in defining the party's image if they gained a majority and that Democrats should be united, show respect for diverse views and a willingness to work with Republicans and President Bush

A half-dozen Senate seats remained competitive, with both parties warily watching races in Rhode Island, Maryland, Missouri, Montana and Virginia.

All the last-minute spending and the spin, the door-knocking and the robocalling will have no effect on the estimated 25 percent of the electorate that has already cast votes, either by absentee ballot or at early voting stations.

California's secretary of state, Bruce McPherson, said that local elections officials issued 5.1 million absentee ballots and that he expected that 44 percent of all votes cast in the state would be cast by mail. Ohio elections officials won a court ruling that they could immediately begin counting tens of thousands of absentee ballots that were piling up in county clerks' offices.

Over all, about 42 percent of eligible voters are expected to cast ballots, which would be the highest percentage in any midterm election since 1982, said Curtis Gans, director of the Center for the Study of the American Electorate at American University and an expert on voter behavior. Mr. Gans said he based his estimate on the intensity of voter interest and the number of absentee ballots issued.

"Even the ugly campaign has not dampened their desire to come out," he said.

The barrage of negative advertising continued, but some candidates adopted an almost elegiac tone to their final arguments.

Representative James T. Walsh, a nine-term Republican from Syracuse who is facing a tough challenge, began running a television advertisement last weekend in which he wore a casual sweater and spoke directly to the camera.

"I think you know me," Mr. Walsh says in the commercial. "I think you trust me. I want you to know I share your frustration with the war. These are difficult times for America. We've got to stop the finger-pointing and the partisanship and address all our nation's challenges, both at home and abroad, together."

Bob Casey, the Pennsylvania Democrat who appears likely to unseat Senator Rick Santorum, a Republican, sits on the stoop of his home in Scranton, Pa., in his final advertisement and talks about binding up the wounds of the bitter campaign.

"After all the noise of this campaign year," Mr. Casey says in the spot, "I wanted to talk with you about what lies ahead. The only way we're going to work through problems like losing jobs to other countries, protecting Americans from terrorism or the war in Iraq is for Democrats and Republicans to start working together again."

Voting In A Neck-and-neck Nation (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The 2006 campaign, one of the nastiest battles and the most expensive ever for control of Congress, came to an end Monday amid indications that months of debate over Iraq, political corruption and the Republican dominance of Washington could produce the highest voter turnout in decades for a midterm election. Even as polls differed on whether voters were ready to hand Democrats a majority in the House or Senate, or both, a series of late surveys consistently showed extremely high levels of interest in the election.

DOJ_NMG_0091692

In a national USA Today/Gallup Poll released Monday, 68% of adults said they were "absolutely certain" they would vote. That was the highest level of interest Gallup has recorded for a nonpresidential election in the half a century it has measured American opinion.

Likewise, a survey by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press showed a significantly higher level of interest than in the last two midterm elections — higher even than in 1994, when Republicans swept Democrats from power in Congress.

Iraq, the issue that has generated the sharpest conflicts between President Bush and the Democrats, continued to set off sparks on the campaign's final day.

Leading Democrats urged Americans to demand a new direction on Iraq policy by ousting the GOP majorities in the House and Senate.

"The choice couldn't be more stark," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, told reporters. "Every vote cast for a Democrat is [a vote] for a new, smarter Iraq policy. Every vote cast for a Republican is a vote cast for staying the course."

Bush, accepting that gauntlet, portrayed success in Iraq as essential to protecting America's national security and insisted that Democrats had no plan to prevail there.

"Harsh criticism is not a plan for victory," Bush told an enthusiastic crowd of 5,000 in the Republican stronghold of Pensacola, Fla. "Second-guessing is not a strategy. We have a plan for victory, and part of that plan is to make sure that Republicans control the House and the Senate."

With all 435 seats in the House of Representatives and 33 Senate seats at stake, as well as 36 governorships, today's election could mark the sharpest turn in American politics since the Republican landslide in 1994.

*

GOP dominance at risk

Since that victory, fueled by a backlash against President Clinton's first two years in office, Republicans have controlled the House for 12 consecutive years and the Senate for all but about 18 months in Bush's first term.

Now polls show that voter discontent over Bush's direction, especially in Iraq, has carried the Democrats within range of capturing at least one chamber of Congress. Republicans took heart from several late surveys showing the GOP mobilizing more of its core supporters and shrinking its deficit among swing voters, much as the party did in the final weekend before its surprising gains in the 2002 election.

"Our party is heading into election day with strong momentum," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said in an e-mail to supporters Monday morning.

Still other polls painted a less-promising picture for the GOP. And most analysts on both sides agreed it would be extremely difficult for Republicans to prevent Democrats from securing the 15-seat gain they need to capture a majority in the House.

In the Senate, Democrats face a tougher climb. They need a gain of six seats to reach a majority, and that will require them to capture at least four of the five most closely contested Republican-held seats — in Rhode Island, Montana, Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri — without losing any seats they already hold.

Public opinion polls generally showed close races in all of those contests except Tennessee, where most surveys provided Republican Bob Corker a wider advantage over Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. Late polls showed Democratic challengers maintaining large leads over Republican Sens. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio.

A Democratic majority in either chamber could set the stage for two years of intense political conflict. Democrats would be likely to use the subpoena power that comes with majority control to aggressively examine Bush policies in Iraq and at home that they argue Republican lawmakers have failed to monitor.

Big Democratic gains would also disrupt the ambitions of Bush and Karl Rove, his chief political advisor, to build a lasting Republican electoral majority centered on an alliance of economic and social conservatives.

One of the hallmarks of Bush's presidency has been the passionate emotions he inspires in supporters and opponents, and that pattern shows every sign of generating a large turnout today.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate at American University in Washington, has predicted that voter turnout is likely to exceed the highest level of the last quarter of a century, which was reached in the 1982 election, when Democrats made sweeping gains in the House.

*

Getting out the vote

On Monday, both parties worked frantically to convert that interest into votes.

DOJ_NMG_0091693

In Missouri, site of the neck-and-neck race between GOP Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill, Republicans said they had launched a larger get-out-the-vote drive than they did in the 2004 presidential election, when Bush won the state comfortably.

"It's a juggernaut right now," said Paul Sloca, the spokesman for the Missouri GOP.

In Montana, where GOP Sen. Conrad Burns is battling Democrat Jon Tester in a tight race, the party has contacted about 300,000 voters by phone and home visits in little more than a week. That is roughly one-third of the state's population.

Nationwide, the Republican National Committee estimates its get-out-the-vote operation had contacted more than 29 million voters as of Monday.

Democrats and their allies mounted their own efforts. The Democratic National Committee touted a big increase in party voters participating in early balloting in Tennessee and widespread voter contact efforts in Arizona — site of three competitive House races — and in Iowa, where Democrats hope to hold the governorship and seize a vacant Republican House seat.

The AFL-CIO said that on Monday, 50,000 union volunteers were expected to make 2.5 million phone calls, knock on 1 million doors and speak with 1.8 million union members at work sites.

*

Democrats cry foul

As each side sought to mobilize its voters, Democrats complained that the GOP had made a barrage of computer-generated telephone calls that, in their view, constituted a last-minute dirty trick.

Democrats said that because the automated calls often started with an offer to share information about a Democratic candidate, some voters thought the candidate had placed the calls. Democrats said the effort was intended to generate anger toward their candidates by pestering voters with multiple calls in unwelcome bursts or late at night.

Attorneys for the House Democratic campaign committee also asserted that the calls violated FCC rules that require the sponsor of automated calls to be identified at the beginning of the message. A spokesman for the House Republican campaign committee acknowledged that it identified itself as the sponsor only at the end of its calls.

But Carl Forti of the National Republican Congressional Campaign Committee said the party's calls were within the law, and he denied that the committee phoned voters more than once a day or in the middle of the night. "These calls are meant to inform people, not annoy people," Forti said. "We've been doing phone calls like this for years. We clearly state we're making the calls at the end."

Adding to the tension in both parties was the release of seven national surveys since Saturday that sharply diverged in their portraits of the electorate.

In four of those — released by Fox News, Newsweek, Time and CNN — Bush's approval rating ranged between 35% and 38%, and Democrats led by at least 13 percentage points when voters were asked which party they intended to support today.

But in polls released by USA Today/Gallup, ABC/Washington Post and the Pew center, Bush's approval rating ranged from 38% to 43%, and the Democratic lead in the ballot stood at 4 to 7 percentage points.

That latter group of surveys inspired some anxiety in Democratic circles and cautious optimism among Republicans that they could avoid severe losses. The Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group in Washington, estimated late last month that individual candidates, the two parties and their allied groups would spend $2.6 billion in the election. That would make this the most expensive midterm election ever, with spending nearly 20% higher than in 2002.

*

ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

Times staff writers Janet Hook, Richard Simon, Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar and James Gerstenzang contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Viewers guide to election night

Even as Californians are still voting, the election's trends should be clear from other states. Here's how political pros will be watching the returns:

The battle for the House

Polls in Indiana close early, and all eyes will be on the fate of three endangered House Republicans there. If Democrats sweep these races, it could be the start of a big night for the party. If Republicans hold their losses to one seat, or keep all three, they'll be feeling better about the national picture.

Attention will quickly shift to a cluster of Northeastern states — Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania. Several GOP incumbents, including such party stalwarts as Christopher Shays and Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut and Thomas M. Reynolds in New York, are at risk. To win the House, Democrats must defeat most of these Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0091694

In New Hampshire, six-term GOP Rep. Charles Bass faces a tough reelection fight. If he loses, it could be a sign of a national Democratic "wave."

Georgia presents the GOP with one of its few chances to gain a House seat. A Republican win over Democratic Rep. John Barrow would hearten GOP leaders.

As results come in from the Midwest, attention will focus on Ohio. Scandal has plagued the state GOP, creating multiple opportunities in House districts for Democrats. Their scenario for capturing the House depends in part on winning most of these seats, including the one given up by disgraced GOP Rep. Bob Ney.

If House control remains in doubt as polls close in the West, a handful of races in Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona will be in the spotlight. The contest for the Albuquerque-area seat held by Republican Heather A. Wilson is a likely bellwether of the national drift.

The battle for the Senate

Maryland and Virginia contests loom large. A loss by GOP Sen. George Allen in Virginia would be a huge step toward a Democratic-controlled Senate. Conversely, if Allen survives and Republican Michael Steele wins in heavily Democratic Maryland, Republican chances of maintaining its Senate majority would dramatically improve.

Democrats hope to have won four of the six seats they need for a Senate majority as votes are counted in the country's midsection. If that's the case, Missouri becomes the key battleground. The race between GOP incumbent Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill has been close from day one, and the result may not be known for hours.

Depending on the Missouri results, Senate control may hinge on Montana. For months, Democrats were confident they would beat GOP incumbent Conrad Burns, but the race has tightened and it could be one of the night's nail-biters.

Future Rests On GOP Incumbents' Outcomes (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 7, 2006

The fate of a clutch of endangered Republican incumbents, including some from states that heavily supported President Bush two years ago, will determine who controls the Senate for the rest of the Bush presidency. Both parties are spending millions of dollars in last-ditch efforts to influence those contests.

By contrast, few Democratic incumbents are in danger this year. Nearly every Democratic senator seeking re-election seems assured of another term, polls suggest.

Not so with Republicans.

Facing difficult re-election battles are Republican Sens. Conrad Burns of Montana, George Allen of Virginia, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

Furthermore, Republicans face a strong challenge in Tennessee for the now-GOP seat held by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Democrats also were hopeful for an upset victory over Arizona Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, where polls have shown a tightening contest in recent days between the incumbent and former state Democratic Party chairman Jim Pederson, a shopping mall developer.

Democrats need a gain of six seats to win back the Senate, which they last controlled in 2002. Republicans now control 55 seats in the 100-member chamber.

Republicans are facing headwinds that include an increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, a president with low approval ratings, voter disgust over a slew of congressional scandals and the historic pattern of midterm losses in the sixth year for the party holding the White House

"The political environment has been very tough for Republicans for many, many months," acknowledged Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who heads the Senate Republican campaign effort. "No question about it."

Republicans picked up Senate seats in both the 2002 and 2004 elections. But strategists in both parties expect Democratic gains on Tuesday. Even if Democrats don't reclaim the Senate, they are clearly within striking distance of doing so.

And any pickup will increase their leverage in a chamber where strict rules dictate that 60 votes, rather than a simple 51-vote majority, are needed to advance any controversial piece of legislation or nomination.

With time running out, voter turnout has become the focus of both parties.

"The Bush team has been magnificent at turning out the vote in the last three elections. And this is their final challenge," said GOP strategist Scott Reed.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, on Monday said Democrats are "on the edge" of regaining the Senate, but declined to predict a Democratic takeover.

DOJ_NMG_0091695

"Of the eight states where we have a chance to pick up seats, six are red (Republican)," Schumer told a news conference. "So it's a tough map." He said the biggest battlegrounds remain the border states of Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — seats whose present occupants are Republicans.

In the final days, "this is an election that is about the intensity of our base versus the intensity of their base," said GOP pollster and strategist Ed Goeas.

For Democrats, the Iraq war is providing most of the momentum. "It's generated their money, it's generated their activism." But on the Republican side, the threat of terrorism, taxes and fear of Democratic leadership of Congress are the big motivators, Goeas said.

Despite Democratic optimism over the possibility of a sweep on Tuesday, some party elders were cautious.

"There's a huge anti-Republican wave out there, but that wave's going to crash against a fairly stable, very stable, Republican political structure," said Democratic pollster and consultant Mark Mellman. "And so, it's a lot easier for Democrats to get votes than for Democrats to get seats."

"I have no doubt we're going to get a lot of votes, but getting seats is a harder nut to crack," Mellman said.

Nearly all the endangered Republicans would have to lose for Democrats to prevail. And Republicans were hopeful that Sen. Allen in Virginia and Republican Bob Corker in Tennessee would be able to win, citing a narrowing of the polls.

Democrats are fairly confident of picking up GOP seats in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

But their hopes of also picking up now-Republican seats in Missouri, Rhode Island and Montana were going down to the wire after a concerted GOP counteroffensive in those states.

Also, Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez in New Jersey found himself as probably the only Democratic incumbent on Tuesday's ballot locked in a tight fight. He faced a strong challenge from Republican Tom Kean Jr., namesake of a popular former governor.

As Campaign Clock Winds Down, Parties Press On (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Candidates made final appeals and party tacticians worked to boost voter turnout Monday as Americans prepared for potentially critical midterm elections.

Today's results will decide the fate of all 435 House seats, 33 Senate seats and governorships in 36 states and set the tone and agenda for the final two years of President Bush's second term.

The key question: whether Democrats can take advantage of national dissatisfaction with Bush and the war in Iraq to win the 15 seats they need to control the House of Representatives and six seats they need to take the Senate.

Republican leaders cited narrowing polls in Senate races in Montana, Rhode Island and Maryland as signs of an 11th-hour surge.

Bush finished the campaign before an estimated 10,000 people in Dallas, accusing Democrats of having no plan for the Iraq war. “We have a plan — stick with us, and the country will be better off," he said.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said he's confident. “I think there's a lot of energy on the Democratic side,” said Emanuel, an Illinois congressman. “As a kid from Chicago, I'm proud of the get-out-the-vote machine that we have put together.”

The final pre-election USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found Democrats favored over Republicans for Congress by 51%-44%. Polls in Missouri, Montana, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia found Democrats struggling to win the final Senate seat they need for control.

As candidates made a final sprint, both parties kicked in operations to get their core voters to the polls. Turnout should increase from 39.7% in 2002 and may exceed the most recent midterm high of 42.1% in 1982, according to Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate.

Gans does not expect this year's turnout to top the all-time benchmark of 47% in 1970.

Bad weather that might affect turnout was forecast for the Northwest and Southeast, with sogginess in Washington and western Oregon. Moderate to heavy rainfall is expected in Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina, and showers are predicted across Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania.

Both parties continued to pour money into close House and Senate races. This year's spending is expected to be $2.8 billion, according to the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks campaign money. That's a 27% increase from 2002.

On the campaign's final day, the two parties had their best-known campaigners continuing to barn-storm the country.

DOJ_NMG_0091696

Bush used the last day of a 10-state tour to stump for GOP gubernatorial candidates in Florida, Arkansas and Texas. Bush has been focusing on places where he is popular. In Florida, GOP gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist did not attend Bush's rally for Republican candidates in Pensacola.

Crist said he considered the Pensacola area so firmly in his camp that it made more sense to campaign elsewhere in his race to replace Gov. Jeb Bush, who is leaving office due to term limits. White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove questioned the decision.

"Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours' notice," Rove said.

The White House said 7,600 people came to Bush's rally.

Bush planned today to vote near his ranch near Crawford, Texas, and return to Washington afterward.

In Rochester, N.Y., former president Bill Clinton campaigned for Democratic House candidates.

"We've got to get all ours out, and then you've got to hunt for people still standing on the diving board," Clinton said. "And when you find one, tell them what the choice is. … Grab them by the hand and tell them it's time to jump off to a better future."

US Senate Goes Down To The Wire (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON

In the Senate, it's too close to call.

On the eve of the 2006 midterm elections, a last-minute tightening in the polls of Senate contests from Montana to Rhode Island to Maryland has thrown some doubt into the calculations of pundits who had come to see a Democratic takeover as possible.

Many analysts - including conservatives - can see a clear path to a Democratic net gain of five seats in the 100-seat chamber, which would bring the partisan balance sheet to a 50-50 tie. That would effectively keep control in the hands of the Republicans, with Vice President Cheney casting tie-breaking votes in his role as president of the Senate.

But it was that elusive sixth seat that had kept many analysts from firmly predicting a change in control. Now, the last-minute volatility both in the nationwide polls gauging voter preferences and in individual races leaves the outcome even more in doubt.

"There tends to be a tightening at the end, when people begin to perhaps reappraise the preferences that they had early on," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Jersey. "New evidence comes in. People are reluctant to abandon old party allegiances."

Politicians themselves can become brand names in their home states, and thus, voters in Rhode Island and Montana who once appeared set to throw out their two Republican senators Lincoln Chafee and Conrad Burns may be having second thoughts, judging by the tightening of polls there. Senator Chafee, a first-termer whose father was long-serving Sen. John Chafee, can count on some reserve affection for the Chafee name and for Lincoln's status as the Senate's most liberal Republican; Senator Burns, who was caught up in the Jack Abramoff scandal, also may be coming out the other end of that crucible.

"My sense is that Burns may have gone through his roughest patch a couple of months ago," says Dr. Baker. "Sometimes voters are willing to hold onto an incumbent despite the warts."

And sometimes they're not. With the national mood toxic toward the Republican-controlled Capitol, and analysts foreseeing a "wave" election likely to sweep the Democrats into power in the House, it may too much for the most vulnerable Republican incumbents to withstand.

Still, not only do Democrats have to win the Montana and Rhode Island seats to build a Senate majority, they must also succeed in traditionally Republican areas. Two GOP incumbents are also widely seen as heading for defeat - Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, and Mike DeWine of Ohio. If Burns and Chafee go down and no Democratic-held seats change control - a big "if" - the Democrats must win two out of the three "fire wall" seats, in Tennessee, Virginia, and Missouri.

Of those three, Tennessee seems the most difficult for Democrats to take. Rep. Harold Ford (D) has turned what should have been a Republican romp for former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R) into a tight contest. The incumbent, Senate Republican leader Bill Frist, is retiring, and open seats are usually harder to defend, but Mr. Ford's charismatic campaign style has made the race competitive. If he wins, he would be the first African-American senator from the South since Reconstruction.

Virginia and Missouri remain firmly in the tossup column going into Tuesday's vote. The Missouri race pits state auditor Claire McCaskill (D) against incumbent Sen. Jim Talent (R) - with a ballot initiative on stem-cell research possibly holding the key to the outcome. Senator Talent opposes a proposed state constitutional amendment allowing embryonic stem-cell research while Ms. McCaskill supports it. The issue could drive turnout, but it remains unclear who benefits more.

DOJ_NMG_0091697

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen's troubled reelection campaign is the big surprise of the '06 midterms. Once thought to be a top contender for the 2008 presidential race, he could be facing the end of his political career. A series of stumbles that began in August, when Senator Allen called a volunteer for the opposing campaign "macaca," has made conservative Democrat Jim Webb competitive.

To Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, head of his party's Senate campaign committee, the fact that his party even has a shot at taking a majority is astounding. At the start of the cycle, he and Senate minority leader Harry Reid (D) of Nevada agreed that "if we can hold our own, we will be happy, and if we can pick up seats we'll be really happy," he told reporters last week.

Now, it's all over but the shouting. At a Monday morning rally at the Vienna, Va., subway stop, Allen was often drowned out by antiwar protesters shouting: "Get out of Iraq!," "The troops hate you," "Let's Go Webb," and "Macaca," as Allen supporters tried to drown them out with cries of "Allen! Allen!"

"It's a close race," said Allen. "Iraqis have to stand up ... the one thing we cannot do is leave Iraq a safe haven for terrorists."

Commenting on what has become one of the most negative campaigns in the nation, Allen said: "We have tried throughout the whole campaign to talk about ideas, issues. Instead, we've run into this sort of thing." He gestured to the shouting protesters, one of whom stumbles into the senator, nearly knocking him over.

"I know Virginia, and if you want to serve Virginia, you better know Virginia, and that is what we are going to see [in the vote] tomorrow," he said, exiting to the day's next event.

GOP: Back From The Senate Brink (HILL)

The Hill, November 7, 2006

While the Republican Party leadership in the House seems doomed to move into a well deserved minority, the GOP shows increasing signs of being able to hang on to the Senate, although perhaps by the thinnest of margins.

Running up a down escalator of sinking Republican fortunes, skillful GOP consultants and strategists have managed to hold the races in Missouri and Virginia to single-digit leads either way and to catch up to large Democratic leads in Montana and Rhode Island.

Most of these four seats are still likely to go Democrat, but they need to win all four to get control and that appears, at this moment, to be a daunting task.

Generally, it is an iron law of politics that when an incumbent is under 50 percent, he is through, but with Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) at 49 percent in the latest Gallup poll and Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) hovering between 48 and 49, the chances that they could pick up the remaining point or two remain pretty good.

Why the reversal in Republican fortunes? Luck has a lot to do with it. Sen. John Kerry's (D-Mass.) outburst might well have cost the Democrats the Senate; and the timing, perhaps not so coincidental, of the Saddam Hussein death verdict also bolsters Republican fortunes.

But the real reason is more likely that GOP base voters, alienated by their party's inept leadership of both Houses of Congress, their scandals, and their inability to pass tax reform, Social Security reform or overall immigration reform took one look at the Democrats and decided to come home. In effect, they fast-forwarded to Election Day and were appalled at the prospect of a Democratic win. Recoiling from its implications, they began to return to the party fold in the nick of time.

Of course, winning one house will suit the Democratic purposes quite nicely — especially if it is the House of Representatives that they win. House rules will let the Democrats pass one-house bills until their hearts are content, using their majority to pass a wish list of campaign promises without any accountability, knowing for sure that their offerings won't make it past the Senate or the White House.

Control of the lower house will also give them the committee chairmanships and the subpoena power that goes with it that will let them wage a two-year campaign for the presidency.

In this sense, Election Day 2006 is really a down payment for the Democratic White House race in 2008. Winning one house will go a long way toward winning the entire game two years hence.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

See How They Run: An Election-Night Guide With Many Key Races In East, Midwest, Prevailing Party May Be Evident Early On By CHRISTOPHER COOPER (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0091698

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Is a rout on the way for Republicans? Opinions vary on both sides of the question, which also may hinge on the definition of "rout." When asked to assess the state of play on election eve, White House spokesman Tony Fratto simply notes, "We're still in the game."

That may be the most realistic way to sum up the party's prospects. Up and down the ticket, Republican candidates are locked in so many close races that their hold on Washington and state capitals seems likely to slip, perhaps precipitously.

For Republicans, the most alarming losses could come in the House, where Democrats need a 15-seat net pickup to gain control and Republicans are defending about 50 vulnerable districts.

FOLLOW THE VOTE

See an hour-by-hour election-night schedule of poll closings1 in some key House races. Adobe Acrobat required2. · Election Quiz:3 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com4, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video5 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20066.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

7 · Review the results of the latest polls8 in hot Senate races, and see what the data could mean for the breakdown of seats in the chamber after Election Day.

· The Senate's Uncertain States:9 Interactive profiles of the demographics and candidates in hard fought Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Virginia.

· Battlegrounds Poll:10 Who's ahead in the most hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data. See the Zogby poll results11.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

12 · Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers13

· Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts14

· Chief Concerns: Who heads key committees if Democrats win the House?15

Though Republican prospects seem slightly brighter in the Senate, where six seats currently determine political control, enough of these races are now toss-ups to put the Democrats within striking distance. Judging from the polls, the over-under betting on Democratic pickups of Senate seats hovers at around five.

For political spectators, the bad news is this: Razor-edge contests can spark legal challenges and recounts that can take days to sort out. The good news: Many of the most important races are in the Eastern and Central time zones. If an angry tide is poised to swamp Republicans, it could be apparent before most political junkies call it a night. Connecticut, Florida, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York together hold 24 of the most competitive House seats in the country.

In the key races in those six states, the great majority of candidates are Republican incumbents. In the House, watch Indiana's Second District, where incumbent Republican Chris Chocola faces Democrat Joe Donnelly. Polling has shown a seesaw race for weeks. The campaign here may be an archetype for any political upheaval this year: Mr. Chocola has been a loyal Republican in a conservative-leaning district, supporting oil drilling in the Alaska wilderness, school vouchers and tax cuts. He won his district in 2004 with 54% of the vote, bested only by President Bush, who took 56% of the district. If revolution is in the air, it may well start in northern Indiana.

On the other hand, two races in the Northeast bear watching for early signs that voters may be willing to give some Republicans a pass. In Rhode Island, Sen. Lincoln Chaffee has staked his campaign on his early opposition to Mr. Bush's war policies, the source of much voter anger. This race is unusually volatile: after trailing in polls by double digits to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, Mr. Chaffee has surged lately to a slight lead.

Scandal also colors several races this year. In New York's 26th District, Rep. Tom Reynolds, who heads the House Republican campaign committee, is locked in a race he would probably have won handily only just months ago but for a once-obscure Florida congressman named Mark Foley. Mr. Foley abruptly resigned in September after reports he had sent sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage former House pages. It later emerged Mr. Reynolds had picked up clues about Mr. Foley's behavior, even as he had urged him to run for re-election.

Mr. Reynolds has apologized for his role in the scandal, and recent polls put him in a near dead heat with Jack Davis, a Democrat he easily defeated in 2004.

For Democrats, taking the Senate is the brass ring and likely contingent on winning seats in Montana, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri and Virginia. But Democrat hopes will likely be dashed if they can't carry Maryland, being vacated by a Democrat, and New Jersey, where incumbent Robert Menendez is in a close race. Though Mr. Menendez has held a mid-single-digit lead in recent polling, a stumble here could bring Democrat dreams of Senate domination to a swift end.

DOJ_NMG_0091699

One of the most intriguing Senate races is in Virginia, where incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen has been trading punches with Democratic upstart James Webb in a contest that few had expected would be close.

A series of Allen missteps have put his once-secure seat into play. National Democrats have poured in money and manpower to boost Mr. Webb, President Reagan's Navy Secretary, who broke with his party over Iraq.

Polls over the weekend suggest Mr. Webb now has a slight lead.

In the open Tennessee Senate seat being vacated by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Democratic candidate Harold Ford has faded of late. But while Democrats might be able to afford losing that pickup and still capture control, they almost certainly need to take the Senate seat in Missouri, where Republican Sen. Jim Talent is locked in a razor-thin race with Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill.

How thin? The average of several recent polls gives Ms. McCaskill a 1.4 percentage-point edge, well within the statistical margin of error.

President Bush carried the state in 2004, but Mr. Talent doesn't have the reputation as a hard closer. In winning the seat in a special election in 2002, he was five points up in the polls on Election Day, only to squeeze out a one-point win.

One more race may bear watching before calling it a night. In Idaho, the reddest of red states, with a Republican congressional delegation, state legislature and governor, Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jerry Brady has a five-point lead in the polls.

If voters turn against Republicans in Idaho, it could be a rough two years for them until 2008.

Write to Christopher Cooper at christopher.cooper@wsj.com16

Down To The Wire: Expect A Big Night For Democrats (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

With only a few hours remaining until the votes start being counted, there is little uncertainty about the fight for the House, except for questions about exactly which Republican incumbents will be lucky enough to survive.

Polls over the past few weeks have seen many Republicans who once held clear, if not overwhelming, leads scrambling to try to stay ahead. GOP strategists say that voters increasingly have been focusing on Iraq, and that the added attention has worked to the disadvantage of Republican candidates.

Republican chances for retaining the House have moved from small to smaller, and public and private polling now suggests a solid Democratic win. The majority's losses this year will be lower than during the wave elections of 1958, 1974 and 1994, but only because of structural factors: The way districts have been drawn and the relatively small number of Republicans holding Democratic districts effectively minimize potential Democratic gains.

Having said that, this fight still is taking place almost entirely on Republican turf. With Republican House seats such as Idaho's 1st district, Kansas' 2nd, California's 11th and even Wyoming's at-large in play, it's clear which party is on the offensive.

National polls continue to show the Democrats with an advantage on the generic ballot, though there is no agreement on its size. Is it 4 points, as the Pew Research survey found; 6 points, as The Washington Post/ABC News poll has it; or 20 points, as CNN's poll says? Obviously, those numbers could produce dramatically different national outcomes.

Still, even the most optimistic Republican insiders I can find seem to think a loss of 18 or 19 seats is inevitable, while others counter that a loss of more than 30 is more likely. Most GOP insiders would be ecstatic if the party held its losses to two dozen or less.

Democratic gains of anywhere from 25 to as many as 40 seats are possible. Last week, I went on record saying I expected a Democratic gain of 34 to 40 seats as the most likely range. That now strikes me as a bit high, but only at the low end. So, I am adjusting my House estimate/projection slightly, to a Democratic gain of 30 to 36 seats.

Of course, even more GOP seats could fall if all of the endangered Republicans lose and we see more than a couple of surprises.

The House results are likely to wipe out many moderate Republicans, who are taking the brunt of the wave because they represent Democratic-leaning or competitive districts.

Over in the Senate, things remain far less clear. While I have been widely credited with predicting a six-seat Democrat gain (and therefore control of the Senate), what I've written is that Democrats will net five to seven seats. I'd now like to widen that range to four to seven seats.

According to some polls, races in Maryland, Montana and Rhode Island have tightened, making the net outcome less certain. But I'm still expecting Democrats to win Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana and Rhode Island, and, less confidently, Virginia.

Two seats, Tennessee and Missouri, have looked tight for months, and they could go either way.

DOJ_NMG_0091700

Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.) has run a good race, but he isn't facing a longtime incumbent, and he may not win the undecided voters the way other Democratic challengers will. All things being equal, that probably is enough reason to push the race to Republican Bob Corker.

But a big enough national Democratic wave across the country — or maybe more accurately, an anti-Bush, anti-Republican wave — could sweep Ford to victory. I'd consider it a mild surprise, though.

In Missouri, Sen. Jim Talent (R) is locked in a tight race against Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, and most polling shows little daylight between the two candidates. I've seen polls with McCaskill ahead, and I've seen polls with Talent leading.

The prudent thing to do, of course, is to leave the race as a tossup, since either candidate could win. But, of course, I didn't do that in my most recent newsletter. I pushed the race toward McCaskill, since in "wave" elections, virtually all of the close races go to the party benefiting from the wave, and this year that is the Democrats.

In reality, I won't be surprised no matter who wins in Missouri.

GOP prospects seem to have faded significantly in New Jersey, and the better chance for a Republican upset now seems to be Maryland.

The outcome in the Senate remains cloudy, no matter how much I would like to be able to predict party control. I expect Democrats to gain at least four seats, and I'm more than a bit skeptical about the Republican "surge."

House Poised To Flip; Senate Teeters (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, November 7, 2006

Democrats, who have succeeded in expanding the midterm battleground deep into Republican territory, are poised to make gains in both the House and Senate when voters across the country go to the polls today.

But while there is little question that Democrats are well-positioned to win at least the 15 seats needed to take the House majority, the magnitude of their victory rests largely on their ability to win a number of what were once second-, third- and even fourth-tier contests.

In the Senate, late shifts in a handful of competitive races has put the Democrats' final math somewhat in flux after a monthlong intense focus on Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia as the states expected to decide control of the chamber.

Virginia and Missouri remain pure tossup contests, but momentum in Tennessee has appeared to shift toward Republicans in the closing week. Meanwhile, renewed focus on embattled Sen. Conrad Burns' (R) potential ability to eke out a victory over state Senate President Jon Tester (D) in Montana has slightly shifted the Senate map. Polls also have shown Sen. Lincoln Chafee's (R-R.I.) race for re-election tightening, but Democrats still are viewed as having the advantage there.

Democrats also are making a late push to pick up a GOP-held seat in Arizona while Republicans hold out hope for swiping a Democratic seat in Maryland.

In the House, expert eyes have been trained on the expanding field of top-tier races and the number of GOP incumbents who once were considered safe and are now in re-election dog fights.

Just after Labor Day, around 20 GOP-held House seats looked to be pure tossups. Today, more than double that number are considered tossups or are tilting toward a Democratic takeover.

Perennial targets such as GOP Reps. Jim Gerlach (Pa.), Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Heather Wilson (N.M.) are still fighting for their political lives in down-to-the-wire contests.

But Republican Reps. Gil Gutknecht (Minn.), Melissa Hart (Pa.), Marilyn Musgrave (Colo.), Richard Pombo (Calif.) and Jim Ryun (Kan.), all of whom were heavily favored to win re-election two months ago, all could be headed for defeat today. Democrats' ability to upset those Republican incumbents and others such as Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.), Anne Northup (Ky.) or even Mark Souder (Ind.) will determine just how big their likely majority will be.

In one of the most prominent examples of a late-breaking race for Democrats, Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) is now in grave peril when just weeks ago his re-election chances seemed fairly solid. A late surge by attorney Paul Hodes (D) was fueled by a massive national party ad buy against Bass.

Likewise, in Connecticut, Rep. Nancy Johnson (R) began the cycle appearing to have the best re-election chances of the state's three Republican House Members. Now, Johnson looks most likely to lose, and GOP Reps. Christopher Shays and Rob Simmons could go down as well.

The Nutmeg State is just one place where Republicans appear poised to suffer multiple losses in today's balloting. Those losses appear concentrated geographically in New England, the Mid-Atlantic and the Midwest — most notably Indiana, Ohio, New York and Pennsylvania — but Democrats also have the potential of picking up multiple seats in Western states such as Arizona and Colorado.

DOJ_NMG_0091701

Some Republicans, most notably Reps. Jean Schmidt (Ohio), Barbara Cubin (Wyo.), and state Rep. Bill Sali, who is running for an open seat in Idaho, have a problem in that they remain unpopular with some factions of their base — forcing the national GOP to spend millions to help save what ordinarily would be considered safe seats.

Also, Republicans seem destined to suffer heavy losses of open seats they currently control. GOP-held seats in Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Ohio and New York already appear to be gone. Likewise, seats in Idaho, Illinois, Minnesota, Nevada and Wisconsin are considered too close to give one party the advantage.

Among vulnerable Democrats, freshman Rep. John Barrow (Ga.) has emerged as the most likely incumbent to go down to defeat in today's balloting, but even so the race is a tossup. Barrow faces former Rep. Max Burns (R), the man he beat in 2004, in a redrawn district that only marginally favors Democrats.

Both parties claimed momentum heading into today's vote.

Democrats tried to focus their talking points on Iraq on Monday, with both campaign committee leaders holding separate media events to draw attention to the issue.

In a conference call with reporters, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) made his final attempt to frame the elections as a cycle where voters will choose a new direction over a "stay the course" strategy.

He also expressed confidence in his party's turnout and field operations.

"I think there's a lot of energy on the Democratic side," Emanuel said.

Republicans, meanwhile, continued the get-out-the-vote drumbeat, boasting that their superior turnout operation ultimately will trump the deficit they currently face in public polling.

In a memo Monday, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman noted that late polls have showed a narrowing gap in the Democrats' generic ballot advantage.

"The GOP's 72-hour program has reached 27 million volunteer contacts through Saturday, hitting 3 million voters this Saturday alone," Mehlman wrote. "By and large, this effort will have its impact on Election Day and will not show up in most public opinion polls."

Meanwhile, possible recounts aside, there are at least two races that will not be decided today and appear headed for all-but-certain runoffs.

In Louisiana, embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D) has drawn a dozen challengers in the all-party primary that will be held today. If no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, the top two vote-getters will face off in a December runoff.

Most observers believe Jefferson will make the runoff and state Rep. Karen Carter (D) appears positioned to be his most likely runoff opponent.

In Texas, Rep. Henry Bonilla (R) faces an all-party special general election, after the Supreme Court ordered the redrawing Congressional boundaries after the March primaries had taken place.

Six Democrats are challenging Bonilla today, with a December runoff if no candidate gets more than 50 percent of the vote, which appears likely.

Wealthy businessman Lukin Gilliland, former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez and former San Antonio Fire Department District Chief Albert Uresti are the leading Democratic contenders, with Gilliland considered the favorite of national party insiders to face off against Bonilla in the runoff.

Angry Campaigns End On An Angrier Note (WP)

By Jim VandeHei And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

As the 2006 campaign staggered to an angry close, national security and the Iraq war dominated the final-day debate of midterm elections in which national themes, not simply local choices, have framed the most competitive races. Democrats said a vote for them would force change in Iraq strategy, while President Bush led the GOP charge in warning that the opposition party cannot be trusted in a time of war.

Dozens of too-close-to-call House and Senate races finished on a surly tone, as the traditional political strategy of shifting to a positive message at campaign's end gave way this year to a calculation that the best chance to tip the balance was through continued attacks over personal character and alleged corruption.

But strategists on both sides said yesterday that national security broadly -- and Iraq specifically -- are likely to determine control of Congress today. Unlike in the 2002 and 2004 elections, when Republicans held a decisive edge on national security, polls over the past year have shown the public losing faith in the war and the GOP, and Democratic candidates nationwide were using their last TV advertising dollars on spots critical of Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0091702

"I think, frankly, people don't believe the president anymore" when it comes to the war, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, echoing other party leaders, said in an interview. "We are telling people if they want to stay the course, vote Republican. If you want a change of direction, vote Democrat."

Bush, however, was betting that the Republican Party's historic advantage with voters in times when security issues are prominent will pay dividends again. "As you go to the polls, remember we're at war," he told thousands of GOP supporters in Pensacola, Fla. "And if you want this country to do everything in its power to protect you and at the same time lay a foundation for peace for generations to come, vote Republican."

Democrats confidently predicted that they will win control of the House and trim if not topple the GOP's Senate majority. Republican operatives, however, said there is mounting evidence that fears about the nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea, coupled with more generalized doubts about Democratic competence and fortitude on national security, have provided GOP candidates with much-needed momentum in the final days. GOP tracking polls, these strategists said, have shown a slight but steady uptick since Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), in what he called a botched joke, suggested that uneducated people end up fighting in Iraq -- a comment that infuriated top Democrats despite the 2004 presidential nominee's repeated apologies and explanations.

"All of those things remind people we are at war and the importance of the national security issue," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee.

There are more than two dozen House races and at least five Senate contests that both sides considered too close to call heading into Election Day. A series of public polls released over the past few days offers contradictory findings about the public's views nationally and in many key races, confounding strategists in both parties. Some surveys show Republicans gaining on the generic question of whom respondents plan to vote for, while others suggest that Democrats are pulling away. The most recent, from CNN, showed Democrats with a 20-point advantage on the generic ballot question, which asks people which party they prefer but does not offer a choice between specific candidates.

Whether Republicans will succumb to adverse trends or manage to at least partly blunt them will determine whether Democrats can win back the House or Senate or both -- all scenarios that could dramatically change the trajectory of Bush's final two years in office.

Regardless of the margins, officials in both parties are planning for the stiffest challenge yet to Bush's war policy when Congress returns for its lame-duck session next week. Lawmakers are also bracing for GOP leadership changes in the House and Senate and a new policy agenda that is not dictated by the White House. Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leader of House conservatives, has told colleagues that he plans to seek a top leadership position, congressional aides said.

Democrats, who lost control of the House in 1994, need a net gain of 15 seats to win it back. Republicans generally agree that the opposition is on track to do that, but they hold out hope that a superior voter-turnout effort will tip just enough races to preserve the narrowest of House majorities.

A top GOP strategist said yesterday that several GOP House members who appeared safe one month ago -- including Reps. Charles Bass (N.H.) and Melissa Hart (Pa.) -- are in serious jeopardy. If Bass and Hart lose, it could signal mass casualties for the GOP, other strategists say.

Senior strategists in both parties said the GOP is virtually certain to lose 10 seats, mostly because of a variety of scandals. If these projections are correct, Republicans would have to win more than three-quarters of the 30 or so races that were tied heading into the final weekend.

Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg, who released a survey of 50 districts yesterday showing Democrats up 49 percent to 44 percent, said Republicans have closed the gap slightly, but not enough to save their majority. "I don't see any evidence of anything but a minor pushback of getting some of the most partisan Republicans re-engaged," Greenberg said. Using his poll, he predicted Democrats will win 30 to 35 seats "as a conservative estimate."

It will be much harder for Democrats to pick up the six seats needed to control the Senate. GOP Sens. Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Rick Santorum (Pa.) are far behind in state-based polling, but Republicans have a shot at winning the five other targeted GOP seats: in Missouri, Montana, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia. Republicans also have a chance to pick up Democratic seats in Maryland and New Jersey, though both are uphill efforts.

Three premier contests -- Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia -- have been in the tossup category for several weeks. Republicans said yesterday that they think Tennessee is the most likely of the three to remain in their hands. Democrats said a big turnout among black voters is Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.'s best chance for a narrow victory over former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker, who polls show has taken control of the race in recent days. In Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) is fighting for his political life against Democrat James Webb, while the race in Missouri between Sen. James M. Talent (R) and State Auditor Claire McCaskill is considered the tightest.

DOJ_NMG_0091703

Two other races have given Republicans reason to hope that they can hold the Senate. In Rhode Island, Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R) has closed the gap in his contest against former attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse. But Chafee is running into one of the stiffest headwinds in the country, with only about a quarter of voters there approving of Bush's performance.

In Montana, weekend polls painted a conflicting picture of the battle between Sen. Conrad Burns (R) and state Senate President Jon Tester. One survey showed a tie, while another gave Tester a clear lead. Bush and Vice President Cheney campaigned there last week, but Tester has been getting help from popular Gov. Brian Schweitzer.

Campaign volunteers continued to make telephone calls and walk precincts in the most contested races in an effort to maximize voter turnout. A Washington Post-ABC News poll found that as of Saturday, 41 percent of registered voters said they had been contacted directly by a campaign or party, up from 29 percent two weeks earlier.

Of those who said they had been contacted, 29 percent said they had heard from Republicans, 20 percent said they had heard from Democrats and 41 percent said they had been contacted by both parties. Several officials said this comports with anecdotal evidence that Republicans have done a better job than Democrats of reaching voters in the final stretch.

"We've got to get our votes out," former president Bill Clinton said during a campaign stop for House candidates in New York. "There are still people who will go to the polls tomorrow not entirely sure of who they're going to vote for because, frankly, a lot of these people never voted for us before."

Kerry Gaffe Loses Independents For His Party (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Sen. John Kerry's gaffe that Americans who do not do well in school end up in Iraq has triggered deep doubts among some independent voters about voting Democratic in the elections, according to a new Pew poll.

The poll found that 18 percent of independent voters -- considered pivotal in today's congressional elections -- said they had "serious doubts about voting for a Democratic candidate" because of Mr. Kerry's comments last week.

For most of this year, polls have shown independent voters supporting Democrats by lopsided margins, but yesterday's Pew poll said the Republicans "have made major gains, in a relatively short time period, among independent voters."

Democrats now lead Republicans among independents by 44 percent to 33 percent, compared with 47 percent to 29 percent in mid-October, according to Pew's poll of 2,369 registered voters Wednesday through Saturday.

In a speech to students at Pasadena City College in California last week, Mr. Kerry said, "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

The Massachusetts liberal's remark was seen by critics and fellow Democrats as demeaning the educational levels of U.S. service members. It forced him to cancel all of his campaign appearances after apologizing for comments he called "a botched joke" about President Bush's intelligence.

While most voters (78 percent) said Mr. Kerry's remarks were "not a serious consideration," 19 percent of all voters thought otherwise, representing a potentially significant shift of "voting intentions" and raising speculation of further erosion among independents for the Democrats.

Five percent of the Democrats polled said Mr. Kerry's remarks could affect their votes as well, Pew said.

Pew said it found that "Republicans have become more engaged and enthused in the election than they had been in September and October. As a result, Republicans now register a greater likelihood of voting than do Democrats."

Overall, Democrats led Republicans by 47 percent to 43 percent among likely voters in the poll, a decline of three points for the Democrats and an increase of four points for the Republicans in the generic ballot survey.

Pew also found a sharp increase in voter approval of the economy, with 44 percent "rating it as excellent or good, compared with 36 percent who held that view in mid-October."

Polls Give GOP A Lift On Election Eve (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Republicans are counting on a late surge in the public-opinion polls to cut their expected losses as a record number of American voters are predicted to participate in today's midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0091704

Democrats expressed concerns yesterday about recent polls that suggested a slip in support, but they are still widely expected to pick up a significant number of seats in both houses of Congress and deliver President Bush his first electoral setback since he was first elected in 2000.

"We are feeling very, very good about things," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Other Democrats are less ebullient. His House counterpart, Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), said he was "nervous" about the latest polls.

Democrats need a net gain of six seats in the Senate and 15 in the House to take control of Congress. Since 1994, Republicans have held the House without interruption and the Senate nearly so. At least four Republican-held Senate seats -- Virginia, Missouri, Rhode Island and Montana -- along with Democrat-held Maryland, are widely considered too close to call.

Republicans on Capitol Hill, meanwhile, were guardedly optimistic that this year's much-predicted Democratic "tidal wave" will fail to materialize. Still, Republicans await the results more anxiously than Democrats.

Many Republicans delighted in recent polls conducted by the Pew Research Center and by the Washington Post/ABC News that showed Democrats losing their considerable advantage in the final days of the election.

The campaign of Sen. Rick Santorum, the Pennsylvania Republican who is widely expected to lose his bid for a third term today, thanked Democratic opponent Bob Casey Jr. for bringing "San Francisco liberal Rep. Nancy Pelosi," the House minority leader, into the state this weekend to campaign with him.

"The fact that so-called 'moderate' Casey would welcome Pelosi and her extremist liberal record to Pennsylvania in the final days of a campaign shocked and motivated the Republican base," said campaign manager Vince Galko. He said her appearance helped Republicans set a record of more than 380,000 contacts with voters over a two-day period.

The Republican majority in the House is widely considered to be at greater risk than in the Senate. More than 30 Republican-held seats nationwide are thought to be in jeopardy, including seats left open by scandal-plagued Republicans Tom DeLay of Texas, Bob Ney of Ohio and Mark Foley of Florida. There are no more than a handful of vulnerable Democrats.

Whatever the outcome of today's election, both sides are poised to complain of electoral shenanigans.

Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way, warned reporters of "glitches" and "skulduggery" that had already been documented that might suppress the vote.

"Beware of voter fraud," warned the Republican National Committee, which compiled reports from across the country of Democratic allies trying to register the dead, illegal or those who are already registered.

The DCCC yesterday accused the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) of spending $600,000 on "dirty tricks" in the form of late-night phone calls to voters disparaging Democratic candidates.

NRCC lawyer Donald F. McGahn II wrote the Democratic committee to say the disclaimers on the Republican calls are the same as those used by Democrats and noted several Democratic television commercials that were taken down over concerns about their veracity.

"Perhaps if you paid as much attention to your own client's political advertising as you apparently do my client's phone calls, the DCCC would have better luck in keeping its advertising on the air," Mr. McGahn wrote. "How are those spots in Indiana and Kentucky coming? Did you ever get those falsehoods on the air?"

Both sides have dispatched hundreds of lawyers into states expecting tight races and banked hundreds of thousands of dollars to fight any irregularities they suspect.

Yesterday, in the final hours of a long and bruising campaign, both sides made a final plea to voters. "We want to end the disgraceful lies and astonishing incompetence," promised Mr. Schumer, who said Democrats are "poised to win."

"But we're not spiking the ball until we get in the end zone. We need everyone to get their friends and families to the polls tomorrow," he wrote in an appeal to Democratic voters. "And we need a final fundraising push for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Every dollar you give today is another van we can rent to drive people to the polls tomorrow and another person we can deploy to keep watch for any voter suppression activities."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, pointed to Republican accomplishments.

"Under the House Republican watch, gas prices are low, the stock market is at all-time highs, and America has not been attacked since September 11th," he said. "From economic security to national security to border security, House Republicans have tackled tough issues. If the Democrats gain the House majority, Nancy Pelosi has made it clear they will raise taxes, coddle terrorists, and provide amnesty to illegal immigrants."

Sean Rushton, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice, noted widespread speculation that there will be an opening on the Supreme Court in the near future. Senate confirmation of any Bush nominee would be dramatically more difficult if Democrats control the chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0091705

"For weeks, commentators have speculated that significant numbers of conservatives, alienated by overspending, the Iraq war, and other perceived GOP disappointments, will stay home on Election Day, giving one or both Houses of Congress to Democrats," he wrote yesterday on HumanEvents.com. "But for those who care about reforming the Supreme Court, sitting this one out may soon look like a mistake of historic proportions."

Replacing a liberal member of the high court "could be a once-in-a-lifetime chance for the 20-year movement to recast the court with a constitutionalist majority," Mr. Rushton said. "It would be a cruel twist indeed for conservatives to 'teach Republicans a lesson' next Tuesday, only to be taught a lesson themselves within months when the new Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy leads a Democratic majority against the most important Supreme Court nominee in decades."

Republicans Make Last-minute Push (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Edward Luce In Washington Dc And Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

The Republican party on Monday intensified last-minute efforts to motivate its supporters in the hope of defying widespread expectations of a strong Democratic showing in Tuesday's congressional midterm elections.

Citing an ABC-Washington Post poll that showed the Democratic lead narrowing to as little as six percentage points from a double-digit margin last week, Republican strategists said their volunteers had made direct contact with 27m American voters during the election campaign – far more than the Democrats.

"We have made more voter contacts in 2006 than we did in 2004, which is remarkable given that this is a mid-term election, not a presidential election," said Dana Perino, a White House spokesperson.

However, electoral analysts said the superiority of the Republican fundraising and "micro-targeting" machines would be insufficient to breach the wide Democratic lead, which was still averaging 11 percentage points if all the polls of the past few days were taken into account.

"No party in American history has ever come back from this kind of polling deficit to win an election," said Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report, Washington's most closely read daily electoral analysis. "The Democrats are still on course to win the House of Representatives by a healthy margin."

Separately, in an interview with the Financial Times in Baghdad on Monday, Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador to Iraq, said that the outcome of the election would have no impact on the war strategy of George W. Bush's administration. Iraq has consistently featured as the most important concern – in addition to economic anxieties – among voters during the campaign. "The president has told them [the government of Iraq] not to pay attention to that," said Mr Khalilzad. "The president will be the commander in chief and the architect of US foreign policy regardless of the outcome."

The Democrats, who need to add 15 seats to their tally in the 435-seat House of Representatives to regain control for the first time in 12 years, are projected to gain between 11 and 58 seats by Gallup. They need to add six seats to their tally in the 100-member Senate to regain control, with polls showing them winning between four and six races.

On Monday Mr Bush visited Florida, Arkansas and Texas in his final campaign events. But in a sign of his continued unpopularity, Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor of Florida, was unable to show up to the rally. Dick Cheney, the vice-president, plans to spend today duck-shooting.

Parties Spend $225M On Target Races (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 7, 2006

National committees for the Republicans and Democrats have spent about $225 million for or against candidates, concentrating their resources in 10 Senate races and 66 House contests that could determine who controls Congress.

The data is based on a review of independent spending reports filed with the Federal Election Commission as of Monday. Republicans spent about $81 million in 53 congressional districts, mostly on television advertising opposing Democratic challengers. Democrats spent $64 million in 56 congressional districts, most of them represented by a Republican.

In Senate contests, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has trained its sights on seats currently held by Republicans in Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee, Virginia, Rhode Island, Montana and Arizona. Republicans are aiming for three Democratic-held seats in New Jersey, Maryland and Michigan.

The parties have spent little or no money in Pennsylvania, where Republican Sen. Rick Santorum has trailed Democrat Bob Casey Jr., for months.

The spending data illustrates the difficulties facing Republicans in this elections, where they have been forced to defend seats instead of aggressively seeking to defeat incumbent Democrats. Midterm elections in second-term presidencies are notoriously harsh on the ruling party. For Republicans, growing public antipathy toward the war in Iraq has made their hold on Congress even more tenuous.

DOJ_NMG_0091706

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in the House and six seats in the Senate to capture control of Congress. The last time Democrats had majorities in both chambers was 1994.

The spending for House seats has been mostly concentrated in the Ohio Valley. Ten Republicans are vulnerable in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky. Another 10 are fending off strong challenges in Pennsylvania and New York.

Many independent groups, including labor, business and ideological organizations, are spending in some of the same contests that have attracted party money. The Missouri Senate race between incumbent Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill has attracted the most money, with parties and independent groups spending more than $20 million in the state.

The House race that has seen the most spending is a rematch between Pennsylvania Republican incumbent Jim Gerlach and Democrat Lois Murphy. Their district sits in southeastern Pennsylvania, nestled in the hills that run from the outer Philadelphia suburbs to the old industrial city of Reading. The National Republican Congressional Committee has spent $3.9 million, mostly in ads against Murphy, and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has spent $3 million against Gerlach.

Final Push Hefty Democratic Fund Raising Vies With Clout Of Incumbency Aggressive Money Machine Aims To Overcome Benefits Of Pork And Redistricting Mr. Shaw's Mobile Post Office By JEANNE CUMMINGS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- If Democrats win control of one or both houses of Congress in Tuesday's elections, they'll be able to thank an aggressive fund-raising strategy that has given them fuel to take advantage of voter dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq.

If the Republicans hang on, it will be largely because of two big advantages: the power to dole out government favors to constituents and their redrawing of districts to protect incumbents.

"It takes a tidal wave in order to swamp the levee that was built with redistricting," says Michael McDonald, a George Mason University expert on redrawing congressional lines. Election watchers are making a big deal of the more than 50 competitive seats in the House, Mr. McDonald says, but the unstated figure may be more important: nearly 90% of House incumbents are cruising to re-election.

ELECTION 2006

· Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

5 · Review the results of the latest polls6 in hot Senate races.

· The Senate's Uncertain States:7 Interactive profiles.

· Battlegrounds Poll:8 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

· Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers9

· Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts10

There are large and emotional issues that will help determine the election's outcome, including the economy and Iraq. But both parties are hoping that their tactical advantages will put them over the top.

Five days before Election Day, his feet propped up on a wooden desk, New York Sen. Charles Schumer was working the phones.

"Hi, David," he said, his voice bouncing off the walls of his closetlike office at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "We're right on the edge," he said. "We are closing in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. We're hoping you will send us something."

The senator cradled the phone as he opened a banana-taffy Halloween candy and nodded his head. "You can send up to $25,000," he said, pausing to measure the response. "How about half of that, $12,500?...You're a doll," he said, transferring the call to an aide who can bank the money before the final weekend TV blitz.

This time around, Democrats have played the money game more assertively than in any previous midterm election. Party leaders have mined donors for extra cash. They set explicit fund-raising targets for new candidates to win the party's backing.

DOJ_NMG_0091707

And they also raised donation targets for veteran politicians who want to become committee chairmen should Democrats win a majority.

The result: Fund raising by the Democratic congressional committees is running 30% ahead of the same period two years ago, according to a study by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan group that tracks political money. The Democratic party committees for the first time entered the final weeks of a campaign with nearly as much money in the bank as their Republican counterparts.

That has allowed Democrats to attack earlier, even to the point of backing conservative Republicans in primary races they thought would be more beatable in the general election. In the final weeks, Democrats have been able to defend themselves and attack weak incumbents. As the end of the campaign neared, the Democrats had about as much money set aside for voter turnout as their much-touted rivals.

On the other side of the ledger, Republicans have the power of incumbency. For decades, members of Congress have enjoyed an average 95% re-election rate. Since becoming the majority in 1994, Republicans have taken steps to reinforce that advantage. They've expanded the age-old practice of pork-barrel spending by increasing what's known as "earmarking," where members designate federal money for hometown projects. This year, Republican candidate Web sites routinely featured interactive maps showing the goodies the congressmen delivered.

The campaign slogan for Sen. Conrad Burns, a three-term Montana Republican, is "Burns delivers for Montana." In a recent Helena debate, he bragged about the projects he brought to his home state, which he says total $2 billion, including "this airport renovation that serves this great city and the Eagles Nursing Home to serve our seniors, and, yes, Liberty House at Fort Harrison for families that come in this town to get their health care."

The other pillar of Republican defense is gerrymandering, the once-a-decade redrawing of U.S. House district boundaries that gives the party in power a chance to create safe seats. Using computer programming, both parties have become expert at marrying census data and voting data to identify friendly voters down to their street address.

Republicans, under the leadership of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, in 2002 pushed the system to its extremes, urging legislatures in Texas, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Florida to maximize Republican seats. In Texas alone, because of redistricting, House Republicans gained five seats in 2004.

Yesterday, both parties shifted their focus to voter turnout. Democrats must net 15 seats to win the House and six to gain control of the Senate. President Clinton appeared at rallies in Virginia and Rhode Island to boost Democratic Senate candidates. President Bush's last rally in Florida symbolized his tarnished image: Popular Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist surprised the White House by skipping the event, leaving Mr. Bush on the stage with struggling Senate hopeful Rep. Katherine Harris. Ms. Harris oversaw the 2000 recount that helped put Mr. Bush in the White House.

Since federal fund-raising records were first collected in 1978, Republican Party committees have always had an edge over their rivals, according to Federal Election Commission records. Individual Republican candidates as a whole have also typically raised more money than Democrats.

This year, Democratic Party leaders began fund raising by tapping friendly companies and financiers in their backyards. Would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi alone raised about $50 million for the House campaign committee, seeking support from the electronics and communication industries. Mr. Schumer mined financial and banking houses in New York City, raising nearly a quarter of his committee's fund, or about $24 million, from that city alone. Among top donors are executives from Goldman Sachs, Citigroup, Morgan Stanley, Credit Suisse Group and the personal-injury law firm of Weitz & Luxenberg. Of those, only Goldman Sachs ranked as a major giver in 2004.

Illinois Congressman Rahm Emanuel, who runs the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has generated about $30 million in donations from his contacts, particularly in Chicago. In 2004, 34 Chicago corporations gave to the House campaign committee either through their company political action committees or executives. So far this year, 60 Chicago firms were represented on the donor list, according to an analysis by the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group.

Among the newcomers: $65,000 from Madison Dearborn Partners, a private-equity firm; $26,700 from Magnetar Capital, a hedge fund; $75,000 from Medline Industries, a provider of health-care supplies and equipment; $13,500 from Midway Games, a videogame maker.

Party leaders have leaned on veterans with rich campaign accounts but scant competition of their own. After Sen. Hillary Clinton transferred $2 million from her overstuffed war chest to the Senate committee, a number of bloggers publicized the fact that Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry hadn't made a donation; a chastened Mr. Kerry delivered $265,000.

Ms. Pelosi encouraged members interested in becoming committee chairmen to consider giving at least $250,000 to the House campaign committee, higher than the Republican target of $200,000. Senior Democrats with leadership ambitions gave a combined $16 million to the House campaign as of Oct. 27, well above their 2004 levels. House Minority Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who hopes to be majority leader, tops the list with $570,000. New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who wants to take over the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, has given $370,000.

DOJ_NMG_0091708

The extra cash has allowed Democratic strategists to go on the offensive in some unorthodox ways.

In an Arizona House seat left open by a retiring Republican, Mr. Emanuel spent $500,000 in the August Republican primary on behalf of the leading conservative candidate in the field, Randy Graf. His calculation: Mr. Graf couldn't win a general election in the moderate district. Republican strategists belatedly tried to defeat Mr. Graf, but he won, and Republicans now have conceded the seat. House Democrats figure they saved about $2 million that would otherwise have been spent trying to defeat a Republican moderate.

Extra money has made it possible for Senate Democrats to define the field early. The Senate campaign committee last summer transferred a chunk of money to the Montana Democratic Party, which began airing ads highlighting Mr. Burns's ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The issue has dogged the incumbent ever since.

Late last week, Mr. Schumer invested $1 million into the long-shot race of Democrat businessman Jim Pederson against Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl. While intended to boost Mr. Pederson's chances, Mr. Schumer also figured Mr. Kyl would insist on help from the Republican senatorial committee. He asked, and received, diverting Republican cash from more competitive races.

Money has also allowed Democrats to expand the battlefield. Nevada Republican Rep. Jon Porter has won re-election twice in his Las Vegas suburban district with double-digit margins. But the Iraq war has become a heavy drag on his campaign. When Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen was inching up in polls in the final weeks, the Democratic House campaign committee shoveled about $500,000 into the race. Mr. Porter's re-election chances have now been downgraded by political oddsmakers.

Mr. Schumer has earmarked $20 million for turnout operations in seven races targeting Republican incumbents. He's using the money to create an up-to-date voter list in Montana and Missouri. Mr. Emanuel is allocating more than $250,000 to build customized turnout operations in each of the roughly 33 districts on which he's concentrating, for a total of about $12 million.

The re-election campaign of 13-term Florida Republican Rep. Clay Shaw is a test of those competing forces: Democratic money versus Republican incumbency.

After Mr. Shaw barely clung to his district in 2000 -- he won by 599 votes -- alarmed Florida Republicans set out to protect him by redrawing his district. The Republican state legislature plundered Republican voters from the adjacent district of a more junior Republican, Mark Foley, who quit this year amid a sex scandal. They also dumped Democratic voters into the neighboring district held by Democrat Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz.

After their handiwork, Republican voters suddenly had a 40% to 35% advantage over Democrats, an eight-percentage point swing from 2000, according to Susan MacManus, a political scientist with the University of South Florida in Tampa. The balance is largely made up of independents.

Mr. Shaw used his seniority in Congress to direct cash into the district. A bridge in Ft. Lauderdale is named after him. His Web site includes a map where constituents can learn about other pork he's delivered, including $3 million for a sea-wall project in West Palm Beach and a Juno Beach mobile post office.

In 2002, Mr. Shaw was re-elected with 62% of the vote and again in 2004 with 63%. His race this year is considered a toss-up because, he says, people have grown "fatigued" by the lack of progress and escalating U.S. casualties in Iraq. About a quarter of voters in his district say they're independents, a group that leans heavily toward Democrats this year.

"I've run in this district twice and won by 20 points," says Mr. Shaw. "It's not gonna be that way this year."

Last Friday, Mr. Shaw's Democratic opponent, State Sen. Ron Klein, 49 years old, made his pitch to lawyers and staff in the Ft. Lauderdale public defender's office. He doesn't want an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, but says, "it's time for our generation to stand up and provide some new leadership." Behind her desk, Leigh L. Sipper nodded. She voted for Mr. Shaw, 67, in the past, but she's convinced "it's time for a change. The war is a big part of that," she says.

While Iraq made Mr. Shaw vulnerable, money helped Mr. Klein get his message out. The challenger has raised $3.6 million, nearly matching the powerful incumbent's $4 million. (Mr. Klein was given a target of raising $1 million by March in order to get the backing of the Democratic campaign committee.)

Mr. Klein has saturated the district with ads linking Mr. Shaw to President Bush and the war. In one, the mother of a solider in Iraq talks about a Shaw vote she says was against a combat bonus for Iraq soldiers: "Mr. Shaw, how could you?" she asks.

In the final weeks, when Mr. Klein began to run out of money, the Democratic House campaign committee stepped in and filled the gap. The committee invested more than $2 million in the race, an unprecedented sum for the district.

For Democrats, Even A Gain May Feel Like A Failure (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091709

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 — In most midterm elections, an out-of-power party picking up, say, 14 seats in the House and five seats in the Senate could call it a pretty good night.

But for Democrats in 2006, that showing would mean coming up one seat shy of taking control of both the Senate and the House. And it would probably be branded a loss — in the case of the House, a big one.

For a combination of reasons — increasingly bullish prognostications by independent handicappers, galloping optimism by Democratic leaders and bloggers, and polls that promise a Democratic blowout — expectations for the party have soared into the stratosphere. Democrats are widely expected to take the House, and by a significant margin, and perhaps the Senate as well, while capturing a majority of governorships and legislatures.

These expectations may well be overheated. Polls over the weekend suggested that the contest was tightening, and some prognosticators on Monday were scaling back their predictions, if ever so slightly. (Charlie Cook, the analyst who is one of Washington's chief setters of expectations, said in an e-mail message on Monday that he was dropping the words "possibly more" from his House prediction of "20-35, possibly more.")

Some Democrats worry that those forecasts, accurate or not, may be setting the stage for a demoralizing election night, and one with lasting ramifications, sapping the party's spirit and energy heading into the 2008 presidential election cycle.

"Two years ago, winning 14 seats in the House would have been a pipe dream," said Matt Bennett, a founder of Third Way, a moderate Democratic organization. Now, Mr. Bennett said, failure to win the House, even by one seat, would send Democrats diving under their beds (not to mention what it might do to all the pundits).

"It would be crushing," he said. "It would be extremely difficult."

Mr. Cook put it more succinctly. "I think you'd see a Jim Jones situation — it would be a mass suicide," he said.

On election eve, the rough consensus among officials in both parties was that the Democrats would win the House but come just short of capturing the six seats they needed in the Senate. There was wide disagreement, though, about how many House seats Democrats might win.

Many of these predictions had been based on polls showing that President Bush, the Republican Party and Congress were extraordinarily unpopular. But going into Election Day, at least 20 House seats and probably 3 Senate seats were tied or close to it, no matter what the national polls say.

So, what if Democrats just squeak to victory in the House by a seat or two? What if Democrats win just three seats in the Senate or — unlikely but not impossible — even two?

"I'm not getting into the Washington expectations game," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Democrat from Illinois running his party's effort to capture the House, in what he said would be a very brief minute he would devote to commenting on this subject. "My job is to deliver north of 15 seats and that's what I am going to do."

Howard Wolfson, a Democratic consultant advising candidates in some of the most competitive races in upstate New York — and one of his party's biggest optimists this year — said the size of the margin would not matter, assuming, of course, that Democrats win. "It's not a question of 25 or 35," Mr. Wolfson said. "It's a question of 14 or 15. Would you rather have a bigger margin? Of course. But if you take back the House, the world changes."

But any casual reader of a newspaper, or watcher of television news, or consumer of polls could be forgiven for thinking that the nation was about to witness its biggest shift in power since Republicans seized control of Congress by capturing 54 House seats in 1994. In the past week, analysts like Mr. Cook and Stuart Rothenberg, as well as on-the-record Democrats and Republicans, were talking about the Democrats' racking up as many as 35 seats. (Republicans, of course, may have decided that they have a Machiavellian interest in setting up Democrats with inflated expectations.)

"From a communications standpoint, the Democrats have done a lousy job managing expectations," said Justin Blake, an executive vice president at Edelman, the public relations firm.

Indeed, Mr. Emanuel and his Senate counterpart, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, have gone to some lengths not to project overconfidence. Mr. Schumer likes to say that Democrats are "on the edge" of taking back the Senate.

Other Democratic leaders are less restrained.

"I am now even more certain that Democrats will take control of the House and believe the net gain will be at least 30 seats and that we will certainly know the outcome early in the evening," Martin Frost, the former Texas Democratic congressman, wrote in a column he e-mailed around last week.

Mr. Bennett said that winning only 14 seats would produce an inevitable drop in contributions and a round of whither-the-Democrats post-election sessions. But he also said that, based on what had happened after Senator John Kerry's failed presidential effort in 2004, a race that many Democrats thought they should have won, he doubted the impact would last long.

And, unless the Democrats make no gains at all, it seems highly unlikely that there would be the kind of recriminations that typically follow a party loss, the kind of bloodletting already being seen on the Republican side.

DOJ_NMG_0091710

Almost without exception, Democrats have praised Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Schumer — though Howard Dean, the party's national chairman, may have to defend his decision to spread Democratic National Committee money to build up parties in all 50 states, while parrying requests for support in the Congressional races.

The scope of a Democratic victory could go a long way in determining just how much power the party had in Congress.

Perceptions matter in politics, and this White House has shown it knows how to shape them; it would no doubt relish trying to weaken its new Congressional foes by portraying a small Democratic edge as a loss.

The obvious best outcome for Democrats would be to win control of both houses, allowing them to claim a public mandate. But unless they somehow control 60 votes in the Senate — which, not to be setting any expectations here, is not going to happen — they will have to work with Republicans to pass legislation. If they win the House by a large margin but do not get the Senate, they will also no doubt claim something of a mandate, though that would seem to be a recipe for gridlock.

If the Democrats fail to capture the House and the Senate, it would provide a psychic boost for the White House and some political vindication for Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser. But given the intramural Republican squabbling of the past two years, it seems fair to say that nothing much could be expected out of Congress for the next two.

Mr. Bennett said, of the possibility of Democrats' losing in the end, "Some people will be saying, maybe that's better, which I think is crazy, but people are going to say it anyway."

In Mock Student Election, Democrats Reclaim House By NAUREEN S. MALIK (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Nearly one million votes cast by elementary and high school students in a nationwide mock election backed a Republican Senate but turned power over to the Democrats in the House of Representatives.

Ballots for the Youth Leadership Initiative's Internet mock election, which ended Thursday night, were tailored to local elections and referenda. Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center of Politics, started the program in 1998 at three local schools.

Of the 33 Senate seats up for election, 10 are Republican and one independent. In the mock election, Democrats gained seats in Pennsylvania, Montana, Tennessee and Mississippi. But Republicans carried Florida, Minnesota and Washington for a 54-seat majority. (See www.youthleadership.net1 for full results)

Republican George Allen may have retained his Senate seat in Virginia, but his 44.74% win against Democratic rival Jim Webb's 44.59% shows how his campaign missteps became an issue. Hilary Clinton retained New York for the Democrats by a wide margin.

All 435 House seats are up for election and the student polls were brutal in Ohio, Florida, New York and North Carolina. Democrats came out ahead with 218 seats compared with 202 for Republicans and 15 for other candidates.

On the gubernatorial front, New York students elected Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and in California, students voted to re-elect Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger.

These results are by no means a random sample of how kids in the U.S. feel, nor do they foreshadow adult voting, though they did call for President Bush's victory in 2004.

"This is about civic education," Mr. Sabato says. The mock election teaches students "the rules of the game and that politics are exciting so that they will start voting at an early age and continue that through their lifetime." While students often reflect parents' views, he says kids' participation in the mock election has "guilt tripped" parents into voting.

Teachers register free with YLI to participate in the mock election, receive lesson plans and participate in e-congress, where students draft and vote on each others' bills across the country. YLI's mock election is growing as the program matures. More than 204,000 students weighed in on the mid-term elections over an 11-day period, compared with 20,000 in 2002. About 810,000 students had voted in the 2004 presidential election.

Normally, 50% of the eligible voters turn out for presidential elections compared with 30% for off years, says Elaine Kamarck, who teaches American politics and government management at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government. But on Election Day, she expects an uptick at the polls for one reason: the Iraq War. The issue that is on the forefront of student and adult minds elevates the local election with a national concern.

In the real world, adults vote to influence public policy. In Carol Mill's U.S. Government class at Eisenhower High School in Yakima, Wash., juniors do it for extra credit. Teachers can monitor who votes but not how they vote.

Ms. Mills says her students were split over the Iraq war. Another big issue was a referendum to repeal taxes on estates valued at $2 million or more. The Yakima students were in favor of it, pointing to Bill Gates's charities.

Seniors at Westfield High School in Northern Virginia scoured online campaign ads, polls and blogs to develop arguments about amendments on marriage, church incorporation and a real estate property tax break for redevelopment, says social studies teacher Walt Addie.

DOJ_NMG_0091711

Betsy Gonzales, who teaches eighth grade at Cedar Park Middle School in Texas, says, says her students get their news from John Stewart's The Daily Show and are backing the more colorful independent candidates: Richard "Kinky" Friedman (comedian and a writer who smokes cigars) and Carole Keeton Strayhorn (campaigning as "One Tough Grandma") in the gubernatorial race. Cedar Park will hold elections on Tuesday and will send results to YLI.

At Hunter College Elementary School for gifted children in Manhattan, sixth-grade teacher Christina Jenkins says the younger students often come to the classroom reflecting parents' views, which can cause some students to withdraw in debates over sensitive issues such as abortion or gay marriage. She encourages those with less popular views to speak up to foster discussion. "Because of that, I play the devil's advocate a lot," Ms. Jenkins says.

After Losing Seniors To Republicans, Democrats Hope To Lure Them Back By ERIKA LOVLEY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- As polls open today, Democratic strategists looking for bellwethers are closely watching a group of voters that has attracted relatively little attention in the blitz of this year's campaign: senior citizens.

Democrats decisively lost the vote of older Americans to President Bush in the 2004 election, which party leaders see as a key reason they failed to unseat the president. Exit polls indicate Mr. Bush prevailed among those ages 60 and over by a margin of 54% to 46%.

Democrats think they can recapture those voters this year, which would be a crucial step toward taking one or both houses of Congress.

"We found the majority vote [among seniors] continues to be strongly Democratic," said Ana Iparraguirre, a senior associate at Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research, a consulting firm in Washington, D.C., run by a former pollster for President Clinton. Unhappiness over the war in Iraq and, in particular, squeamishness over President Bush's attempt to enact a partial privatization of Social Security are "definitely giving Democrats the advantage," she said.

ELECTION 2006

· Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

5 · Review the results of the latest polls6 in hot Senate races.

· The Senate's Uncertain States:7 Interactive profiles.

· Battlegrounds Poll:8 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

9 · Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers10

· Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts11

Seniors are seen as a critical voting bloc because, unlike younger voters, they tend to turn out reliably in large numbers on Election Day. They are expected to serve as an important voting bloc in several close races in states such as Florida and Pennsylvania, states where the ratio of senior voters is among the nation's highest.

In Florida, voters ages 65 or over, who make up 16% of total voters, according to 2005 census numbers, could play a big role in two tight House races, between Democrat Tim Mahoney and Republican Joe Negron, and between Republican Rep. Clay Shaw and Florida state Sen. Ron Klein, a Democrat. Similar dynamics are in play in Pennsylvania, where 14.6% of voters are seniors, especially in the Senate race between Sen. Rick Santorum, a Republican, and Democrat Bob Casey, and the House race between Republican Rep. Curt Weldon and Democrat Joseph A. Sestak Jr.

Both parties are making pitches on senior-specific issues. Democrats repeatedly focus on Mr. Bush's comments that he would like to return to his theme of overhauling the Social Security system in the remainder of his term. Last week, Mr. Sestak visited the Martin's Run Retirement Community north of Media, Pa. For the better part of an hour, he talked about World War II and the sacrifices made by Americans. He criticized the U.S. pharmaceutical industry and complained about tax breaks issued by President Bush.

Mr. Santorum's campaign has run several television ads touting a bill he has proposed in Congress that would guarantee that Social Security benefits would never be cut for the elderly. One ad features the senator in the middle of a crowded dance hall with seniors who are thanking him for supporting their community.

DOJ_NMG_0091712

"We want them to know what we'll do to make Social Security sustainable in the future," said Santorum campaign spokesman Virginia Davis. "It makes visits with seniors an important part of the campaign."

Democrats say the prescription-drug benefit offered under a bill that President Bush backed isn't sufficiently generous, and in particular have charged that the program doesn't adequately allow the government to bargain down the price of drugs for senior citizens offered through the program. Most Democratic attacks charge that the drug provision gives away too much to the pharmaceutical industry. Democrats in the House have vowed to change the program within their first 100 hours if they gain control of Congress.

In Florida, Mr. Mahoney, the Democrat running for a House seat, has canvassed local retirement communities about the issue. Mr. Mahoney himself is pushing for a competitive drug plan that would cater to seniors rather than pharmaceutical companies.

Republicans say the prescription-drug issue may actually help them. Some have pointed to a Kaiser Family Foundation Health Poll Report Survey of 1,585 seniors in June, which showed that eight in 10 seniors enrolled in a Medicare drug plan were satisfied with their plan. A similar survey taken in August 2004 found that twice as many people on Medicare had an unfavorable view of the law than had a favorable view.

Overall, older voters appear to be skewing Democratic heading into elections. A Pew Research Center survey of 2,369 registered voters released Sunday showed that 48% of those ages 65 and over were leaning towards voting for Democrats, compared with 42% for Republicans. Reflecting a broader trend, the number of older voters supporting Republicans rose slightly over figures from a Pew poll in September. In the 2002 midterm elections, 46% of seniors supported Republicans, compared with 43% for Democrats.

An increase in senior support for Democrats could spell bad news for Republicans in an election in which turnout among younger voters is expected to be weak. Nearly two-thirds of seniors are expected to vote this year.

"If there is turnout in high levels, it will be tough on Republicans," said Andrew Kohut, president of Pew Research Center, an independent opinion-research group based in Washington.

AARP, the national retirees association, reports that their 37 million members are evenly divided on party politics. One-third typically support Democrats, and one-third Republicans. The remaining third are independents -- voters that both parties are vying to capture.

AARP officials say its members across party lines are disgruntled by the Iraq war, and have made Iraq their top voting priority. "We don't think the issue is playing very well for Republicans at this point," said David Sloane, the group's director of government relations.

How Illegal Immigration Failed As Silver Bullet For Republicans Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- Twenty-one months ago, when House Republicans couldn't have foreseen how endangered their majority would be by Election Day, they went home for the President's Day recess, armed with talking points from the White House and party leaders to promote President Bush's top-priority proposal to remake Social Security.

But when they returned to the Capitol, many of these Republicans -- never eager to take on Social Security anyway without Democrats' support -- reported that voters wanted to talk about something else: illegal immigration.

ELECTION 2006

· Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· See the expanded online version of Washington Wire4. The Journal's Washington bureau will provide campaign analysis, news and buzz on Election Day.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20065.

And with that, congressional Republicans seized on the issue many hoped would be a silver bullet to get through the midterm elections, and without the losses that a president's party traditionally suffers.

By attacking illegal immigration, Republicans could look tough on border security and please their conservative constituents and many independents. In the process, they could force votes in Congress -- say, on cutting off benefits for illegals' children, or making English the official U.S. language -- that would divide the Democrats and their Hispanic allies, and, ideally, trap some Democratic lawmakers into votes that could be turned into 30-second attack ads for television by November 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0091713

It hasn't exactly turned out that way. A visit to this border state helps understand why.

Forget Democrats' divisions. The issue of dealing with illegal immigrants divided the Bush-era Republican Party at least as badly, and more embarrassingly so given that it holds all the power in Washington. Republicans who backed the get-tough route did so knowing they were rejecting the president's other top domestic priority for his second term -- a comprehensive and "compassionate conservative" immigration plan that would provide a path to citizenship for the estimated 11 million illegal aliens already in the country.

Arizona has been a microcosm of the Republican Party's splits. The state's senior U.S. senator, John McCain, has long taken the same position on immigration as the president. He helped broker the Senate's compromise immigration measure, though Republican foes would come to call it Ted Kennedy's plan. Sen. Jon Kyl, the other Republican senator from Arizona, led the opposition to the McCain version in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

In the House, Arizona's Republican Rep. J.D. Hayworth helped lead the drive for a crackdown-only approach; he even wrote a quick book, "Whatever It Takes," and appeared in a conservative group's movie, "Border War." But his fellow Arizona Republicans in the House mostly opposed him.

Like other border states -- Mr. Bush's Texas, for instance -- Arizona most directly feels the costs of illegal immigration in terms of poverty, education needs and crime. But it also enjoys the fruits of a large low-wage workforce, and a proud culture rooted in Hispanic history.

Sen. Kyl, up for re-election this year, has seen his once-wide lead over developer and former state Democratic Party Chairman Jim Pederson narrow to single digits in polls. He hasn't made a huge issue of immigration, but where he has, Mr. Pederson -- like other Democrats nationwide -- counters that his position is little different from Mr. Bush's.

In House races, as it happens, the two Arizona Republicans who've hammered illegal immigration the hardest are in the most trouble. In the Tucson-area district to replace moderate Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe, who is retiring, the Republican nominee is former state Rep. Randy Graf, a founding member of the Minutemen policing U.S.-Mexico borders. His hard-core stance on illegal immigration helped Mr. Graf win the Republican primary over two less conservative rivals, but it left party wounds; Mr. Kolbe, among others, withheld support. The seat is widely expected to fall to Democrats.

Mr. Hayworth may well hold on, though his own internal polls have him several points behind former Democratic state senator and Tempe mayor Harry Mitchell. The congressman, who used to back guest-worker programs, has found that the enforcement-first platform he built for his toughest race yet isn't supporting him very well. Here, as nationally, voters chiefly have on their minds another war than the "border war" he emphasizes.

In a recent speech to a civic group in his affluent suburban district outside Phoenix, Mr. Hayworth opened by saying, "Sadly, here we are, in the early years of the 21st century, again, a nation at war." Then, without mentioning Iraq, he immediately described how up to 6,500 people nightly attempt to cross over to Arizona from Mexico illegally; 4,500 make it, he said. "It may not sit well with the politically correct sensibilities of those who populate the editorial boards of our major newspapers," Mr. Hayworth went on, "but with that type of occurrence on a nightly basis, what else do we call it but invasion?"

When the congressman finally opened the floor to questions, every one was about war -- the one in Iraq. What about the erosion of public support? How can there be a swift end to it? Should the U.S. pull out troops, or add 100,000 more? Mr. Hayworth didn't endorse either extreme, saying non-commitally, "Victory must be our goal, not disengagement."

That evening at an event for Mr. Mitchell, among the attendees was one of a number of local officeholders who've formed "Republicans for Mitchell," Tempe city councilman Ben Arredondo. Mr. Arredondo, from a well-known local Hispanic family that has been in Arizona for generations, quickly volunteers why he's not supporting his fellow Republican: "As soon as Hayworth came on the immigration issue, it was over."

A top national Republican strategist, speaking of threatened incumbents such as Mr. Hayworth, says the immigration issue -- far from being the silver bullet --has exacted a higher price than is recognized; it's been "masked by other things," he says, such as voter frustration with war, high spending, scandals. "But," says the strategist, who asks to be unidentified, "you don't go around the country saying, 'This the No. 1 problem, but, by the way, we're not going to do anything about it.' "

Pelosi's Platform (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

What would a Democratic House of Representatives under Speaker Nancy Pelosi be like? The Republicans have been painting an unattractive portrait of Democrats roasting young children on a spit in the Capitol Rotunda and whatnot. Hoping for a more encouraging view, I picked up "A New Direction for America," a 31-page manifesto released to little acclaim by House Democrats in June. By all means read it. But do me a favor and vote first.

DOJ_NMG_0091714

The document is full of bromides, of course, and like all good bromides, they come in threes. The Democrats promise "security, prosperity, and opportunity" in "diverse, safe, and vibrant communities." Not to mention "integrity, civility and fiscal discipline." They will "protect Americans, secure our borders, and restore our country's position of international leadership" through "homeland, energy, and diplomatic strategies." And we're only up to Page 3.

The two favorite words of Democrats on the cusp of power seem to be "tax credit." They promise to "modernize" the tax credit for research and development; to "expand and improve" the already ludicrously complex system of tax-deductible retirement accounts such as IRAs and 401(k) plans (and match "dollar-for-dollar" the first $1,000 a person puts in); and to provide a "100% tax credit for tuition up to $3,000." They want a "broadband tax credit" for Internet access in "rural and underserved" areas.

They call for a 50 percent tax credit for employee health insurance paid for by small businesses, as their solution to the health-care crisis. Needless to say, they love the tax credit for ethanol production and want to expand it for local ethanol producers. And -- my favorite -- they want a tax credit to cover the administrative costs of encouraging employers "to offer their employees the option to convert their retirement plan into an annuity when they retire." I don't know what that last one is about, but I smell an interested party. It's just not the kind of thing thought up by anyone who doesn't have some skin in the game.

Democrats call for ending the "Disabled Veterans' Tax" and the "Military Families' Tax." The what? There cannot be any such thing as a Disabled Veterans' Tax. It is a label dreamed up by people wanting special treatment, like the Republicans' brilliant "death tax" for the estate tax. Maybe they deserve it, maybe they don't. But why can't we leave this bullying-by-terminology to Newt Gingrich?

The problem with tax credits in general is that they never appear in the budget, so they never get the same scrutiny as direct spending, although their impact on the deficit is exactly the same. By definition, they cost more than whatever benefit they are intended to achieve, since no one is going to be induced to spend an extra dollar on, say, dance lessons (because some member of Congress has decided that it would be good for the country if more people knew how to dance) unless the subsidy is worth more than a dollar.

Tax subsidies often go to person X to help person Y (e.g., to a corporation to help its employees), and person X gets a slice of the benefit -- often a big slice. And the distributional consequences are rarely examined. For example, tax credits constitute only one of several subsidies the Democrats propose for college education. Why should a young person who is out working and paying taxes subsidize someone in college who will soon be better off, if he or she isn't already?

Fairness is one of the three qualities that need to be restored to American public life after six years of George W. Bush and 12 years of French-Revolution-turned-French-farce on Capitol Hill. The other two are honesty and competence.

Honesty is not just therapeutic. Fiscal honesty is a practical necessity. "New Direction" quite rightly denounces the staggering fiscal irresponsibility of Republican leaders and duly promises "Pay As You Go" spending. But in the entire document there is not one explicit revenue-raiser to balance the many specific and enormous new spending programs and tax credits.

Competence, of course, brings us back to Iraq. Apparently and unfortunately, President Bush is right that the Democrats have no "plan for victory." (Neither does he, of course. Nor, for that matter, do I. But I don't claim to have one. And I didn't start it.) For national security in general, the Democrats' plan is so according-to-type that you cringe with embarrassment: It's mostly about new cash benefits for veterans. Regarding Iraq specifically, the Democrats' plan has two parts. First, they want Iraqis to take on "primary responsibility for securing and governing their country." Then they want "responsible redeployment" (great euphemism) of American forces.

Older readers may recognize this formula. It's Vietnamization -- the Nixon-Kissinger plan for extracting us from a previous mistake. But Vietnamization was not a plan for victory. It was a plan for what was called "peace with honor" and is now known as "defeat."

Maybe "A New Direction for America" is just a campaign document -- although it seems to have had no effect at all on the campaign. My fear is that the House Democrats might try to use it as a basis for governing.

The True Ideological Battle By ARTHUR C. BROOKS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

In their 2004 book, "The Right Nation," John Micklethwait and Adrian Wooldridge chronicle America's rightward tilt. "If American politics is a seesaw, it is an unevenly balanced one. Imagine Dennis Hastert at one end of the seesaw and Nancy Pelosi on the other end, and you have some idea about which party is sitting with its legs dangling in the air. In the war between two Americas, Hastertland has been winning."

DOJ_NMG_0091715

Until today, that is. This midterm election, in the view of many optimistic liberals, will be a forceful repudiation of the inevitability of American conservatism. A victory after so many years of losses will mark the beginning of the end to the country's nightmarish reactionary drift. According to Howard Dean, "The American people are fed up and want to change course. Democrats are offering the American people a new direction." But will it really be the dawn of a new day for the American left? After a cold look at the evidence, liberals might decide to take the champagne off the ice. The victory, assuming there is one, will hardly be glorious, and long-term trends are still distinctly right wing.

Some doomsday scenarios envision a 45-seat shift in the House of Representatives and a substantial Democratic majority in the Senate. These predictions, when looking at the actual data, are probably unrealistic. My colleague Danny Hayes, a political scientist who studies polling, says that the most reasonable picture has the Democrats winning 20-30 seats and taking narrow control of the House, while failing to win the Senate. This assessment is consistent with what most mainstream pollsters are predicting.

No bloodbath -- but still major progress for the left, right? Not really. We are in the midst of a deeply unpopular war, and an electorate in a foul mood. A Washington Post-ABC News poll last week found that more than 30% of likely voters planned to cast their ballots on Nov. 7 for Democrats specifically as a sign of opposition to George Bush. Congressional Republicans are hardly helping their own cause, between corruption and sexual misconduct. And the Republican Congress has so alienated authentic conservative voters with its porky profligacy that lots of Republicans will probably stay home.

By all rights, the Republicans left in Congress after this election should be able to pool to work in one minivan. Instead, they are probably facing a 10% setback in House seats -- hardly a disaster by midterm election standards. What's more, many of the Democrats at the vanguard of today's political "revolution" are not exactly left-wing zealots. Robert Casey, who leads incumbent Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, opposes abortion rights. On issues of gun control and immigration, Senate candidate Harold Ford of Tennessee sounds like a Republican. James Webb, who seeks to unseat Virginia Sen. George Allen, actually used to be a Republican. The lesson is that Democrats can win modestly if the Republicans implode, and preferably if they look more or less like Republicans. This is hardly a mythic victory for the American left; indeed, the larger cultural picture -- in which the election is but a minor political datum -- remains strikingly bleak for American liberalism.

Consider the effect of religious faith, which endures as the most important cultural fault line. On the whole, America is fundamentally religious, with 85% of people expressing allegiance to an organized faith and a third attending a house of worship weekly. Secularism is an exotic taste -- except on the political left. According to the General Social Survey, liberals are a third less likely than the rest of the population to worship regularly, and less than half as likely as conservatives. The percentage of self-described liberals who say they have "no religion" has more than doubled since the early '70s.

This cultural trend represents a growing political liability for the left. Only about one in four Americans currently say they believe that the Democratic Party is friendly toward religion, according to the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. The practical impact of this belief is nicely described by author Stephen Carter in his book, "The Dissent of the Governed." He describes two black evangelical women who change their affiliations from liberal political groups to conservative Christian organizations, explaining that "they preferred a place that honored their faith and disdained their politics over a place that honored their politics and disdained their faith." These women are part of a real trend among religious Americans: According to the National Election Surveys, religious Democrats are more likely than any other group to change their party affiliation. Between 2000 and 2002, they were nearly four times more likely to do so than secular Republicans.

There's certainly more to ideology than faith, of course. Another major cultural force is immigration, which -- as liberals hope and conservatives fear -- has the power to counteract the conservatizing effects of religion. "Today we march, tomorrow we vote," was the slogan chanted earlier this year by Latinos demonstrating in the streets against Republican-led immigration crackdowns. The warning made the blood of many conservatives run cold. It shouldn't have; the political mobilization of Latinos may actually expand the cultural dominance of the American right. According to the Social Capital Community Benchmark Survey in 2000, while American Latinos are about as likely as non-Latinos to say they are politically conservative, those not (yet) registered to vote are significantly more conservative than both voting Latinos and the population at large. In other words, a growing, more politically active Latino U.S. probably means a more conservative U.S. as well.

This counterintuitive fact is good news for the cultural right. But can Republicans capitalize politically on this pattern? Some doubt it, given the party's perceived hostility to immigration and apparent willingness to overlook the racial insensitivity of Sen. George Allen's "macaca" remark about an Indian-American man at a recent campaign event.

So much for religious folks and immigrants. What about young people? Maybe the left can, like it always has, look to the culture of youth to jumpstart the progressive movement. But even here, things are going conservatives' way. The left's traditional edge among young adults shrank from 1974 to 2004, as the percentage of adults 18-25 who labeled themselves political liberals fell by 12%, and the percentage saying they were conservative rose by 143%.

DOJ_NMG_0091716

Waning youth support for the left may be partly due to the adroitness of conservative causes. But it probably also has to do with liberal inability or unwillingness to build an authentic youth grass-roots movement. A new and hotly debated book by Columbia University sociologist Dana Fisher documents the fact that most liberal political groups have dismantled their grassroots operations since the mid-'90s and subcontracted their activism to a small group of for-profit and nonprofit companies. In other words, the Republican canvasser at your door is a volunteer and true believer. But the kid asking for your signature and contribution for the local Democratic Party is probably a paid employee. This may be evidence that the left can no longer build grass-roots support to maintain itself, or that it has cut corners and sent its support-building mechanisms ideologically offshore. Either way, it bodes ill for progressive causes.

These are just three examples of the cultural patterns that continue to strengthen the right in America. Many more can be found in fertility patterns, the effects of education, and elsewhere. They tell us that conservatives have much to smile about, no matter what happens today at the polls. Reasonable people will disagree as to whether this is grounds for celebration or a call to fight. Either way, however, it is undeniable that the true ideological battle in America goes far deeper than a midterm election.

Mr. Brooks, a professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is the author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism," to be published this month by Basic Books.

Identity Crisis (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

One verdict from the 2006 election was obvious before a single vote had been counted: The Republican Party no longer has a coherent governing philosophy. Republicans who care about advancing a consistent set of ideals are already at each other's throats and are likely to stay there. True, most Republicans still describe themselves as "conservative." But it is no longer clear what that word means.

When they have nothing else to say, Republicans will always accuse Democrats of harboring secret plans to raise taxes. But the tax issue just sits out there, unhinged from any logical approach to how revenue and spending should fit together in a sensible budget.

Then there is Iraq. Republican foreign policy realists saw the war as a disaster going in. Neoconservatives who supported the invasion increasingly blame the Bush administration for botching the job. The administration's approach to Iraq is an orphan -- only President Bush and his closest advisers claim it as their own.

That is why we can know how Republicans and conservatives will spend the last two years of the Bush presidency. They will fault philosophical adversaries for what went wrong, purge various actors and ideas from the movement, and insist on contradictory forms of ideological purity. My God, they'll sound like Democrats, won't they?

At the beginning of the 2006 campaign, the most popular charge in punditry was that Democrats were going to the voters with "no ideas." As the election closes, it's clear that the Republicans won the "no ideas" contest. In race after race, they tried to win by saying how horrific their Democratic opponents were -- and, in many cases, Republicans started touting their own independence from Bush. The Republicans have no coherence on immigration; no plausible plans for fixing the mess in Iraq; and little to say about economic insecurity, health care or the budget.

The lesson of 2006 is that the past five years have aggravated every contradiction on the right to the breaking point: religious conservatives against libertarians; neoconservatives against foreign policy realists; pro-immigration conservatives against immigration critics; big business against working-class conservatives; compassionate conservatives against . . . hmm, how do you describe the other side on that one?

In Congress, conservatives who voted for big budget deficits now blame figures such as Tom DeLay for forcing them to do it. Some Republicans who condemn the cost of the prescription drug benefit under Medicare were once happy to brag about it to seniors. Incumbents attack congressional "earmarks" for special spending projects, all the while boasting at home about the bacon they've put on their constituents' tables.

Add to all this the remarkable display of backstabbing among House Republican leaders over who did or didn't do what (and when) about the Mark Foley scandal. Political solidarity is not much of a value anymore in the Republican family.

That is why the most interesting battles over the next two years could take place not between the parties but within them. After a miserable year, Republicans have a lot of scores to settle. And conservatives, many of whom know they've lost their way, will be devoting a lot of energy to figuring out exactly who they are.

Repeat Calls Spur A Debate Over Tactics (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091717

Karyn Hollis, an English professor at Villanova University outside Philadelphia, said the same computerized calls had been ringing her telephone as often as five times a day for more than a week.

They all start with a simple, if somewhat ambiguous, statement: "Hello, I'm calling with information about Lois Murphy," a Pennsylvania Democrat who is the challenger in one of the hottest House races. That opening sounds "kind of positive in tone," Ms. Hollis said. But the message quickly turns negative, blasting Ms. Murphy's political views. After she hangs up, the phone rings again later with the same message. And again. And again.

The calls are part of a telephone blitz that the Republican Party has unleashed in several dozen races that are likely to determine control of the House in Tuesday's elections. And the repeat calls to the same homes have set off a new furor over campaign tactics, with the Democrats claiming the calls violate federal communications rules and are tantamount to harassment.

Ms. Murphy and other Democrats say they have been flooded with complaints from irritated voters who think that the calls are coming from the candidates themselves. Many of the voters had hung up before the message was over, and never heard that it was produced by the Republican Party.

Democratic leaders contend that the messages violate federal rules that require groups making automated calls to identify themselves at the outset. And the National Republican Congressional Committee, which has financed the calls, agreed on Sunday to quit making some of them in New Hampshire, where a state law limits who can receive computerized phone messages.

Ed Patru, a committee spokesman, said the phone campaign complied with federal law and was "drawing contrasts" between the candidates. "There's no statutory requirement that our phone calls be complimentary to Democrats," Mr. Patru added.

Federal filings indicate that the committee has spent about $2 million on phone calls in the last week.

But Democratic officials say they fear the saturation calling is just a tactic to irritate voters and discourage them from going to the polls.

"Make no mistake about it," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat who is leading his party's effort to retake the House. "This is a dirty trick, one they have pulled before, one they have gotten caught on, and they are still doing it."

Mr. Emanuel was referring to past fights over last-minute phone campaigns, particularly in New Hampshire, where three Republican officials were convicted of campaign violations stemming from an effort in 2002 to jam phone lines used by the Democratic Party to get out the vote.

Complaints about the recent Republican calls first surfaced about a week ago in a smattering of states. Rozanne Ronen, who lives in a Chicago suburb, said she had gotten more than 20 of the calls, all relating to the same House race. "To me, it's just harassment," she said.

New York Democratic Party officials complained Monday that the calls also had been made on Sunday and Monday to voters in four hotly contested House districts.

The Democrats say that a few calls have been made in the early morning or middle of night, and that some voters received several calls minutes apart. Republican officials said that would have happened only if there was a computer glitch.

Others, like Ms. Hollis, the Villanova professor, say they have filed complaints with the Federal Communications Commission. Its rules on automated calls require that callers state their identity at the beginning of the message. These calls end with a disclaimer that they were paid for by the Republican committee; no identification is made at the start of the message.

Political messages are exempt from the federal do-not-call rules meant to discourage unwanted sales pitches. But a New Hampshire law prohibits making automated calls to people who are on the do-not-call list. The Republican committee agreed on Sunday to halt calls there at the urging of the state attorney general.

David Kaplan, a registered Republican in Connecticut who has received more than two dozen of the calls, said he was so annoyed that the Republicans might "have shot themselves in the leg" in terms of winning his vote.

It's A Candidate Calling. Again. (WP)

By Charles Babington And Alec MacGillis

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

This year's heavy volume of automated political phone calls has infuriated countless voters and triggered sharp complaints from Democrats, who say the Republican Party has crossed the line in bombarding households with recorded attacks on candidates in tight House races nationwide.

Some voters, sick of interrupted dinners and evenings, say they will punish the offending parties by opposing them in today's elections. But critics say Republicans crafted the messages to delude voters -- especially those who hang up quickly -- into thinking that Democrats placed the calls.

DOJ_NMG_0091718

Republicans denied the allegation, noting that their party acknowledges its authorship at the recorded calls' end. After citizens' complaints in New Hampshire, however, the National Republican Congressional Committee agreed to end the calls to households on the federal do-not-call list, even though the law exempts political messages from such restrictions.

Whether "robo-calls" are positive or negative, mean-spirited or humorous, thousands of Americans are sick of them, according to campaign organizations that have been fielding complaints over the past two weeks.

An Ohio woman, who did not leave her name, called The Washington Post in tears yesterday, saying she could not keep her phone line open to hospice workers caring for her terminally ill mother because of nonstop political robo-calls.

Pamela Lorenz, a retired nurse in Roseville, Calif., called her own experience "harassment as far as I'm concerned" and said, "If I were voting right now, the opponent who's doing this, he'd be off my list for throwing that much trash."

Hour after hour and day after day for two weeks, Lorenz's home has received the same NRCC recorded message attacking Charlie Brown, the Democrat who is challenging Rep. John T. Doolittle (R) in a hard-fought battle in northeastern California. "It is a recorder calling," Lorenz said. "I can't call it back to get them to stop."

Voters in Northern Virginia have been exposed to fewer of the aggressive "push poll" type calls than elsewhere. But they said they have been getting so many of the conventional automated calls plugging candidates that they have started hanging up as soon as the recordings begin or screening them with caller ID.

"I hang up as soon I hear it start. I've already heard most of what people have to say. I don't have time to listen to them," said Angela Elliott, a Fairfax Circle resident who is registered as an independent and has been getting more Democratic calls than Republican ones.

Nicholas Beltrante, of the Alexandria section of Fairfax County, said he has been getting an average of three to five automated calls per day from both Democrats and Republicans. "I made up my mind weeks ago, and the moment I identify them as one of those calls I just hang up," he said.

As annoyed as they are, Northern Virginia voters said their irritation will not prompt them to vote against the campaigns placing the calls, because the calls are positive in nature.

Jane Edmondson, a McLean community activist, registered Democrat and Democratic donor, said she has stopped answering calls that appear as 800 or 877 numbers on her caller ID, for fear that they are robo-calls. At church Sunday, she said, she and others were jealous of one churchgoer who said his caller ID identifies campaign calls as "political calls." "We all said, 'Why don't we get that?' " she said.

Democrats cited federal records indicating that the NRCC recently spent about $600,000 in at least 45 contested House districts for robo-calls, which are among the least expensive campaign tools. The brief calls typically begin with a speaker offering "some information" about the Democratic nominee and then immediately accusing the nominee of seeking to raise taxes, among other perceived wrongs.

Many voters hang up as soon as a robo-call begins -- without waiting for the criticisms or the NRCC sign-off at the end -- so they think it was placed by the Democratic candidate named at the start, said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Our candidates are inundated with phone calls from furious Democrats and independents saying . . . 'I'm outraged and I'm not going to vote for you anymore,' " she said.

Feinberg said some voters have received robo-calls late at night, despite federal rules barring such calls after 9 p.m. NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said his organization ends all calls by 9 nightly.

Democrats also cited Federal Communications Commission guidelines saying the originators of automated calls must identify themselves at the beginning of each call. Republican Party lawyers, however, said the requirement does not apply to political nonprofit organizations. They rebuffed a "cease and desist" letter sent yesterday by the DCCC.

In a conference call with reporters yesterday, the DCCC chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), compared the widespread robo-calling to a 2002 Republican effort in New Hampshire to jam Democratic phone lines to prevent the Democrats' get-out-the-vote effort. The Republican National Committee has spent more than $2 million to defend its officials in the case, he said. "Make no mistake, this is a dirty trick, one they've done before, one they've gotten caught on and one they continue to do," Emanuel said.

Karyn Hollis, a Villanova University English professor who supports Democrat Lois Murphy in her bid to oust Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.), said she has received numerous robo-calls attacking Murphy. "You just get sick of these calls," Hollis said. A quick hang-up can lead the recipient to conclude that Murphy supporters placed the call, she said. Listening to the full message, she said, subjects the voter to a litany of attacks against Murphy.

"It's a double thing," Hollis said. "Either way they win."

Many robo-calls involve celebrities and are positive and straightforward, such as recordings from former president Bill Clinton urging voters to support Democratic nominees. In New Jersey, comic actor Joe Piscopo has recorded messages on behalf of GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0091719

In Connecticut, NRCC robo-calls have targeted Dianne Farrell, the Democrat seeking to unseat Rep. Christopher Shays (R). Asked if Farrell has her own automated calls, campaign spokeswoman Jan Ellen Spiegel replied: "Only one, and it's rather distinctive because it's Paul Newman. We haven't gotten complaints about that one."

Exit-Poll Secrecy Measures Aim To Plug Leaks To Blogs By AMY SCHATZ (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Two-by-two, polling specialists from ABC, CBS, NBC, CNN, Fox News and the Associated Press will go into rooms in New York and Washington shortly before noon Tuesday. Their cellphones and BlackBerrys will be confiscated; proctors will monitor the doors; and for the next five hours, these experts will pore over exit-poll data from across the country.

If all goes well, only when they emerge from their cloisters will the legions of ravenous political bloggers have any chance of getting their hands on the earliest indication of which party will end up controlling Congress.

"The demand for info is intense, and if the safeguards aren't steel doors bolting people inside a room, it will get out," says Marc Ambinder, associate editor of National Journal's Hotline OnCall. "The insatiable appetite for this info will overwhelm the ability to keep it secret."

The extraordinary security is a result of mix-ups that prompted grumbling about the accuracy of exit polls after the 2004 presidential election: Bloggers posted data from early exit polls, incorrectly calling some states for Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry and indicating that he would unseat President Bush.

This year, media executives figure the secret will keep less than half an hour. "Based on past experience, I expect that I'll have exit-poll data soon after it's released from multiple sources," Taegan Goddard of the newsy independent blog Political Wire1 says in an email.

Exit polls will be available for all the key Senate races, giving an early picture of whether it could flip to the Democrats. House races won't be available, although clues in statewide data for states with lots of close races, such as Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut and Indiana, will provide a sense of what the broader outcome might be.

The data are collected through the National Election Pool, a consortium made up of the three traditional networks, CNN, Fox News and the AP. NEP's members decide which questions are asked and set the rules for the data's release.

Only consortium members get all of the data, including state breakdowns. Other media outlets -- but not bloggers or political parties -- may purchase the data, on a sliding cost scale. A state report can cost anywhere from $1,000 to $5,400, depending on the size of the news organization. A week after the election, all of the data can be purchased by academics, political parties and others for $10,000.

ELECTION 2006

· Election Quiz:2 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com3, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video4 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20065.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

6 · Review the results of the latest polls7 in hot Senate races.

· The Senate's Uncertain States:8 Interactive profiles.

· Battlegrounds Poll:9 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

10 · Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers11

· Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts12

News organizations use exit polls to give them an early sense of the electorate's mood to shape and guide coverage later that night when the real results come in. As the data become more complete throughout the day, NEP and news organizations use them to project winners when the polls close. TV news anchors know the results, but are honor-bound not to disclose them until the polls close in the individual states. Sometimes, however, they can't resist alluding to some results with broad statements about the mood of the electorate.

Poll results are for internal use for the most part, but are generally the worst-kept secret in the news business. On Election Day, exit polls are the coin of the realm in Washington, and some reporters and editors can't resist sharing top-line data among themselves and with political operatives. Consequently, the information can reach bloggers from any number of sources.

Mainstream news organizations know that bloggers will eventually get their hands on the exit-poll data, but their goal is to delay it as long as possible because the accuracy of the data improves as the day goes on.

In previous years, numbers were made available to the news organizations in waves via secure Web sites. In 2004, the first wave of data went out around 2 p.m. and quickly leaked onto the Internet. That's what brought about this year's sequestering of the news organization's representatives. The only communication they'll be allowed to make out of the so-called quarantine rooms before 5 p.m. will be to warn their new organizations about potential problems in the data. (In 2000, faulty polling prompted some networks to incorrectly call Florida in favor of Al Gore.) Those messages will be monitored by representatives of the polling firm NEP has contracted with.

DOJ_NMG_0091720

Consequently, for much of Tuesday, bloggers will likely be chattering mostly about secondary issues, such as voter turnout and problems with new electronic voting machines.

But at 5 p.m., waves of exit-poll data will begin flowing to newsrooms via limited-access Web sites. For the bloggers, the scramble will be on to get the data first, hoping for an email from a friendly source.

"People need to realize those numbers aren't the real results," says David Bohrman, vice president of news and production at CNN's Washington bureau, who urges people to be cautious when interpreting poll results. "They show why people voted today, and what was on their minds. The only real way to figure out who won is to count the votes."

Mark Blumenthal, a Democratic pollster known as the "Mystery Pollster" on Pollster.com13, which tries to explain the mechanics behind polls, agrees. Exit polls are "still a sample," he says. "Don't get all excited about it." In 2004, Mr. Blumenthal posted a warning in the morning about the vagaries of exit polling data and says he'll post another Tuesday. "You learn the hard way that a one- or two-point lead on a leaked exit poll is meaningless," he says.

Mr. Ambinder of Hotline OnCall14, the free, wonky blog updated by National Journal's political reporters, says editors there have vowed not to post any exiting-polling data. They say that the less they post while polls are open the better. "If a header in my inbox says 'exit poll,' I'm going to try to resist the temptation to open it," he says.

Throughout the day, a lot of unreliable numbers on exit polling will be flying around in emails, predicts Jacob Weisberg, editor of online magazine Slate, which published early exit-polling data in 2004. If Slate receives exit-polling data from a reliable source in the media it will publish them again, Mr. Weisberg says, although he doesn't know if they'll be very meaningful. "When elections are really close, exit polls aren't that reliable."

"I'll post it with the caveat that it was all crap last time and will probably be crap again," says Glenn Reynolds of Instapundit.com15, a conservative-leaning blog, who will be doing interviews for CNN via a Webcam from his Knoxville, Tenn., home.

Unreliable or not, for many bloggers exit polls are just too juicy to ignore. "Basically, yeah, we'll run everything we get the second we get it," says Alex Pareene of the irreverent Washington blog Wonkette16. "Give the people what they want."

Early Night For Poll Watchers? (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

No matter who triumphs today -- Election Day -- supporters of both political parties and will have something to be happy about: They probably will not have to stay up too late to know which way the midterm elections are heading.

"The key races in Congress are concentrated in the Eastern and Central time zones, so we ought to have a good sense of the trend relatively early in the evening," said Amy Walter of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

In the Senate, Democrats would have to gain six seats to win a majority, and all but one of the most competitive races are in states in the East or Midwest: Virginia, Tennessee, Missouri, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Ohio and Maryland. The single nail-biter farther west is in Montana.

Most tossup House races are also clustered in states east of the Mississippi River. By watching the fate of Republican candidates in Connecticut, New York, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio, political enthusiasts will have a good idea whether Democrats will win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House, analysts say.

That is, of course, if everything goes smoothly. And things rarely do. Uncertainties about electronic voting machines and hassles over identifying registered voters could make early predictions about the election precarious.

Nonetheless, there will be plenty of guessing as the night goes on.

Broadcast networks plan to confine their reports to a single hour starting at 10 p.m. Eastern time, hosted by their national news anchors. ABC will also feature the midterm elections on "Nightline" from 11:30 p.m. to midnight. In addition, the broadcast channels will do live cut-ins throughout the evening when major results become known.

Political junkies will demand a lot more information than that. For them, cable news channels and Web sites will fill in the gaps.

The cable channels are scheduled to provide their usual blanket coverage all evening and into the wee hours. This year, in addition, the Web versions of most major publications and news outlets will constantly update their online election results. Cyber surfers will be able to pop onto a wide variety of Web sites as often as they want and track every tick of the electoral totals.

DOJ_NMG_0091721

"If you wake up at 3 a.m. in a cold sweat, you can go to your computer for the latest results," said Rajiv Chandrasekaran, The Washington Post's assistant managing editor for continuous news. "People can also wake up first thing in the morning and do the same thing."

For people who want their beauty rest, however, a few contests with early poll closings can be seen as harbingers of things to come. As Kentucky and Indiana go, analysts say, so will go the House. And the good news: The polls in both states will close by 7 p.m. Eastern time.

Nathan L. Gonzales of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report recommends looking at Kentucky in particular. If Rep. Geoff Davis (R) is defeated by former representative Ken Lucas (D), Gonzales said, "the GOP is in serious jeopardy." If Reps. Anne M. Northup and Ron Lewis, both Republicans, also lose, Republican losses in the House could be sizable, he added.

Another bellwether is Indiana. Three Republican congressmen face tough reelection fights there: John N. Hostettler, Chris Chocola and Michael E. Sodrel. Hostettler has been all but given up for lost. But if Chocola, Sodrel or both also go down, the Republican majority in the House will probably fall with them, analysts agree.

Walter of the Cook Political Report sees the electoral fate of Sodrel, a freshman who is facing former representative Baron Hill (D) for the third time, as one of the nation's best predictors of the partisan direction of the House.

"If a Democratic tsunami is hitting, Republicans could realistically lose the majority before the polls close in the 8 p.m. states," such as Pennsylvania, Gonzales said. "But if Republicans can escape these early states down by only three or four seats, it should be considered a moral victory."

The Cook Report lists nine Senate races as tossups, and Gonzales of the Rothenberg Report names two of them as the ones to watch.

Sen. James M. Talent (R-Mo.) is in a neck-and-neck battle with Missouri state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D). And in Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) is nip and tuck with Democrat James Webb. "If Talent loses, the GOP majority is in serious jeopardy [in the Senate]," Gonzales said. "And it's gone completely if Allen loses."

Check Indiana For A Preview (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

For an early glimpse of how election night will unfold, strategists of both parties have their eyes fixed on Indiana.

Yes, Indiana is home to three of the most competitive House races in the nation. But it is the 6 p.m. Eastern closing time for a majority of the state's polling places that is most intriguing to Republicans and Democrats.

Both parties are eager to seize on early indicators for how the counting will play out. The first sign of a Republican wave in 1994 came when Representative Jill Long, a Democrat, lost her Third District seat early in the evening to Mark Souder. While Mr. Souder is expected to win re-election this time, three Hoosier colleagues — Chris Chocola, John Hostettler and Mike Sodrel — face uphill battles.

Many competitive races are in states in the Eastern time zone. But polls in Ohio close at 7:30 p.m.; those in Connecticut and Pennsylvania stay open until 8, and New York's till 9.

That leaves Indiana as a preview to the evening's suspense, at least in the House.

For the too-close-to-call Senate races, Virginia could be the one to watch, with polls closing at 7 p.m., followed by Maryland and Missouri at 8, Rhode Island at 9 and Montana at 10. These times, which will be carefully watched by the networks, have been converted to Eastern.

Gore Headlines Maryland Campaign Event (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

SILVER SPRING, Md. (AP) -- Former Vice President Al Gore made an election-eve visit to Maryland Monday, joining Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley and Senate candidate Ben Cardin at a get-out-the-vote rally at a Montgomery County retirement community.

Gore was the only national heavyweight from either party to campaign in the state on a day when Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich wound up his campaign with a rally near his boyhood home in Baltimore County and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the party's Senate nominee, continued what his campaign described as an around-the-clock campaign tour that he had started on Sunday.

With the outlook uncertain in both top-of-the-ticket races, the candidates and their surrogates scratched for every possible vote in the final hours of the campaign.

Volunteers called potential voters from phone banks run by the campaigns and the state Democratic and Republican parties, and the four candidates -- plus Republican lieutenant governor candidate Kristen Cox and Anthony Brown, O'Malley's running mate -- hurried from one stop to the other shaking hands, holding rallies and encouraging volunteers to work harder.

DOJ_NMG_0091722

Gore's appearance at Leisure World attracted an overflow crowd of more than 300 to hear the former vice president and a host of Maryland Democratic officials, including O'Malley, Cardin attorney general candidate Doug Gansler and comptroller nominee Peter Franchot.

Gore spoke of the importance of the Cardin-Steele race to Democratic hopes of regaining control of the U.S. Senate.

"It may come down to right here," he said.

Congress has abdicated its responsibility to hold President Bush accountable for his failures, and a Democratic House and Senate are needed to ask the tough questions Republican leaders are not asking, Gore said.

He said Baltimore under O'Malley has had "the most competent, most cutting edge ... administration of any city in the country."

"Please don't take anything for granted. These are close races," Gore said.

Ehrlich returned to southwestern Baltimore County to end his campaign at a rally in the heart of Arbutus, where campaign commercials played on a giant screen and supporters chanted "four more years."

The Republican governor spoke from the back of a tow truck decorated with a dozen Maryland flags. He was joined by two Democrats, former Gov. Marvin Mandel and Baltimore City Councilman Nicholas D'Adamo.

"We have a record of accomplishment in this government and we haven't whined. People expect leadership, and that's what we've done," Ehrlich said.

Steele began an around-the-clock campaign schedule on Sunday, pausing only 45 minutes overnight for a nap, said Doug Heye, a campaign spokesman. The lieutenant governor toured coffee shops, grocery stores and went bowling. He also met with a group of ministers and, late in the day, shook hands with commuters getting off a train from Washington.

Cardin said at the Gore rally that the nation is moving in the wrong direction and a Democratic Senate and House are needed to set a new course.

"This election is about what type of country do we want to leave to our children and grandchildren," he told an audience of mostly older residents at the retirement community.

O'Malley criticized what he said were negative campaign commercials by the governor, drawing laughter from the crowd when he said, "Thank goodness, we won't see them on TV in 24 hours."

Gore Stumps For Cardin; Pastors Endorse Steele (WT)

By Jon Ward And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Former Vice President Al Gore campaigned yesterday with Maryland's Democratic candidates for the U.S. Senate and governor -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, respectively -- closing out the party's effort to hold off strong Republican campaigns.

Meanwhile, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele crisscrossed the state on a nonstop bus tour and received last-minute endorsements for his U.S. Senate campaign from the pastors of two Prince George's County's black megachurches. And Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. campaigned for re-election in Baltimore County, ending the day with a rally in his hometown of Arbutus.

Today's elections in Maryland could help decide whether Republicans will retain control of Congress and whether the Democrats maintain their dominance in state politics. Recent polls for the Senate and gubernatorial contests show that both are dead heats.

Polls open at 7 a.m. and close at 8 p.m.

Maryland elections also will test whether officials have fixed glitches in the state's electronic voting system that caused delays and confusion during September's primary elections.

The final results of close contests might not be known until late this week or next week, because voters have requested nearly 200,000 absentee ballots, which elections officials will begin counting Thursday.

An Anne Arundel County judge late yesterday denied a request by the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups to extend the deadline for voters to postmark absentee ballots. The ACLU filed a last-minute lawsuit, saying that some voters didn't receive their ballots in time to meet the deadline.

"If anybody tells you that one vote doesn't matter, tell them to come and talk to me," Mr. Gore said during a rally at Leisure World, a retirement community in Aspen Hill that is the state's largest voter precinct. "It matters more than perhaps it ever has."

Mr. Gore, who lost the 2000 presidential election to President Bush after weeks of recounts in Florida, said Mr. Cardin's contest with Mr. Steele "is going to be looked at all across the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0091723

"This is about more than a Senate seat in Maryland," said Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore. "It's about taking back our country."

Mr. O'Malley called the Ehrlich administration a "detour" in the state's progress.

"In just 24 hours, we will be making a very important decision about whether we are a state that moves forward," he said.

In Landover, Mr. Steele stood with several black clergymen and received an endorsement from the Rev. Joel Peebles of Jericho City of Praise in Landover -- one of the largest churches in the state, with about 15,000 members and a weekly attendance of about 7,500.

Mr. Peebles said Mr. Steele "is the right person for the right job for the U.S. Senate seat."

Mr. Steele said that Bishop Anthony G. Maclin of the Sanctuary at Kingdom Square in Capitol Heights "is standing with us," even though Mr. Maclin did not attend the press conference. Mr. Maclin's church has a weekly attendance of about 2,000.

"I am ready to take that seat in the United States Senate," said Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

In the gubernatorial race, Mr. Ehrlich held a late-afternoon "countdown to victory rally" in his hometown of Arbutus, a blue-collar town in southwestern Baltimore County.

"We have a lot of Democrats here," said Mr. Ehrlich, who was joined on stage by former Democratic Gov. Marvin Mandel. "One Maryland -- Republican, Democrat, independent, Green -- it doesn't matter. Send a message to Annapolis: Stop the shenanigans."

Late yesterday, state Democrats decried a flier that depicts Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson, among other black Democrats, as supporting Mr. Steele and Mr. Ehrlich.

"I resent that my picture is being used in something that's not true," Mr. Johnson said. "Everyone knows I'm supporting the Democratic ticket."

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said the flier, which was sent to Prince George's residents, was "recognition of the bipartisan relationship that has existed between Governor Ehrlich and Prince George's County officials these past four years."

The closeness of Maryland's races has befuddled national observers. Maryland is an overwhelmingly Democratic state, and the national mood is virulently anti-Republican.

Mr. Steele and Mr. Ehrlich have made inroads into the black community, which makes up about 30 percent of the state's Democratic Party.

Allen, Webb Cite Fate Of Senate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

For up-to-the-minute results, news, and

analysis, make WashingtonTimes.com your home for election night.

Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat James H. Webb Jr. yesterday urged Virginians to go to the polls, as they crisscrossed the state in their final full day of campaigning in a race that could determine control of the U.S. Senate.

The uncertainty of today's result was crystal clear yesterday, with the release of two competing polls -- one giving Mr. Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, an eight-point lead and the other showing Mr. Allen, a former governor and congressman, with a three-point lead.

Voters also will decide on a constitutional marriage amendment that is expected to drive turnout among conservatives in rural Virginia and more liberal voters who oppose the measure in Northern Virginia. Turnout is expected to be 65 percent of the state's 4.5 million registered voters.

Polls will open at 6 a.m. and close at 7 p.m. today.

As both candidates made stops in Richmond, Norfolk, Roanoke and Northern Virginia yesterday, they said voters have a chance to set the course of the nation.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican, ended his 10-month underdog campaign at a rally with former President Bill Clinton and more than 2,000 supporters in Old Town Alexandria.

"If you want America to take a different path, you to have to elect Jim Webb," Mr. Clinton said.

Mr. Clinton's visit prompted ridicule from Republicans who remember he lost in Virginia in 1992 and 1996 and that his last-minute visit for Lt. Gov. Donald S. Beyer in 1997 did not help the Democrat win the governor's race.

"You can tell a lot about someone by the folks they keep company with," Mr. Allen said in Norfolk, standing with Sen. John W. Warner, Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, Rep. Thelma Drake and former Redskins defensive end Deacon Jones.

DOJ_NMG_0091724

"I'll stand with these patriots closer to Virginia values and virtues than the group that my opponent is standing with," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Webb also was joined on the trail by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, former Govs. Mark Warner and L. Douglas Wilder and Rep. Robert C. Scott.

"You will not lose me in terms of my loyalties," Mr. Webb told voters.

Mark Warner, a Democrat, didn't mind that Mr. Allen was criticizing Mr. Webb's friends.

"I'll take that comparison. I think the people of Virginia are pretty happy with the way we govern," he said.

Mr. Wilder agreed: "We're going to win an upset ... that will have the whole nation talking."

Mr. Allen also criticized Mr. Webb as a friend of liberal Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

That theme carried on at each stop, which also included a solemn message from John Warner that he and Mr. Allen make a "good team." It was the same plea he made in an appearance with Mr. Allen in a two-minute ad last night.

"He has 23 years of serving those in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and now six in the United States Senate and he needs no on-the-job training," John Warner said in Richmond, to cheers from about 75 people in the overflowing room at the airport.

Mr. Allen, a former college quarterback, tossed a football at each event and called his supporters "teammates." They responded: "Six more years."

"Your enthusiasm is invigorating," he said.

A few hours earlier at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond, about 300 Webb supporters held signs and shouted, "Let's go Jim."

At that rally, at least one Webb voter ripped up a blue Allen sign. Another supporter held a sign that read: "Thanks, George Allen, for making me a Democrat."

Mr. Clinton simplified Republican campaign strategy as: Vote for me, "because my opponent is a slug, and they are going to tax you into the poorhouse, and on the way to the poorhouse, you'll meet a terrorist coming around the street corner, and when you try to run away from that terrorist, you are going to trip over an illegal immigrant."

Immigration, taxes and terrorism were an ongoing theme in Republican stump speeches.

"Republicans look at every day as Independence Day, they like it to be the Fourth of July," Mr. Allen said, paraphrasing President Reagan. "Democrats look at every day as April 15th."

The final days of each campaign showed a marked difference in mood.

Mr. Webb, criticized privately by Democrats for months for having a stiff style, seemed relaxed, enjoying himself and telling more jokes.

Mr. Allen, looking tired and showing weight loss, said with a big smile that the Gallup/USA Today poll released yesterday shows he has needed momentum in the final hours.

At their first debate in July, both candidates agreed that no matter the outcome they would sit down together for a beer when it was over.

By yesterday morning, the mood had soured.

"I don't think I will be drinking a beer with George Allen," Mr. Webb said. "I said I didn't want this to get personal, but I think he went too far."

When asked whether he still planned to get that beer, Mr. Allen shook his head, laughed and said flippantly: "Yeah, sure."

FBI Looks Into Voter Intimidation (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 7, 2006

The FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb.

Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate.

Jean R. Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office. The FBI is the investigative arm of the Justice Department.

Dee Rybiski, spokeswoman for the FBI here, declined comment.

Jensen said she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County.

Jensen said she later received a report from the Hampton registrar about a call to a voter there. That complaint came in response to an e-mail from Jensen to local registrars about possibly deceptive phone calls.

DOJ_NMG_0091725

"Voters should not be intimidated or deceived by phone messages purporting to be from election officials," Jensen said in a written statement. "Any communication from federal, state or local election officials will always be in a written form clearly identifying the official source."

With published polls depicting the Allen-Webb race as a tossup, both sides are mobilizing lawyers and voting experts to watch for irregularities and prepare for a possible recount.

In a written statement issued by the Webb campaign, state Democratic Party counsel Jay B. Myerson suggested that Republicans are behind efforts to suppress votes for Webb.

"We've seen this tactic before, and it is about time the Republicans learned that it will not work," Myerson said.

Shawn M. Smith, executive director of the Virginia Republican Party, said the state GOP and Allen campaign are focusing on mobilizing votes for Allen.

As for voter intimidation or suppression, Smith said: "We are not aware of any such activities taking place and are skeptical of the claims being made. Nonetheless, we condemn such activities if they are being conducted by outside organizations."

Lieberman Says Win Won't Be Debt To GOP (AP-Y)

By Andrew Miga

AP, November 7, 2006

Though Sen. Joe Lieberman expects to win a lot of Republican votes Tuesday, the Connecticut lawmaker said he won't feel especially beholden to the GOP if he is elected to a fourth term.

"I'll owe everybody and that's the point," Lieberman said Monday as he pressed for final votes at a senior center in Meriden.

Lieberman, whose Senate career was at risk just three months ago after he lost to anti-war challenger Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary, led Lamont by 12 percentage points in a statewide poll released Monday.

Lieberman is running as an independent and has enjoyed support from the GOP, including praise from the White House and fundraising help from prominent Republicans such as New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

But he said his comeback since the primary has convinced him that he needs to be a stronger independent voice.

"It's taken me as an independent-minded Democrat and really empowered me to be more independent," said Lieberman, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee. "Parties are important, but they're not as important as the public interest."

Potential gains by Democrats mean the Senate could end up in a 50-50 split, or something close to it. Republicans, who have already helped Lieberman's campaign, would likely court him in hopes of persuading him to switch parties.

Lieberman has pledged to remain a Democrat.

"At every occasion I'm going to try my best to build bridges instead of walls between people in both parties," he said.

Lamont, a Greenwich businessman and political newcomer who has spent $16 million of his own money, including a $2 million loan, on the race, gave a final speech at a union office in Hartford on Monday. He echoed the theme of change that he has used throughout the campaign.

"I say we have a lot of people who have been in Washington D.C., too long," Lamont said. "It's time to bring some new people down there who are going to shake up the way we do business."

Lieberman's independent bid rankled many Democrats who questioned his party loyalty. He has admitted to some bruised feelings about Democratic colleagues such as fellow Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, who endorsed him in the primary but is now backing Lamont.

"Well, we're all grown-ups," Lieberman said. "And the Senate is ultimately 100 people going to work in the same place every day and your ability to get things done depends on how well you get along with the other workers, so it will be fine."

A Fiery Warning Against Taking Risks (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

In a New Mexico district near the site of the first nuclear bomb test, Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican in a neck-and-neck race for re-election, has broadcast an incendiary television commercial against her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid. In the spot, images of fire mutate momentarily into floating fragments of text before dissolving again into flames: “North Korea conducts nuclear test. Reductions in military spending. The murder of any American anywhere on earth.” As a picture of the North Korean dictator, Kim Jong Il, gives way to an unflattering photo of Ms. Madrid, a narrator asks: “Can we trust her? With so much at stake? Does she have the experience we need? In a world like this, is she the one who will keep our families safe? Patricia Madrid. Don’t take the risk.”

DOJ_NMG_0091726

Puppy Power: How Humane Society Gets The Vote Out Animal Welfare Is The Issue, Not The Candidate's Party; Loaded For Bear Hunters By BRODY MULLINS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

DUBLIN, Calif. -- Wayne Pacelle marched up to a one-story house here last week, hoping to persuade the two Republicans inside to vote against incumbent Republican Rep. Richard Pombo.

"Beware of dog," read a nearby sign as Mr. Pacelle knocked on the front door. Suddenly, a pit bull charged from inside the house. Mr. Pacelle stumbled backward. The dog slammed into the door. A screen was all that separated the growling beast from the chief executive officer of the Humane Society of the United States.

"I may be with the Humane Society, but I prefer little dogs when I'm canvassing," said the 41-year-old Mr. Pacelle. For Mr. Pacelle, the pit bull is just one snarling obstacle in his path toward transforming the nation's largest group of pet lovers into a ferocious force in congressional elections. Call it puppy power at the polls.

For the first time in its 50-year history, the Humane Society is trying to elect candidates to Congress who support its animal-welfare agenda. After a series of mergers with other animal-welfare groups, the Humane Society counts 10 million Americans as members, an average of 23,000 in each of the 435 House districts. That's more than twice the membership of the National Rifle Association, which is considered one of the most effective single-issue campaign organizations.

More important, the Humane Society's motivating issue -- the promotion of animal welfare -- resonates with the white suburban women who could be the key block of voters who decide this election.

The Humane Society isn't campaigning for just one political party. Sen. Rick Santorum, a Republican from Pennsylvania, won its support this year for championing federal funding for animal-protection programs. Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen was endorsed for introducing legislation to require bitter-tasting antifreeze to discourage pets from lapping up spills.

ELECTION 2006

· Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

5 · Review the results of the latest polls6 in hot Senate races.

· The Senate's Uncertain States:7 Interactive profiles.

· Battlegrounds Poll:8 Who's ahead in hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

9 · Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers10

· Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts11

In the House, the Humane Society is campaigning for several Republicans in close races, including Reps. John Sweeney of New York and Christopher Shays of Connecticut. Mr. Sweeney, who represents Saratoga's race track, pushed legislation through the House to ban the slaughter of horses for human consumption.

Among Republicans the Humane Society is targeting are Montana's Sen. Conrad Burns, who opposed Mr. Sweeney's horse-slaughter bill in the Senate, Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico and Mr. Pombo of California.

The Humane Society has endorsed more than 300 candidates for Congress. But it has spent money in just two dozen of the closest races where Mr. Pacelle believes he can swing about 5% of the vote.

"Animals are a part of the fabric of our culture, so it's inevitable that the organized network that protects animals would activate for political ends," Mr. Pacelle said in an interview. About two-thirds of households have pets. "We can be an incredibly influential political organization, as powerful as the Chamber of Commerce," Mr. Pacelle told a crowd of election volunteers in Las Vegas last week.

Carolyn Mathias, a lifelong Republican, learned from the Humane Society that the state's Republican governor, Bob Ehrlich, had approved the state's first bear hunt in 50 years. The Humane Society publicized the decision in television advertisements that featured graphic images of dead bears.

"I'm sure it must sound unusual for a Republican to suddenly not vote Republican based on one issue," Ms. Mathias says. "The way I look at this is that the bears have no political party."

It cuts both ways. When Mr. Pacelle knocked on doors in Las Vegas last week for Republican Sen. John Ensign, a veterinarian, all but one of the volunteers who accompanied him were Democratic women.

Mr. Pacelle began creating the Humane Society political operation two years ago when he was named chief of the organization. Since then, he has quietly built a formidable election campaign machine. To comply with tax and election laws, Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0091727

Pacelle has created two offshoots of the Humane Society to focus on election campaigns. In total, the entities have spent $3.4 million on congressional elections and ballot initiatives, more than Exxon Mobil Corp. They have contributed $150,000 to candidates for Congress, which is more than Halliburton Co. has contributed.

The Humane Society has a long history of winning state ballot initiatives on issues ranging from banning cockfighting in Oklahoma to prohibiting hunting with steel-jawed leg traps in Colorado. This year, the Humane Society is battling the NRA over dove hunting in Michigan and big agriculture over the size of pigpens in Arizona.

The Humane Society first tested the waters in congressional elections in 2004 -- and then, in just one race. In that campaign, the group campaigned against Rep. Chris John in Louisiana when the Democrat ran for an open Senate seat against Republican Rep. David Vitter. Mr. John championed the state's legalized cockfighting industry, and the Humane Society didn't want to see him in the Senate.

Polls showed that nine in 10 women in Louisiana opposed cockfighting, so the Humane Society set about to tell 300,000 white female voters that Mr. John supported the practice. The group spent $400,000 on radio ads and mailings to get the message out. When Mr. Vitter won with 51% of the vote, the Humane Society knew it could be a force.

"If we could win in 'Sportsman's Paradise,' we can win anywhere," says Mr. Pacelle. A Yale graduate, Mr. Pacelle considered going to law school before dedicating his career to the protection of animals. Mr. Pacelle says he grew up with several pets and an "unusual interest in the welfare of animals." On his way to a recent news conference, Mr. Pacelle brought his fuel-efficient 2006 Toyota Prius to a halt to let a pigeon pass in front of him. "More than one million animals are killed each day by cars," he says. Divorced, Mr. Pacelle has no pets these days because, he says, he travels too much.

In the campaign's final days, the Humane Society focused on defeating Mr. Pombo, the California Republican who chairs the House Resources Committee. From that perch, Mr. Pombo has broad authority over environmental and agriculture legislation. The Humane Society backed Democratic candidate Jerry McNerney.

The Humane Society spent more than $100,000 on radio ads and $50,000 in mailings accusing Mr. Pombo of blocking legislation to promote animal welfare. A radio ad that aired last week accused Mr. Pombo of voting to "deny funding to crack down on the barbaric practices of dog fighting and cockfighting" and opposing legislation to outlaw the slaughter of American horses, "so the French can eat horse meat as a delicacy."

Such tactics "turned what might have been a snooze of a race into a nationally watched showdown," according to an Oakland Tribune article last week.

In Oakland last week, Mr. Pacelle embarked on his door-to-door canvassing tour dressed in tan khaki pants and a T-shirt that said "Get Political for Animals." After his encounter with the pit bull, Mr. Pacelle eyed a bumper sticker on a truck parked in a driveway: "Dog is my co-pilot," it read. "This is a good sign," Mr. Pacelle said, advancing to the door. In his typical pitch, Mr. Pacelle described Mr. Pombo as "so extreme he even actively supports commercial whaling."

A spokesman for Mr. Pombo predicted the Humane Society's effort would fail because voters would view the group as too extreme. "They are basically accusing members of Congress of clubbing baby seals and kicking puppies," said Brian Kennedy, the spokesman.

That sentiment was echoed by the Republican owners of the growling pit bull. Mr. Pacelle's speech about Mr. Pombo was cut off midsentence. "I don't think he kills dogs," the occupant said, shutting the door.

Mr. Pacelle fared better a few minutes later when he spotted a young couple getting into a black Ford Mustang. "She watches Animal Planet all the time," the man yelled as he drove away. "You've got our vote."

Social Security System Needs Bipartisan Solution (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Rather than fostering an environment for real solutions, your editorial is an example ("AARP's Tax Trap1," Review & Outlook, Nov. 1) of exactly what's wrong with the current debate over Social Security.

The AARP Voters' Guide asks candidates to respond to two questions on this issue. The first is whether they would support or oppose using Social Security to fund private accounts. Our opposition to this is simple: It adds unnecessary risk and trillions of dollars of debt to future generations, significantly compounding the solvency problem. In short, it is not a real solution, and an overwhelming majority of the American public opposes it for this very reason.

Our second question goes to the heart of the matter: Would the candidates support a balanced Social Security plan to continue guaranteed benefits for future generations? The fact is, there are only two ways to address the solvency problem -- adding more resources to the program or adjusting future benefits (or some combination of both). As President Reagan said in signing the last major Social Security bill in 1983, "In this compromise, we have struck the best possible balance between the taxes we pay and the benefits we get back." At the time, he also said that "one point has won universal agreement: The Social Security system must be preserved."

DOJ_NMG_0091728

Our research shows the American public wants a balanced, bipartisan solution, and understands that changes will be needed in order to keep our promises. History tells us it can be done. As President Reagan noted in signing the 1983 compromise, this "is a clear and dramatic demonstration that our system can still work when men and women of good will join together to make it work."

AARP's Tax Trap (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Social Security was supposed to be a killer issue for Democrats this election year after they defeated President Bush's reform plans in 2005. But suddenly the tables are turning on several Democratic candidates because of their endorsement of the tax-increase agenda of the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP.

The liberal entitlement lobby has asked candidates around the country to fill out a questionnaire asking, "Will you support a balanced Social Security plan to continue the program's guaranteed benefits for future generations?" That may sound innocuous, but here's how AARP defines its balanced plan on its Web site near the above question: "AARP believes that a bipartisan plan that balances additional contributions from high income workers with modest adjustments in future benefits can maintain guaranteed Social Security benefits for future generations."

Those italics are ours, because in Washington "additional contributions" means a tax increase. And by "high income workers," AARP can only mean anyone earning more than $94,200, which is the 2006 income level above which the 12.4% Social Security portion of the payroll tax no longer applies. Employers and workers each pay half of the payroll levy, and the income cap already rises each year with inflation.

Thus if you make, say, $100,000 a year but live in pricey Los Angeles, tough luck; the folks at AARP think you're rich. They supported the elimination of the income cap for Medicare's portion of the payroll tax (2.9%) as part of the Clinton 1993 tax increase, and now they want to do it for the other 12.4%. A worker earning $150,000 would pay roughly $6,900 more each year in "additional contributions" under this AARP definition of "balance."

Many members in both parties signed this pledge, but for a handful of Democrats in hotly contested House seats (see the table nearby) it's become a political liability. That's because their GOP opponents refused to take the AARP pledge and are making an issue of this Democratic support for raising taxes on middle- and upper-income wage earners. It's certainly information voters ought to have before next Tuesday. Strangely, however, the Democrats are crying foul, and AARP is trying to give them political cover.

Democrat Melissa Bean -- who is trying to hold her seat in an affluent district near Chicago -- now claims she never supported the tax increase she plainly endorsed in answering AARP's questionnaire. And AARP is helping her disavow her pledge by sending a letter to her district's AARP members (as well as to the districts of other vulnerable Democrats who took its pledge). The letter from AARP President William Novelli slams Ms. Bean's opponent David McSweeney for his "ads trying to scare voters."

This AARP complaint about Social Security "scare" tactics is certainly novel, given that its own political clout has been built entirely on scaring seniors. In 2005, it paid for a TV campaign claiming President Bush wanted to "dismantle Social Security." But see if you can follow AARP's latest logic: According to a Chicago Daily Herald interview with AARP spokesman Dave Sloane: "The organization does believe lifting the cap on Social Security taxes and cutting future benefits may be necessary to keep the system afloat." But then he added that to conclude that Ms. Bean supports these policies "is an outrageous leap that is not even close to the truth."

That's not what Mr. Sloane said in previous statements about the purpose of AARP's candidate survey. He was quoted in the Palm Beach Post as saying that the intent of the questionnaire was to "gauge support for the group's position on Social Security . . . We presume that all the candidates would have read the background material and understood our positions."

Translation: AARP was hoping to use its candidate survey to nail down enough support to raise taxes on Social Security and to defeat private investment accounts if Mr. Bush pushes for reform again next year. But now that its scheme has been exposed and is hurting its Democratic pals in tight races, AARP leaders want to deny that this is what they meant. Let's hope Republicans remember this AARP double-dealing, which resembles what the lobby did in endorsing a drug plan for Medicare in 2003 only to call it inadequate now.

One irony here is that the now-disavowed AARP questionnaire is more honest than the group usually is about the choices facing politicians on Social Security. One option -- opposed by AARP -- is to reduce long-term unfunded liabilities by allowing workers to divert some of their payroll taxes into private accounts and tap into the higher returns that private investments offer. This would go a good deal of the way to solving the problem.

Another option -- the AARP "balanced" plan -- requires either raising taxes or cutting the future benefits of young workers, or both. That is, AARP would make today's lousy Social Security deal for young workers even worse. By all means voters should pay close attention to what AARP asked and how the candidates answered. It may have been the most honest moment in these Congressional campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0091729

America's Crisis Of Confidence (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Here's something to think about when you cast your vote today: A new study shows that Americans have lost faith in the people who lead their federal, state and local governments, and in businesses, churches and schools. And they are afraid to fly.

"America is in trouble," reads the introduction to the 2006 National Leadership Index, sponsored by U.S. News & World Report and the Center for Public Leadership at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. According to the report, nearly three-quarters of Americans think that the nation faces a "leadership crisis."

This is the survey's second year, and it has been downhill all the way, said Todd Pittinsky, the center's research director. "Most groups are following the general trend of having low confidence and, if anything, having that confidence slip further."

The only leaders who earn more than a smidgen of Americans' confidence, the researchers say, are those in the military and medical fields. (Confidence in the media didn't slip, but it was in the sewer already.)

"We could have asked about grandmothers," Pittinsky said. "Maybe we could have had more confidence in grandmothers."

The researchers hope the survey will "contribute to our ongoing civic dialogue -- deepening our understanding of ourselves and the pressing need for effective, responsible democratic leadership."

Sounds scary. Like the section called "Global Leadership and Fear," in which 1,600 people were asked: "How optimistic do you feel about the safety of the United States from a terrorist attack?" Half felt at least a wee bit optimistic. But of the other half, 18 percent were somewhat pessimistic, and 16 percent wigged into the panicky "very pessimistic" category. Oddly, an additional 15 percent were neither pessimistic nor optimistic about the nation's safety.

Perhaps, joked survey researcher and assistant professor Seth Rosenthal, these are people "so paralyzed they can't even tell you if they're pessimistic."

The researchers also asked: "If you flew today, how confident do you feel that you would be safe from terrorist harm on a domestic flight?" Nearly half sucked it up on this one, saying they felt confident about flying safely. But 13 percent put a potential evildoer on every plane. "That's pretty bad," Rosenthal said. "Obviously there aren't planes being dropped out of the sky every day."

Blending fears of leadership failure and flying, the study further found that "Americans who are not confident at all that government leaders in Washington will respond effectively to an emergency crisis are less confident than other Americans about their safety from a terrorist attack on a domestic flight."

Any bright spots?

The group was asked to guess where the United States ranks among the top 32 industrialized nations in terms of citizens' life expectancy, economic equality and mathematics literacy.

Sunny optimism: The group put the United States in 10th place for longevity, and 15th for both economic equality and math skills.

Misplaced optimism, it turns out: Global rankings place the nation in 24th place for longevity, 30th for economic equality and 25th for math literacy. In other words, we are more elitist and lousier in math than even these disappointed, mistrustful and frightened Americans imagined. And we'll all die sooner than they thought.

Touch-screen Test (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

NEW VOTING MACHINES, like new computers, are generally faster than old ones. But as every computer user knows, reliability is often more important than speed. And a lot depends on who's using the machine and how.

After the debacle with punch-card ballots in Florida six years ago, many counties across the country traded in their clunky old voting machines for high-tech models — many of which enable people to vote just by touching names on a video screen. The switch, however, has drawn a new set of complaints. Some poll workers and computer scientists predict an election day plagued by long waits, glitches and miscounted votes. A more promising possibility is that, with the right equipment and procedures in place, electronic voting machines will deliver an unusually accurate and speedy count.

Unfortunately, the experience this election day is sure to fall somewhere in between. A number of states lack the safeguards necessary to address the machines' vulnerabilities to glitches and tampering. And even in states with those safeguards, such as California, the integrity of the results will depend on voters taking extra steps to make sure everything works as it should.

DOJ_NMG_0091730

So far, the most common complaint about the electronic voting devices is that they break down or freeze too often, which is an engineering problem (and one hardly new to computer users). More troubling are the reports that some of the devices have inexplicably tallied the occasional vote for the wrong candidate. Computer experts also have demonstrated how easy it is to rig a machine's software (or hardware) to steal votes.

These problems highlight the need for machines to print and store a record of each vote as it is cast. Manufacturers have resisted putting printers in their machines, and only a portion of the states where the machines are being deployed have insisted on a paper trail. One of them is California, where 32 of the 58 counties will make routine use of the new machines on election day. (In Los Angeles County, voters mark paper ballots that are counted by optical scanners.)

The machines will require voters and election officials to change their habits. The machines let voters check their ballot on a summary screen before it is cast, so they can correct any vote that somehow winds up in the wrong candidate's column. But voters also have to check the paper record before they leave the booth to preserve the accuracy of that record for a recount. Meanwhile, election officials need to keep a tighter lid on voting cards and other equipment. And after the polls close, random audits must be thorough enough to guard against software tampering.

Together, these steps can help deliver the improvements in accuracy that the new technology promises while minimizing the risks of software tampering and bugs. Now if only the manufacturers could develop machines that don't crash.

Vote! (WP)

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

WITH IMPORTANT state offices and control of Congress at stake, it is vital that voters not be deterred today.

The potential obstacles are most apparent in Maryland, where Republican and Democratic officials sparked an unprecedented run on absentee ballots with the unsubstantiated suggestion that electronic voting machines can't be trusted. The hype for absentee voting, sounded by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and echoed by Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), preyed on fears created by the disarray of the September primary. But human error caused the most serious problems; the vote-counting machines worked without apparent problems.

Distrust of electronic voting is not limited to Maryland. Theories, many fanciful, abound about the ease of hacking into voting machines. There has been no evidence of that occurring, and the layers of scrutiny and security in force on Election Day cast doubt on whether experiments hatched in the privacy of a lab could be carried out in public. We support a verifiable paper trail to add a layer of safety and bolster public confidence. But there's a thin line between raising reasonable questions and persuading voters that there's no point in turning out. Happily, a recent Post poll showed that despite all the controversy, an overwhelming majority of Maryland voters are confident that their votes will be counted.

Then there's the Republican manual for its poll watchers in Maryland. The tone of the GOP message ("Your most important duty as a poll watcher is to challenge people who present themselves to vote but who are not authorized to vote") compares unfavorably with that of the Democrats to their poll watchers ("Your primary job is to ensure that every eligible voter who wants to vote gets to vote"). But the Democratic allegation that the GOP approach represents a conspiracy to suppress the vote is overwrought and unsupported. Much of the GOP manual mirrors state elections board procedures. State elections officials -- who reviewed the materials of both parties -- found incorrect information from the Democrats as well as the Republicans.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

Negative media

"We are told by careful pollsters that half of the American people believe that American troops should be brought home from Iraq immediately. This news discourages supporters of our efforts there. Not me, though: I am relieved. Given press coverage of our efforts in Iraq, I am surprised that 90 percent of the public do not want us out right now," James Q. Wilson writes in City Journal.

"Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 30, 2005, nearly 1,400 stories appeared on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening news. More than half focused on the costs and problems of the war, four times as many as those that discussed the successes. About 40 percent of the stories reported terrorist attacks; scarcely any reported the triumphs of American soldiers and Marines. The few positive stories about progress in Iraq were just a small fraction of all the broadcasts," Mr. Wilson said.

"When the Center for Media and Public Affairs made a nonpartisan evaluation of network news broadcasts, it found that during the active war against [then-Iraqi dictator] Saddam Hussein, 51 percent of the reports about the conflict were negative. Six months after the land battle ended, 77 percent were negative; in the 2004 general election, 89 percent were negative; by the spring of 2006, 94 percent were negative. This decline in media support was much faster than during Korea or Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0091731

"Naturally, some of the hostile commentary reflects the nature of reporting. When every news outlet struggles to grab and hold an audience, no one should be surprised that this competition leads journalists to emphasize bloody events. To some degree, the press covers Iraq in much the same way that it covers America: it highlights conflict, shootings, bombings, hurricanes, tornadoes and corruption.

"But the war coverage does not reflect merely an interest in conflict. People who oppose the entire war on terror run much of the national press, and they go to great lengths to make waging it difficult."

Changing his tune

"On a campaign bus trip around Baltimore on Saturday, U.S. Senate candidate Michael S. Steele, a black Republican, told me to watch out for what Sen. Barack Obama would say in Tennessee on Sunday," reporter Jon Ward of The Washington Times writes at the Insider Political Blog at www.washingtontimes.com.

"Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat and the fifth black senator in U.S. history, campaigned against Lt. Gov. Steele in Bowie last week," Mr. Ward said.

"Mr. Obama, a rising political star and potential presidential contender, tried to dissuade black Democrats from crossing party lines to vote for Mr. Steele, who has run a savvy campaign against Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who is white.

"You don't vote for somebody because of what they look like," Mr. Obama said Thursday.

Mr. Steele predicted that Mr. Obama's tune might change in Tennessee, when he campaigned for Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a black Democrat running for U.S. Senate.

Sure enough, Mr. Obama used racial politics while stumping for Mr. Ford at a black church Sunday.

" 'I'm feeling lonely in Washington,' Mr. Obama told worshippers at Mt. Zion Baptist in Nashville, according to the Associated Press. 'I need my dear friend to join me.' "

Bias? What bias?

"According to MSNBC's Chris Matthews, if Democratic Senate candidate Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. loses Tuesday, you can blame it on white conservatives," Brad Wilmouth reports at NewsBusters.org, commenting on the Senate race in Tennessee.

Recent polls show Mr. Ford trailing Republican Bob Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga.

Why? Fear, says Mr. Matthews: "The larger the black population, where the whites are afraid historically, and in Deep South states, they tend to become very conservative Republican out of fear, whatever, of an overwhelming, or a large number of African-Americans because of the kind of culture."

Not that Mr. Matthews -- a Philadelphia native and former Democratic congressional staffer -- has any biases of his own, as NewsBusters' Mark Finkelstein reports. During an interview yesterday morning on NBC's "Today" show, Meredith Vieira asked Mr. Matthews why he was smiling.

"Because I think it's going to be a wipeout," Mr. Matthews said. "I think the Democrats are going to carry the House by 20-some, high 20s, and I think the Senate seats are perhaps not six, but five, and I can see a big victory for the Democrats."

Show that ID

Missouri's chief elections official said yesterday she was asked for photo identification at the voting booth despite a court ruling striking down the requirement.

"I'm guessing this may be happening in other parts of the state," said Secretary of State Robin Carnahan, a Democrat who had opposed Republican efforts to mandate a photo ID in Missouri.

She said that a worker at the St. Louis Election Board asked her three times to show photo ID when she went to cast an absentee ballot Friday.

Miss Carnahan said that she tried to explain a photo ID was not necessary, but that the election worker replied that she was instructed to ask for one anyway. Miss Carnahan said she eventually was allowed to vote without displaying a photo identification.

"To have that experience personally was very troubling," she said.

The Missouri Supreme Court last month upheld a lower court's ruling overturning a law that would have required voters to show a photo ID issued by the state or federal government.

Scott Leiendecker, the Republican director of the St. Louis Election Board, did not immediately return a call yesterday, the Associated Press reports.

Miss Carnahan said she spoke with Mr. Leiendecker, who assured her that the identification requirements would be clarified and that voters on Election Day would not be pressed to present a photo ID.

Muslim voters

A Muslim group says it has been phoning Muslims nationwide to remind them to go to the polls today.

"The calls are being heavily targeted towards districts where there is a large Muslim population and heavy Muslim turnout could make a significant difference in the elections. Virginia, Florida, New Jersey, Ohio and Texas are a few states that have been targeted," the Muslim American Society said in an e-mail, referring to what it calls the Freedom Foundation Center for Electoral Empowerment.

DOJ_NMG_0091732

The group said its callers are offering transportation to the polls.

"Callers are reminding Muslims that such important issues as the war in Iraq, civil liberties, immigration, health care, education and economic justice will be greatly impacted by the November 7th elections," the group said.

Must We Talk? (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Have you been trying to ignore this election? Do you avoid talking politics with friends? Do you tune out right-wing talk shows and stay away from left-wing blogs? Do you change channels as soon as you hear the words "Pelosi," "Foley," "cut and run" or "macaca"?

Then you owe it to your country to vote today. It's the rest of us who should stay home.

We've lost our bearings because we've followed the old advice to discuss this amongst ourselves. Democracy, we've been told, is best served when informed citizens deliberate the issues of the day, pooling their wisdom to reach a judicious consensus.

But what really happens when people discuss politics? Consider an experiment last year, when groups of Coloradans convened separately in Boulder and Colorado Springs to discuss global warming, affirmative action and civil unions for same-sex couples. Before the discussions, the people in Boulder were on average more liberal than the ones in Colorado Springs, but there were also moderates in both places whose opinions overlapped.

After the group discussions, the people in Boulder moved to the left, and those in Colorado Springs moved to the right. The researchers — David Schkade, Cass Sunstein and Reid Hastie — concluded that "the major effect of deliberation was to make group members more extreme than they were before they started to talk."

This effect hasn't been studied much in politics, but it's well documented in other arenas. When jurors deliberate how much to award in damages, they often end up giving more than the average juror originally thought was fair — and sometimes more than anyone in the group originally favored. The more they talk, the more they reinforce one another's indignation.

Group polarization is less of a problem if the people start with a wide range of opinions — even if they tend to shift in whatever direction the majority favors, they'll at least be exposed to other views and become more tolerant. There's some evidence that if you purposely assemble a diverse group of discussants and systematically educate them about an issue, some of the people will moderate their opinions.

But when people informally discuss politics, they often don't hear a range of views. As in Boulder and Colorado Springs, they may be surrounded by like-minded people in their neighborhoods, churches and offices. During local elections, they're much more likely now than in the past to hear one-sided rhetoric because gerrymandering has produced so many one-sided districts, making it impossible for moderate candidates to survive.

Thanks to cable television, talk radio and the Internet, it's easier than ever for people to have their opinions validated around the clock. As the media audiences segregate themselves ideologically, they become more extreme in their views — and more convinced than ever that they represent the sensible middle.

When conservatives have their views reinforced daily on talk radio and Sundays at their churches, they start to believe the "mainstream media" is a bunch of wacko traitors. When liberals spend their days reading lefty blogs, or working on campuses surrounded by ideological soulmates, they start convincing themselves that most "corporate media" are right wing, and that Fox News is pure propaganda.

In fact, most journalists do try to be objective, but as a group they, too, can become polarized by spending most of their time talking to fellow journalists and experts with similar views. One of the cleverest demonstrations of this effect was a study published last year in Harvard's Quarterly Journal of Economics. The researchers, Tim Groseclose and Jeffrey Milyo, devised a scale for measuring the slant of news reports by keeping track of which think tanks — liberal or conservative — were quoted most often.

The researchers found that The Washington Times and Brit Hume's evening newscast on Fox fell on the conservative side of the scale, while all the other news media outlets they studied fell on the liberal side. The surprising result — to liberals, at least — was that Fox was closer to the ideological center than the Big Three evening newscasts as well as all the major newspapers and newsweeklies.

Of course, these ideological divides are small compared with the ones in the blogosphere, which is one giant version of the Colorado experiment. You can always find a group online to affirm your brilliant opinions. It's immensely satisfying, but it can also make Election Day a miserable experience. Tonight, you can't help noticing how many ignorant people out there disagree with you.

DOJ_NMG_0091733

Clinton Is Midterm Campaign's Biggest Spender, Records Show, At $29.5 Million And Counting (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has spent more money in the midterm election cycle than any other politician running for office this year, campaign finance records show, investing more than twice as much as most candidates in tight races across the country.

To secure her Democratic re-election bid in New York, Mrs. Clinton spent $29.5 million through the middle of October, according to the Federal Election Commission, suggesting that she may have her sights on a future national campaign. While much of the amount is devoted to television advertising, it is the bills for catering, flowers and photography that elevated her tally far above other Senate candidates'.

While Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, spent $21.5 million through the same time period, records show, his spending report comprises bills like $30.33 at Papa John's pizza, $59.50 at Panera Bread and $74.34 at the Olive Garden.

Not so for Mrs. Clinton, whose campaign reported sending a $6,585 check to Flutterbyes for flowers in Las Vegas, $5,397.50 to Le Petit Gourmet Catering in Glendale, Colo., and $80,000 to Tavern on the Green in Manhattan. Those were among the bills gleaned from a page-by-page review of Mrs. Clinton's third-quarter campaign finance report, which showed disbursements of more than $8 million.

The chairman of the Federal Election Commission, Michael E. Toner, said only a handful of Senate candidates had ever spent more. The spending patterns of the Clinton campaign demonstrated "an extraordinary burn rate," he said, which was particularly striking considering she did not seem to have a serious challenger in John Spencer, her Republican rival.

"It may be that Clinton is spending so heavily in New York to try to accomplish the kind of landslide that President Bush enjoyed in 1998," said Mr. Toner, referring to the Texas governor's race eight years ago. "The president's 1998 race unquestionably helped lay the groundwork for a successful presidential campaign in 2000. History may be repeating itself."

A spokeswoman for the campaign, Ann Lewis, said Mrs. Clinton began raising and spending money in January 2005, preparing for "whatever came our way." When a competitive race did not materialize, Ms. Lewis said, the campaign began investing in an extensive get-out-the-vote program to remind Democrats not to overlook the election.

"If it is not considered to be close, you've got to give people a really good reason to vote for you," Ms. Lewis said. "Frankly, there is not a statewide race that has built-in excitement."

A review of the Clinton campaign's filings with the Federal Election Commission showed that in addition to contributing $2.6 million to other Democrats, the campaign spent more than $2 million on advertising for television, radio and newspapers in the third quarter of the year.

The largest payment, $1.58 million, went to Media Strategies and Research of Denver, Colo., a Democratic political advertising firm. In addition, about $600,000 in fees were paid to Grunwald Communications, which is run by Mrs. Clinton's longtime adviser Mandy Grunwald.

The remainder of the costs covered staff salaries and expenses for Mrs. Clinton. From Connecticut to California, nearly all fund-raising functions included catering, parking and photography.

"An important part of any event is the photo line," Ms. Lewis said. "There is always a good chunk of time during the evening where she is taking photos."

Hillary Gets An Address Wrong (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

In both theory and great expectations, today is the beginning of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. By nightfall she will have won lopsided reelection to the U.S. Senate, with plenty of money left over to start a presidential effort. She enjoys the sort of name recognition a president might envy and has the unalloyed good wishes of Democratic activists who have been waiting all these dark and awful years for a Clinton Restoration. After all, if the Bushes could do it -- one mediocre, the other incompetent -- then why not the brilliant and dazzling Clintons? The answer may be Hillary herself. She can bore a grateful nation.

Such, anyway, was the effect of her recent appearance at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. The anticipation was great. The crowd was huge, and the fact that Clinton had agreed to speak to this august body meant -- it had to mean -- that she was at last going to say something thumping about Iraq. Instead she delivered a no-news address lacking controversy, fresh approaches or even a single soaring sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0091734

If one sparrow does not make a spring, then one speech is not a campaign. But those of us who have heard Clinton before were reminded that she can be industrially dull, so cautious that nothing comes out of her mouth except bromides. In his book about Hillary and her 2000 campaign ("Hillary's Turn"), Michael Tomasky dubbed her "The Laundry Lady" for the numbing numbers of little programs she would somehow implement if elected.

Caution has served Clinton well in the Senate. There, she has listened to the wisdom of Robert Byrd, who gave her his standard nose-to-the-grindstone tutorial and beamed with avuncular pride as she took it to heart and grandstanded not. On the other hand, she has led not, either.

Clinton supposedly comes to the presidential race with two built-in constituencies: women and minorities. The former I'm not so sure about, for wherever I go and her name comes up it is the ladies who make faces. As for minorities, Hillary is Bill and Bill is Hillary, and their record, if not his rhetoric, is unmatched. She has earned her following.

But that leaves the rest of us who might seek something more in a presidential candidate than lists and caution and itsy-bitsy steps toward universal health care. We want, yes, vision, leadership. We want rhetoric that soars, poetry that compels and every once in a while a phrase that pumps the heart and draws a tear. We rarely hear that sort of thing from Hillary Clinton.

The Council on Foreign Relations is not, I grant you, a stadium full of partisans. It calls for a certain understated style. Even so, Clinton managed to bore the likes of stockbrokers, money managers, corporate lawyers and others who you might think are already inured to boredom. Here and there I even saw people fighting sleep. This was her audience -- predisposed to like her, already respecting her. She gave it nothing.

Clinton, in a way, personifies the Democratic Party. Many of the most prominent mentionables (Dodd, Kerry, Biden, Edwards) have pretzeled themselves over Iraq, voting for, arguing against and now expressing dismay. But on their own, they offer not much that lifts the heart. It is a field of the familiar. Oddly, Hillary Clinton is the fresh face, undefeated and on the cusp of history itself. Given who she is and, importantly, what she is -- smart, disciplined and, when she wants, charming -- there are those who say that this campaign is hers to lose. Last week she took a first step toward that goal.

Eyeing 2008, Political Stars Ran Hard For Others (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

It's been a punishing month of bad food, airplane air and hoarse vocal cords. And Barack Obama isn't even on the ballot today.

The popular senator from Illinois, who has barnstormed the country on behalf of Democratic gubernatorial and congressional candidates, is one of the A-list political celebrities of the 2006 campaign season. Other big draws: former president Bill Clinton, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

They aren't doing it for the frequent-flier miles. These headliners bring glitz to otherwise ho-hum rallies and help dazzle donors out of millions of dollars. They earn the gratitude of future officeholders and get to know thousands of voters.

That's all very useful, given that these non-candidates may run for president in two years -- or, as with Clinton, the non-candidate is married to a 2008 hopeful, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Giuliani's itinerary in the closing days included Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and South Carolina. All four states have Republican candidates on the ballot this year and will host crucial early primaries in 2008.

"You're building up chits," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democrats' campaign committee, who has summoned Obama, Clinton and others to appear on behalf of his candidates. "Everyone wants to say that they got out there and put some skin in the game and contributed to a big win."

Sometimes the visits telegraph something about a candidate. Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for Florida governor, was too busy yesterday to meet up with President Bush in Pensacola but did find time to rally with McCain in Jacksonville. Crist is trying to woo moderate voters to edge out his Democratic rival, Rep. Jim Davis.

And sometimes they make the wrong kind of news. Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) was a popular Democratic guest speaker until an event in California last week for gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides, when he botched a joke about Bush and the war in Iraq. Republicans portrayed the comment as an insult to U.S. troops, and it became a rallying cry for conservative voters in the campaign's final stretch.

More typical: a fundraiser Sunday night in Nashville, headlined by McCain along with fellow GOP Sens. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee and John Thune of South Dakota, on behalf of Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker. As of last night, when McCain returned to Arizona to campaign for Sen. Jon Kyl, he had attended 346 events in this election cycle and had raised more than $10.5 million on behalf of Republican candidates.

Clinton's November schedule was packed with 21 events, including two rallies for his wife, who is expected to easily win a second Senate term today. The former president, still wildly popular with the Democratic base, hit 100-plus events in 31 states for this election cycle, raising more than $33 million from Democratic donors. He also taped 100 prerecorded campaign calls and filmed numerous television and radio ads. Last night, Clinton hit a rally in Alexandria with Senate candidate James Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0091735

But Obama may be the biggest attraction. Despite his brief two years on the national stage, Obama has generated rapturous enthusiasm among Democrats, and he has said he is considering a presidential run. His success on the campaign trail in recent weeks has added to his cachet.

The Obama blitz started on Oct. 5 with a fundraiser in New York City for the state's congressional candidates. The next day he flew to Florida for a rally and fundraiser, and then he moved on to Kansas City, Minnesota and Ohio. By the 13th, he had held fundraisers for all the Senate Democratic candidates, collecting $2 million. On Oct. 25 and 26, Obama sent a joint fundraising e-mail to supporters of Kerry and to MoveOn.org, the antiwar group, and raised a total of $1.6 million, all for individual congressional candidates.

The freshman senator paused in the middle of the month for book-related events, then raced through Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Arizona, Colorado and Washington state. Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs estimates that Obama has visited all the main Senate battlegrounds at least three times. Another mainstay is Massachusetts, where Obama was an early supporter of Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick, who is favored to win today, and who, like Obama, is African American.

At a Democratic rally in Norristown, Pa., he received rock-star treatment when he took the stage to tout the state's congressional candidates. In an audience of 1,000, people waved copies of his new book and angled for his autograph. One cried out "We love you!" as Obama came into view.

"I love you back!" Obama responded.

He gave the same speech he has delivered at dozens of similar rallies, explaining how Americans can have "the audacity of hope" to change their lives and those of others. That's also the title of his latest book, published Oct. 17.

The crowd ate it up. Dianne Wills, a Norristown resident and a Republican, said after the rally she would vote Democratic this year after hearing Obama and other speakers. "It convinced me that my choice is right," Wills said.

How Mr. Rich Spreads The Republican Word Millionaire Investor Who Leans Libertarian Pushes Conservative Ballot Initiatives In 14 States (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- This may turn out to be a bad year for Republicans. But perhaps not for some of the conservative causes they support, thanks in part to a New York real-estate investor who has directed millions of dollars toward ballot initiatives to expand private-property rights, cut state budget growth, and impose term limits on judges.

The millionaire behind many ballot measures this year is Howard Rich, a publicity-shy, libertarian-leaning businessman who has become the go-to man for supporters of conservative ballot initiatives. The group Mr. Rich chairs, Americans for Limited Government, as well as a handful of other organizations that he fully controls or bankrolls, have put more than $15 million this election season into ballot campaigns in 14 states, public records show.

Mr. Rich and his supporters have sustained a number of setbacks, as many of his initiatives were kept from ballots because of vague wording or signature-gathering irregularities. But in nine states where the measures have survived, recent polling shows some chance of victory today.

On ballots in Arizona, California, Idaho, Nevada, and Washington state, Mr. Rich's proposals seek to prevent governments from imposing land-use measures on private property. In Oregon, Maine, and Nebraska, the measures he backs would restrict a state's ability to raise taxes or increase spending. In Colorado, his proposal would impose retroactive term limits on judges.

Over the years, Mr. Rich has granted few interviews and has become an almost mythic figure in certain political circles. He sits on the boards of the Cato Institute and the Club for Growth, and controls other groups such as U.S. Term Limits and Fund for Democracy, which in turn funnels millions of dollars into other organizations, such as America at Its Best.

Mr. Rich, after writing that he would "gladly answer questions via email" for this article, didn't respond to a subsequent set of queries sent to his email address.

ELECTION 2006

· Election Quiz:1 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com2, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video3 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20064.

DOJ_NMG_0091736

Recently, he granted a brief interview to a nonprofit conservation magazine called High Country News. In that interview, which was taped and has been made public, Mr. Rich said he has made it a practice to help local activists in their fight against politicians who are "plowing over peoples' rights."

"I made a few bucks in business, so I'm able to do this stuff," he said.

Mr. Rich's reclusive nature has created a cottage industry among opponents of his ideas, who have rooted through public records in a dozen states seeking clues about the groups he controls and the money those groups dispense to state-ballot efforts.

Among those groups is the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, a left-leaning Washington, D.C.-based organization that recently launched a Web site -- howierichexposed.com5 -- to highlight the groups affiliated with the New York investor. "Howie Rich From New York City is practically a noun in the West these days," said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the organization.

This isn't the first year Mr. Rich has waded into the arena of initiative balloting. A group he operates pushed term-limit proposals in many states in the 1990s. But he is becoming ubiquitous in an expensive and specialized area of politics. About half the states allow citizen-driven initiatives. This year is one of the busiest in history, with about 75 proposals crowding ballots in 36 states. In recent years, national organizations, along with local groups, have seized on initiatives as a way to push issues before voters that politicians have been reluctant to bring up, or to drive voter turnout for other causes or candidates.

Though often characterized as citizen-driven, initiative campaigns are becoming dominated by corporate and national partisan interests.

In California, tobacco companies Reynolds American Inc. and Altria Group Inc. are spending tens of millions of dollars campaigning against a proposed cigarette-tax increase -- as well as bankrolling antitax and antismoking ban proposals in several other states. One proposition on the ballot in California -- long at the vanguard of citizen initiatives -- would put a $10,000 cap on corporate contributions to ballot initiatives.

Unlike regular political campaigns, proposition initiatives require extensive signature-gathering and often include an outsize educational campaign, as proponents attempt to simplify often-recondite ballot proposals for voters. These added tasks often make initiative campaigns more expensive than average races.

In California this year, five organizations wholly or partially controlled by Mr. Rich have given a combined $3.37 million to push a "takings" initiative, state records show. The proposals would bar state and local governments from condemning private property to promote other private developments.

On its face, the measure is a reaction to a recent Supreme Court eminent-domain case. But in reality, the takings proposals carry a twist that opponents characterize as draconian: They also limit government's ability to rezone private property, apply restrictive covenants, or impose environmental regulations on a property without compensating the owner.

The takings proposals are patterned after a Rich-backed initiative that passed in Oregon in 2004, which requires the state to pay landowners for new zoning regulations or waive the new restrictions. In three years, landowners have filed damage claims from new zoning regulations that now total $3 billion, according to a Portland State University study -- far outstripping Oregon's ability to pay.

Though the takings measure appears headed for defeat in California, similar initiatives are faring better in Arizona, Montana, Idaho and Washington. In those states, surveys show the proposal is either statistically tied or leading among likely voters.

In those states and in Nevada -- where a takings measure remains on the ballot but was stripped by a court of its more punitive elements -- Mr. Rich's Americans for Limited Government group has supplied the lion's share of the money spent to back them. In Arizona, for example, the pro-takings local organization, Arizona HomeOwners Protection Effort, reports that nearly 86% of the $1.34 million it has collected for its campaign came from Americans for Limited Government. ALG provided a similar share of the support in Idaho. In Washington, it gave about 30% of the total collected by the Property Fairness Coalition, records show.

In addition to takings, groups affiliated with Mr. Rich bankrolled measures to restrict state budget growth bankrolled antispending measures in nine states, three of which have survived legal challenge. A group where Mr. Rich is a director has also provided more than $1.1 million in Colorado to promote a term-limit proposition for judges, according to campaign-finance records there. All told, at least five groups that Mr. Rich controls or serves as a director, including the Fund for Democracy, America at its Best, U.S. Term Limits, and Club for Growth, have given money to conservative ballot campaigns this year, campaign-finance records show.

The collection of Rich-affiliated groups, and the fact that the organizations don't have to reveal their donors, have given ammunition to proposal opponents, who say the campaigns are sham citizen initiatives controlled by a reclusive out-of-stater attempting to usurp local authority.

DOJ_NMG_0091737

Oregon's governor has publicly criticized Mr. Rich's activities. In Montana, where three Rich-backed initiatives recently were tossed off the ballot, Gov. Brian Schweitzer challenged Mr. Rich to a debate. "Howard Rich and his wealthy buddies won't even reveal who is funding their campaign," Mr. Schweitzer said. "I invite them to come to Montana, tell us who they are and what their shady initiative is all about."

Among Mr. Rich's defenders is Grover Norquist, of Americans for Tax Reform, a group that supports many of the same ballot measures. Mr. Norquist said Mr. Rich's reputation rests on the simple fact that he is a capable organizer who knows a lot of people and has the money to assist in grass-roots causes. It's not what opponents like to see, Mr. Norquist says.

"So they say, 'He's from New York,'" Mr. Norquist says, "but there's no there there. He's just a man you go to if you have a good idea: term limits, spending limits, property rights."

A Civil Abortion Debate? (USAT)

By Laura Vanderkam

USA Today, November 7, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — South Dakota isn't usually a battleground state, but this fall, one of the country's most important political fights has been waged here on the bitterly cold plains between Mount Rushmore and the Minnesota state line. In March, Gov. Mike Rounds signed a law that would ban almost all abortions within the state. Opponents countered by collecting enough signatures to put the issue on today's ballot as "Referred Law 6."

The referendum's outcome doesn't matter. If the ban passes, it will be blocked in court. If defeated, South Dakota won't become an abortion hub. Doctors perform only about 800 abortions annually here, almost all in one squat brick clinic near this city's main shopping mall.

What matters is that South Dakota's referendum represents one of the few times since 1973, when the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision legalized abortion nationwide, that voters have gotten to debate the question directly at the polls.

And yes, debate is the right word. Despite the hostility usually associated with this topic, the residents I spoke with reported refreshingly little screaming. South Dakotans have simply discovered that when you have to persuade your neighbors to join your cause — not judges in Washington — both sides become remarkably civil. That civility has been rare during the past three decades' abortion wars. It's a welcome change — but it's also a chance to wonder how much more pleasant the national debate might have been if we had all been able to forge compromises within our communities instead of indulging in the extremes that carry the day.

Certainly, some South Dakotans — and the outsiders raising money for both sides — have turned shrill. Vandals have defaced signs, and locals report being called just a few too many times on the topic. Nonetheless, leaders of both sides have made a point of avoiding extreme rhetoric in those calls and in their ads.

Jan Nicolay, a former Republican state representative and co-chair of the anti-ban South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, tells me that her side quickly nixed traditional abortion rights prose (e.g. "get your rosaries off my ovaries").

"Because this is a personal, sensitive issue, we wanted to treat it in as professional a manner as we possibly could," Nicolay says. SD Healthy Families decided to educate voters about the law's text and appeal to frugal residents by pointing out how much defending the law in court would cost. One TV commercial even starts with the message that "South Dakotans agree: Honor and protect human life." But with no rape or incest exceptions, the ad says, the law goes too far.

On the other side, Leslee Unruh, who manages the Vote Yes For Life campaign, also shies from extreme slogans. Years ago she had an abortion, which left her devastated — but also repulsed by the abortion-opponents side's traditional pictures of dismembered fetuses. "Putting a picture, a gruesome picture, in front of someone's face that's had an abortion — and there are many of us, we're everywhere — it's so harsh," she says. "It's not the way to help women, and it's not the way to end abortion. … If you want to show pictures of dead babies, stay in your own state."

Instead, the official Vote Yes for Life T-shirt features pictures of young, smiling women. Some literature includes the almost-feminist-sounding theme that motherhood can be empowering, even in difficult circumstances.

Of course, South Dakotans have a reputation for reasonableness. Harsh rhetoric "wouldn't play very well here," says Jean Morrow, a United Church of Christ minister who campaigns against the ban (and has received only one really nasty letter as a result).

But it's not just South Dakotan friendliness that's keeping the debate civil. To win, both sides know they have to persuade neighbors they know and like to join them. To do that, you can't call people names. Unruh reports that one of her neighbors, who is voting against the ban, said he hoped they could still have a conversation on this issue by the fence, as they've always had. "This is one issue I'd love to convince him on," she says. "I'm not going to, but that doesn't change my respect for him as a person, or his for me."

DOJ_NMG_0091738

Across this state, thousands of such conversations are taking place — conversations that have been rare since Roe froze the debate. Since 1973, people have counted votes on the Supreme Court, not in their own precincts. Because the issue has been removed from the messy, democratic sphere, positions have hardened into philosophically pure abstractions that don't feel right to many Americans.

To some groups that oppose abortion, there's no difference among contraceptives, the "morning after" pill and early-term abortions. The South Dakota law, however, would go ahead and OK the first two but not the latter.

If the ban fails, it won't be because South Dakotans like abortion; it will be because there's no rape or incest exception. Philosophically, there might be no difference between a child conceived in rape and a child conceived because her parents were careless, but most people, in the spirit of compromise, are willing to say there is.

The abortion-rights side in this country haslikewise tried to remain so pure that it has fought to preserve late-term abortion availability with a zeal many find unseemly. Philosophically, there might be little difference between late- and early-term abortions, but polls still find that most voters disapprove of the former but tolerate the latter.

People live in the real world where compromises must be made. You give a little to get your neighbor on board.

It raises the question: What if all our abortion battles had been fought this way — democratically, with messy compromises — over the past 33 years? We might have reached an answer by now. Maybe. But if South Dakota's any indicator, we'd be a lot less strident. Abortion may be a battleground, but as Unruh says, "We don't have to turn it into a civil war."

Laura Vanderkam is a 2006-07 journalism fellow with the Phillips Foundation, a non-profit group devoted to advancing constitutional principles, a democratic society and free enterprise. She is also a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

The Politics Of Frustration (NYT)

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Ever since anti-taxation zealots in California rediscovered the populist frisson of the ballot initiative a generation ago, American politics has gone off on a binge of ballot proposals. Today is one of the busiest, with 81 citizen initiatives before voters in more than 20 states. Pity the poor voter who has to wade through a list of sometimes contradictory, sometimes misleading proposals, doing work that should be the responsibility of elected officials.

We always watch with interest — and sometimes with concern — to see how people exercise this peculiar power. Will Alaskans stop aerial hunting of wolves and bears? What happened in Oklahoma to impel the proposal to stop paying the salary of state legislators doing jail time? Arizonans will have to decide whether they want the state to randomly award $1 million to one lucky voter in future elections, in order to encourage turnout. (A better inducement, in a state where voters have to come up with opinions on 19 questions today, might just be to cut down on the initiatives.) Citizens in some states are being asked to stand up to the tobacco industry's national clout by approving higher tobacco taxes at home and greater restrictions on public smoking, while others are being asked to do the opposite.

The initiative movement was bad enough when special interest groups used it to encourage voters to believe they could get lower taxes and more services just by voting to make it so, encouraging a government-by-proposition lunacy that made it impossible for state governments to divide up their resources rationally. Lately, political parties have tried to insert hot-button social issues to lure their base to the polls. Thus the raft of anti-gay proposals that are a standard thrust of right-wing election strategists, with eight states asking voters to define marriage as strictly a heterosexual union. This year Democrats in six states have retaliated with proposals to increase the minimum wage.

The ballot questions getting the most national attention undoubtedly include the South Dakota proposal to overrule the Legislature's passage of a draconian ban on nearly all forms of abortion, and a Missouri constitutional amendment aimed at banning restrictions on stem cell research. As much as we approve the sentiments behind each one, we still can't help clinging to the idea that the best way to protect abortion rights or stem cell research is to elect sensible lawmakers and appoint judges who believe in the Constitution.

Scattershot initiative is no way to run a democracy; rebuke is no substitute for effective representation. In this crazy-quilt of vox pop, an initiative to make it easier to propose future ballot initiatives is reported to be in trouble with Colorado voters. This is small comfort for any voter imagining the ballot is about choosing responsive politicians more than panaceas.

Indian Taker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

The polls show that today Eliot Spitzer will realize his long ambition of becoming New York's next Governor, meaning that he will soon be able to fulfill his oft-spoken campaign promise "to end the pay-to-play culture in Albany." We can't wait to see how that one plays out, though we certainly hope Mr. Spitzer does better than he's done as a candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0091739

Last month in a debate in Buffalo, the nation's most famous Attorney General was asked his position on bringing out-of-state Indian tribes to New York to open casinos. Addressing his Republican opponent, John Faso, Mr. Spitzer remarked, "No, John, I don't believe out-of-state tribes should be here. And they won't be here under my administration."

After the debate, however, someone must have tapped Mr. Spitzer on the shoulder and reminded him that one of his biggest campaign donors is Richard Fields, a casino developer who represents a Wisconsin Indian tribe that claims ancestral roots in the state and is seeking approval to build a casino in New York's Catskills region.

And so a few days later, according to the Albany Times Union, "Darren Dopp, the AG's spokesman, said Spitzer isn't including the Stockbridge Munsee Band of Mohicans, the Oneida Tribe of Wisconsin or the Seneca-Cayuga Tribe of Oklahoma among the out-of-state tribes that won't be allowed to develop here." Which leaves us wondering who is included.

Companies operated by Mr. Fields have donated some $200,000 to the campaign of Mr. Spitzer, who also used the developer's Gulfstream jet (at a steep discount) to travel to fund-raisers until he was criticized for the practice. As Governor, Mr. Spitzer could play an important role in making Mr. Fields's clients very happy. So on to Albany, which isn't quaking in fear.

Wisconsin's Cheesy Reformers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Watching television this election cycle, you may have noticed that "campaign finance reform" hasn't made political ads any cleaner. You may also have surmised that money counts as much as ever; its sources and middlemen have merely been reshuffled. What "reform" has done, however, is make it easier for incumbents to keep power, and a case study is the Wisconsin Governor's race.

The challenger is GOP Congressman Mark Green, who has criticized Democratic incumbent Jim Doyle over his vetoes against tax relief, and has also kicked off a debate on education and tort reform. Or at least those were the issues until Mr. Doyle's allies used the campaign-finance laws to change the subject and create a phony scandal.

That story dates back to January 2005 when Mr. Green transferred some $1.3 million from his federal Congressional campaign account into his state campaign account. Legally this was no big deal since the Wisconsin Elections Board has allowed such transfers for some 30 years. Only a few years ago, the board unanimously agreed to such a transfer for then-Congressman Tom Barrett, a Democrat.

But the elections board has long been a political animal, and it lived up to that reputation by holding a meeting the day after Mr. Green's transfer. The Democratic majority adopted an "emergency" rule requiring that money spent in gubernatorial races be collected from political action committees registered in the state. In a stroke, this barred Mr. Green from using much of his money.

Viewing this as a naked political attack, the Republican state legislature jumped into the fray by suspending the rule. The elections board counter-attacked, saying the suspension didn't apply when the legislature was out the session. The majority in August ordered Mr. Green to divest himself of $468,000 worth of transferred funds. And it took this outrageous step over the advice of its own staff attorney.

It's now clear why. A few weeks after the August decision, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel uncovered emails that a paid Doyle lawyer, Michael Maistelman, sent to three Democratic members of the elections board. In one email, Mr. Maistelman informs the Democrats: "We need to accomplish the following . . ." and then lays out Mr. Doyle's preferred modes of punishment for Mr. Green.

He also explains to the commissioners: "Even if this ends up in Court it is a PR victory for us since it makes Green spend money and have to defend the use of his [federal] money." He assures them that "the Gov's Campaign and the Dem party will give you cover on this in the media."

They complied. Governor Doyle has since had a field day. His campaign assailed Mr. Green, accusing him of "breaking the law" and accepting "illegal contributions." It called on the Republican to return his "dirty money." And so it came to pass that the Governor was able to turn attention away from other, more substantive issues by using election-money laws to create an aura of corruption around his opponent. It of course helped that any GOP candidate must lug the ball and chain of the party's baggage in the earmarking and Abramoff scandals.

Even the exposure of the stage-managed emails haven't put things right. Many voters have tuned out what has become a complex story about impenetrable campaign-finance regulations. And because the elections board hasn't brought suit against Mr. Green, the Republican hasn't had a chance to clear himself in a court case he'd surely win, insofar as any "crime" here was wholly manufactured by this politicized board.

We wonder what Senator Russ Feingold thinks of all this. He's the Wisconsin native son who, along with Republican John McCain, famously spearheaded the federal campaign-finance legislation of 2002, promising healthier politics. It hasn't worked out that way.

DOJ_NMG_0091740

Instead, voters have been treated to the muzzling of political activists, the policing of the Internet by federal bureaucrats, partisan attempts to shut down opposition groups and spectacles like this in Wisconsin. This is reform?

Beyond Election Day (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

A couple of things have turned up that may help to clear your mind and revive your spirit after the nastiness of this political campaign:

Goodness knows, we need relief after the barrage of negative ads and insistent phone calls that candidates and political parties unleashed on us. I know that the political consultants are convinced that "going negative" is the only way to move the vote and win an election. But at some point you wish that the grown-ups in this country -- those who don't see elections as a profit-making business -- would remind these talented character assassins of the damage they are doing to the system of representative government that has served this nation so well.

Let me now climb down from my soapbox and tell you about a letter I recently received from former senator George McGovern, telling me that he is forming a bipartisan "Council of Elders," wise men and women who will occasionally consult informally with each other and be available, individually, to counsel people making public policy.

The 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, still writing and speaking at age 84, points out that America has never developed a habit or mechanism for keeping its most experienced figures engaged even in advisory roles. His council is an informal stab in that direction.

Among others, McGovern has enlisted such liberals as historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr.; former interior secretary Stewart Udall; journalists Lewis Lapham and Gloria Steinem; Carrie Lee Nelson, the outspoken and humorous widow of former senator Gaylord Nelson; and former senators Tom Eagleton and John Culver. Balancing them are several notable Republicans, including former Senate majority leader Howard Baker, former majority whip Alan Simpson and Rep. Henry Hyde.

The group is flexible in its approach and still very much expanding in membership, with McGovern serving as a contact point at McGoverncenter@dwu.edu .

McGovern's enterprise reminds me of something Lamar Alexander, soon to be Tennessee's senior senator, told me he had learned many years ago from his apprenticeship under Bryce Harlow, the powerful White House legislative and political adviser in the 1960s and '70s. Harlow taught Alexander and others that it is a wise policy to have at least one old geezer on the White House staff, someone not entirely dependent on the president for his power or position, someone who can speak with utter frankness without fear of the consequences.

That's excellent advice, and my one regret is that my old colleague Mary McGrory, who certainly would have qualified for McGovern's council of elders, did not live long enough to serve. But some of Mary's finest work is finally between hard covers in "The Best of Mary McGrory," published by Andrews McMeel and selected and edited, with great love, by Phil Gailey, a dear friend of Mary's from the old Washington Star who is now at the St. Petersburg Times.

In one column Gailey selected from The Post, where Mary moved after the demise of the Star, she wrote about the era that was then just beginning but is now nearing its end. "Those who yearn for healing and unity in Washington," she wrote, "had better look to the National Zoo. A pair of panda bears have arrived from China, and they'll bring people together because they provide amusement and delight, something that is not anticipated from a Cheney-Bush administration."

Earlier, writing about the funeral of Richard Nixon, she observed that "he was smart but got something big wrong: He thought politics was war and that everything is justified. And what we can learn from this week is how much Americans want to love their presidents -- and they will in life as well as in death, if they are given half a chance."

?

I mourn the death of a great reporter and a good friend and colleague, Helen Dewar, who gave Post readers definitive coverage of Virginia politics and the Senate over the past decades. She dominated those beats without ever raising her voice or flaunting her knowledge, and she managed to do everything -- including fight the breast cancer that killed her -- with immense dignity and good humor.

Mr. Bland Goes To Washington (NYT)

By Barry Schwartz

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Swarthmore, Pa.

ANOTHER national election season has come to an end — the sorriest, sleaziest, most disheartening and embarrassing in memory. The best one can hope for is a candidate who is a complete cipher. How has American electoral politics come to this?

DOJ_NMG_0091741

I think we can gain insight from a study published by the psychologist Eldar Shafir 13 years ago. Suppose you are confronted with the following problem:

You're serving as a juror in a custody case in which each parent is demanding sole custody of an only child. The facts of the case are complicated by ambiguous economic, social and emotional considerations, and you decide to base your decision entirely on the following few observations:

Parent A

· average income
· reasonable rapport with child
· relatively stable social life
· average working hours
· average health

Parent B

· above-average income
· close relationship with child
· extremely active social life
· lots of work-related travel
· minor health problems

To which parent would you award sole custody of the child?

Parent A is average in every way, without compelling positive or negative features. Parent B has a mix of strong positive (very close to the child) and strong negative (lots of travel) features. Asked to make this choice, the majority of respondents — 64 percent — choose Parent B.

What makes this study really interesting is what happens when another group of respondents is given the same character sketches, but asked a slightly different question: "To which parent would you deny custody of the child?" Here again, a majority, 55 percent, choose Parent B.

How can it be that a majority both accept and reject the same parent?

Professor Shafir's explanation is that when people are asked whom to accept, they look for positive features in the parents — reasons to accept one over the other — and Parent B has them. In contrast, when people are asked whom to reject, they look for negative features — and again, Parent B has them. No matter which question you ask, Parent B stands out.

What does this tell us about modern electoral politics? When you go into the voting booth, you're trying to decide whom to accept or whom to reject. Are you judging who the good candidate is or who the less bad candidate is?

The effort by each side to coat the opposition in slime has made many of us cynical, giving us the sense that our task is to reject the worst, not select the best. Nobody's any good, we think, but some are worse than others. Let's keep those candidates out of office. Our job becomes one of denying, not awarding, office.

What that means is that if you want to win an election, you need to find candidates like Parent A, who give us no reason to say no, rather than Parent B, who present a complex set of features, some attractive and some problematic.

If somehow the cynicism lifted, and we saw ourselves charged with the task of deciding who to say yes to, we'd have more candidates like Parent B. Just one negative feature would not be enough to disqualify someone, in our minds. There would be little to gain by capturing and broadcasting "macaca moments," or subtly invoking old Southern fears of black men cavorting with white women. Candidates would be able to take positions and speak their minds. This might lead to the arrival of candidates who actually have positions and minds. We might even be willing to risk generating a little enthusiasm at the prospect of being led by them.

But unless something is done to quell "gotcha" journalism and relentlessly negative campaigning — and as long as we continue to enter the voting booth looking for reasons to say no — the ciphers will be the winners.

Leaders Of Hamas And Fatah In Talks On Unity Government (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 6 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya failed Monday in their efforts to finalize a deal on a national unity government but planned to try again on Tuesday, aides said.

In another development, Israel began withdrawing tanks and other armored vehicles late Monday night from the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanun, Palestinian security officials said. The Israeli forces entered the town six days ago to halt Palestinian rocket fire and clashed daily with Palestinian militants.

It was not clear if all or just some of the Israeli forces were leaving, and the Israeli military did not immediately comment.

DOJ_NMG_0091742

Mr. Abbas, who leads the secular Fatah movement, and Mr. Haniya, who leads the militant Islamic faction Hamas, seemed close to an agreement on a new Palestinian government that would be made up of professionals and technocrats not directly linked to either faction. The new government would seek to end the Palestinians' international isolation and win a restoration of Western assistance cut after Hamas came to power in the spring.

"There are issues to be discussed tomorrow and maybe the day after," said Nabil Aburdeineh, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas, as the talks in Gaza City broke up Monday night. "We agreed on one thing: a national government of professionals will be coming."

Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya announced Sept. 11 that they had reached a tentative agreement for a unity government. But the negotiations quickly stalled with increased fighting between armed Hamas and Fatah groups, and the meeting on Monday between the leaders was their first in weeks.

Mr. Abbas, whose headquarters are in Ramallah, in the West Bank, travels only occasionally to Gaza, where most senior Hamas leaders are based. Mr. Abbas's decision to make the trip signaled that the negotiations had reached an advanced stage.

Mustafa Barghouti, a prominent legislator brokering the talks, said earlier on Monday that the sides had already reached an agreement in principle.

"Both parties have realized that no one party can lead the Palestinians, and there is a need for a coalition that will include everyone," he said.

Hamas and Fatah did not say what issues were still dividing them. However, Mr. Aburdeineh said they had not yet discussed who might serve in a new cabinet.

A Hamas-linked Web site said Hamas wanted Bassem Naeem, the current health minister, to be the new prime minister. Dr. Naeem is not a Hamas member but is considered to have close ties to the group. Fatah may be unwilling to accept him in the prime minister's role.

Even if the Palestinians succeed in establishing a new government, it is not clear whether its policies, as yet undefined, will meet benchmarks set by the United States and the European Union, which are calling for the recognition of Israel, a renunciation of violence and an acceptance of previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. Nor is it clear whether aid will be restored.

The Palestinian political negotiations will not change the status of Mr. Abbas, who was elected president in January 2005 and will retain his post. However, Mr. Haniya and his Hamas-dominated cabinet would be expected to step down.

Mr. Haniya, in remarks to his cabinet on Monday afternoon, suggested that the government was on its way out, without saying so explicitly. "Palestine is bigger than all of us," he said, [a news service] reported. "It is very easy for us to move to another position in the interests" of the Palestinian people, he said.

Under the proposal for the new government, Hamas and Fatah would each appoint several ministers to the cabinet, professionals and technocrats who could be aligned, but not directly affiliated, with any faction. Hamas would choose the prime minister, members of the group said. Smaller Palestinian parties would also be able to choose a number of ministers.

Mr. Haniya and his cabinet took power in March, two months after defeating Fatah in parliamentary elections. Fatah had dominated Palestinian politics for decades. However, the international isolation, the cutoff of money and internal Palestinian fighting have left Mr. Haniya and his cabinet unable to function as a government or pay the Palestinian Authority's 175,000 employees.

In northern Gaza, meanwhile, the Israeli forces and Palestinian militants battled for a sixth straight day before the Israelis began to leave Monday night. At least four Palestinians were killed by Israeli fire, Palestinian medical workers said.

One of those killed was a 15-year-old schoolboy, while several other youths were wounded in an Israeli airstrike as they headed to school, the medical workers said. The Israeli military said its target had been militants retrieving launchers used to fire rockets at Israel a day earlier.

Also, Mervet Masoud, an 18-year-old Palestinian woman, blew herself up near several soldiers, killing herself and slightly wounding one soldier, the military said. "My mother, be patient," Ms. Masoud, a student at the Islamic University in Gaza City, said in a video released by Islamic Jihad after her attack. "Consider me a martyr and, God willing, we will meet in paradise."

Ms. Masoud said she carried out the bombing as revenge for an attack on a Gaza beach in June that killed seven Palestinians, five of them from one family. The Israeli military has said that while it was firing in the area, it did not hit the family.

Israeli Forces Leave Gaza Town (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

Israeli forces pulled out of the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun before daybreak Tuesday, the military said, completing a weeklong sweep that killed more than 50 Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0091743

The military said the forces took up new positions inside the Gaza Strip but outside Beit Hanoun, in the northeast corner of the territory near the Israeli border. Residents reported troops and tanks withdrawing from the town overnight.

The pullout coincided with another failed effort by Palestinian leaders to forge a unity government that might lead to lifting of Western aid sanctions that have bankrupted the Palestinian Authority and caused widespread hardships.

Israeli leaders said the object of the raid was to reduce the frequency of Palestinian rocket fire at nearby Israeli towns and villages, but militants kept launching their homemade rockets throughout the operation.

The sweep came in from harsh international criticism because of the death toll and destruction. Israel said most of the dead were militants, but some were women and children. An Israeli soldier was also killed.

On Monday, the sixth day of the sweep, at least seven Palestinians were killed, including a female suicide bomber.

Iran Tries To Foster Trust Among Oil Firms Tehran May Adjust Rules To Lure Investors, But Industry Is Wary By SALLY JONES (WSJ)

By Sally Jones

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is backing changes to foreign energy contracts and retaining moderates in key roles in a bid to woo crucial foreign investors, senior industry and Iranian government officials say. But it remains to be seen whether the new Iranian leadership is ready to give foreign players the kind of stable and lucrative contracts they are seeking.

Iran has the world's third-largest proven oil reserves and second-largest natural-gas reserves. But the country's standoff with the U.S. and its allies over Iran's nuclear program and Mr. Ahmadinejad's anti-Western rhetoric have intensified nervousness among foreign firms about investing there.

Oil is the backbone of Iran's economy, but the country needs roughly $50 billion in foreign investment during the next decade to reach energy-production targets to avoid losing market share to other members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. Oil companies face a delicate balancing act: While they want to avoid U.S. ire, they are pressured by Iranian officials to attest to a friendly Iranian investment climate.

Overtures from Tehran come as oil companies say the new hard-line Iranian leadership has cast great uncertainty over their role in the nation's energy sector. An executive at one company involved in talks for three planned liquefied-natural-gas units -- part of the development of the South Pars gas field -- said discussions had slowed since most of the Iranian officials had been replaced.

Iran is OPEC's second-largest oil producer after Saudi Arabia, with output of about 3.9 million barrels a day. Crude-oil exports bring in 80% of the country's foreign exchange. They are projected to bring in $60 billion in revenue -- 60% of total government revenue -- for the fiscal year ending in March.

Oil majors feared being shut out of Iran's energy sector after last year's election of Mr. Ahmadinejad. In addition, talks have failed to resolve a dispute between Japanese and Iranian oil officials on the development of Iran's Azadegan oil field, estimated to contain 26 billion barrels of oil reserves.

Iranian foreign-ministry and oil officials say Mr. Ahmadinejad is backing changes to existing Iranian investment rules that foreign energy firms call inflexible.

The country's so-called buyback system -- unpopular with international oil companies that prefer production-sharing agreements -- skirts the constitutional ban on foreign firms taking equity stakes in energy projects by allowing companies to recoup their investment through Iran's oil-and-gas sales over a five- to seven-year period.

Iran plans to extend the time frame during which oil majors can participate in the development of an energy project to 15 years. Mr. Ahmadinejad supports the time extension, together with the idea of giving foreign companies the ability to be involved in direct financing for some projects, officials say, in what would be a crucial driver of foreign investment.

While officials gave no time frame for the changes, they say they want to move swiftly. Implementation of the changes would be "absolutely a positive move," said Valerie Marcel, principle researcher for energy at London think tank Chatham House. "Iranian officials are well aware of the companies' needs," but she said putting them in place is key.

The needed reforms are likely to find support from key oil-ministry officials. Many in the industry initially feared that Mr. Ahmadinejad's hard-line policies would spread to the oil ministry and that he would replace seasoned oil men with inexperienced allies. Yet, in a positive signal, key figures from the previous reformist regime retain a number of senior posts.

After four months of infighting over the high-level cabinet post, Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh was appointed Iran's oil minister in late 2005. Iranian oil-industry officials describe the soft-spoken engineer as an "independent-minded man" with "an excellent understanding of his country's oil business and the need to do business with the rest of the world." Mr. Vaziri has frequently said foreign firms are welcome and strongly supports the proposed investment revisions.

DOJ_NMG_0091744

After Mr. Vaziri's appointment, Mohammad-Reza Nematzadeh was appointed head of state-owned National Iranian Oil Products Refining & Distribution Co. To stave off a gasoline crisis in Iran, Mr. Nematzadeh is looking to raise $18 billion to revamp Iranian refineries during the next few years. In his previous job as deputy oil minister and director of National Iranian Petrochemical Industries Co., he was instrumental in attracting billions of dollars of foreign investment.

Hadi Nejad-Hosseinian, who is closely involved in major oil deals between Iran and foreign firms, was reappointed under Mr. Vaziri. But in a recent surprise move, Mr. Hosseinian, who is in his early 60s, retired.

Still, the positive noises from Iranian officials clash with the experience of some foreign companies.

Government negotiations with Inpex Corp., a unit of Inpex Holdings Inc., Japan's largest oil-and-gas-exploration company, on the development of Azadegan have been deadlocked in recent months, with Japan refusing to finalize the contract for the $2 billion project. Iran's oil minister recently said the Japanese firm would be granted only a nominal share in the project.

Iranian lawmakers have frequently criticized Japan's reluctance to finalize the deal and have said Iran could develop the project alone if necessary. Mr. Vaziri has said a consortium made up of domestic and international firms will be awarded the project.

Underscoring the tension, in January, Norway's Statoil ASA wrote off $335 million in investment in the huge South Pars gas field after three years of delayed production and difficulty with Iranian contractors. The field is estimated to hold more than 280 trillion cubic feet of gas, enough to supply current U.S. gas needs for more than 12 years.

A number of other projects are also under threat, amounting to billions of investment dollars. Iran and China signed a memorandum of understanding in 2004 in which Iran would allow state-controlled China Petroleum & Chemical Corp., or Sinopec, to develop its Yadavaran oil field in southwest Iran. Iran is also pressing ahead with plans to deliver natural gas via a $6 billion pipeline to Pakistan and India.

Foreign investors are also fearful of the remaining conflict within the Iranian regime between reformists who favor foreign investment and conservative hard-liners. Mr. Ahmadinejad caused some alarm in July when he awarded a $2.3 billion contract to the engineering arm of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, Khatam-al-Anbiya Construction Headquarters, or Ghorb, to develop two future phases of South Pars.

The Revolutionary Guard played a crucial role in the nation's Islamic revolution and holds sway over a range of enterprises, particularly those involving exports and imports. Mr. Ahmadinejad served with the guard in the Iran-Iraq War.

A Shift In The Debate On International Court (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

When then-Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton nullified the U.S. signature on the International Criminal Court treaty one month into President Bush's first term, he declared it the happiest moment in his years of service. Bolton referred to the court as a "product of fuzzy-minded romanticism . . . not just naive, but dangerous."

The bipartisan concern then was that American service members deployed overseas risked exposure to a foreign tribunal. President Bill Clinton signed the Rome Treaty on his last day in office in 2000, while registering strong reservations.

Now, as the court prepares to begin public hearings on its first case, the debate among senior U.S. military officials seems to be shifting away from staunch opposition, and a fresh assessment of the court seems to be underway.

The new attitude has been prompted in part by the court's record since it began operations three years ago; Chief Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo, an Argentine, has dismissed hundreds of petitions for cases against the United States. The cases were turned down for lack of evidence, lack of jurisdiction, or because of the United States' ability to conduct its own investigations and trials. Out of some 1,500 petitions to the chief prosecutor, almost half accused the United States of war crimes.

In a letter made public last year, Moreno-Ocampo's office said it was throwing out 240 such cases concerning the war in Iraq. Reviews of each claim determined that none fell within the court's jurisdiction, his letter said, because the United States is not a signatory.

A congressional study released in August said the ICC's chief prosecutor demonstrated "a reluctance to launch an investigation against the United States" based on allegations regarding its conduct in Iraq.

To Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), ranking member of the Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee, the verdict is already in. "The ICC has refuted its critics, who confidently and wrongly predicted that it would be politicized and manipulated by our enemies to prosecute U.S. soldiers," he said recently.

DOJ_NMG_0091745

Officially, the United States does not support the court and has no communication with it. "U.S. policy towards the International Criminal Court has not changed," a Defense Department spokesman, who asked not to be identified by name under rules set by the department, said Monday. "While we respect the right of other governments to join and support the ICC, we ask that governments respect the right of the United States not to join the ICC."

But court backers have noted what they consider quiet support for what the court is doing, particularly in the Darfur region of Sudan, in northern Uganda and in Congo.

For example, court advocates considered it a victory that the Bush administration abstained, instead of using its veto, when the U.N. Security Council voted to refer Sudan to the court over alleged atrocities being committed by Khartoum-backed militias in the Darfur region.

Victoria K. Holt, a senior associate at the Henry L. Stimson Center, a research organization devoted to security issues, co-authored a study based on interviews with senior U.S. military officials, policymakers and politicians who attended a January workshop on the court. Holt and others said they were struck by the pragmatism of both active and retired American military officials, and by an evolving attitude toward the court -- a departure from the administration's stated opposition.

David Scheffer, ambassador at large for war crimes issues during the Clinton administration and a participant in the workshop, said most officers did not fear that the court would be used as a "battering ram against the United States." Rather, he said, many were concerned that by not actively supporting the court, the United States might create the impression that it does not follow internationally accepted rules of war.

"It conveys the image that we are simply intimidated by the prospect of international justice and that we have to browbeat other countries to minimize the risk we may have before the court," Scheffer said by telephone from Chicago. Scheffer is now professor of law and director of the Center for International Human Rights at Northwestern University School of Law.

Some court advocates are pushing for more concrete shows of U.S. support. Africa specialist and International Crisis Group senior adviser John Prendergast and activist actor Don Cheadle have been lobbying senators to prod the administration to share satellite images and intelligence with the court as it investigates war crimes in Darfur.

Moreover, in what seemed like an acknowledgment of the court's legitimacy from two longtime Republican critics, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former Kansas senator and onetime presidential hopeful Bob Dole penned an opinion piece published in The Washington Post on Sept. 10 reminding "Khartoum that the International Criminal Court has jurisdiction to prosecute war crimes in Darfur and that Sudanese leaders will be held personally accountable for attacks against civilians."

McCain and Dole wrote that "U.S. and allied intelligence assets, including satellite technology, should be dedicated to record any atrocities that occur in Darfur so that future prosecutions can take place."

One month after the ICC was formally established four years ago, Bush signed the American Servicemembers' Protection Act, which limits U.S. aid and curtails military training to countries that have ratified the Rome treaty that created the court. The administration negotiated "non-surrender agreements" with 100 countries to ensure that American soldiers are not handed to the ICC, under penalty of losing access to military training. Half of the countries in Latin America are affected by the agreements, although many have received waivers allowing aid to continue.

Many court supporters are arguing that now is the time for the administration to engage with the court, instead of being concerned about potential prosecutions of Americans.

U.S. absence from the court "undermines our argument to the world that we are holding up the standards we preach, and that we are accountable," said Holt, of the Stimson Center. "At a time the United States is being challenged internationally, support of the court may enhance our standing so it can work more effectively."

Panel Calls For U.N. To Be Streamlined (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 7, 2006

A high-level panel called for streamlining U.N. programs to fight poverty, provide humanitarian aid and protect the environment, saying competition among agencies often duplicates efforts and fails to deliver results, a final draft of its report says.

The draft, obtained Monday by The Associated Press, said that while the U.N. "is an indispensable force," it has outgrown its post-World War II structure and "is not as effective as it could be."

"Too often, authority and management responsibility is dispersed among individuals and across organizations, thus limiting accountability for performance and results," it said. "Better cooperation between organizations has been hindered by competition for funding, by mission creep and by outdated business practices."

DOJ_NMG_0091746

Secretary-General Kofi Annan established the 13-member panel in response to a call by world leaders at their September 2005 summit for coordinated U.N. operations to meet development goals, including cutting extreme poverty by half and ensuring universal primary education by 2015.

It will be up to Annan's successor, Ban Ki-Moon, who takes over as secretary-general on Jan. 1, to decide whether to implement the panel's recommendations. The panel's co-chairs, Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and Mozambique's Prime Minister Luisa Dias Diogo, are expected to present the report Thursday.

"The essence of our vision is for the U.N. to deliver as one in the areas of development, humanitarian assistance and the environment," the panel said.

"The U.N. system now encompasses 16 specialized agencies, 14 funds and programs, 17 departments and offices of the U.N. Secretariat, five regional commissions, five research and training institutes and a plethora of regional and country level structures," the draft said.

Weak and disjointed U.N. operations coupled with "inadequate and unpredictable funding have contributed to policy incoherence, duplicating functions and operational ineffectiveness," it said.

A survey by the panel found, for example, that more than one-third of U.N. country teams include 10 or more U.N. agencies carrying out separate operations, and "several teams include 20 or more."

At the global level, the draft said, more than 20 U.N. agencies are active and competing for limited resources in some areas, such as water and energy, and more than 30 U.N. agencies and programs have a stake in environmental management.

A survey by the panel found that the three agreements reached at the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro — on biodiversity, climate and desertification — have up to 230 meeting days every year. "Add the figures for seven other major global environmental agreements ... and that number rises to almost 400 days," the draft said.

Developing countries "are unable to cope with the extensive reporting and participation requirements" of global environmental treaties, which take time, money and expertise away from actually implementing the agreements, the draft said.

The panel said its recommendations can "potentially radically change the way the U.N. operates at headquarters, in each region and in each country."

The panel called for one U.N. program in every country, "not 10 or 20 fragmented and uncoordinated programs delivered by different arms of the U.N." That program would respond to the country's need, the community's views and be approved by the government, it said.

A new U.N. oversight body reporting to the U.N. Economic and Social Council would be responsible for the performance of the single U.N. country program, the draft said.

It called for a new partnership for humanitarian assistance, including the U.N., governments, the International Red Cross and non-governmental organizations led by the U.N. emergency relief coordinator.

The draft also recommended the Nairobi-based U.N. Environment Program be the center of a strong system for environmental protection.

It called for "one strong voice on women's issues in the U.N. system to ensure that the pursuit of gender equality and women's empowerment are taken seriously."

It also called for "one clear framework" to reinvigorate the promotion and protection of human rights, with the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights at the center.

Top Job For US Official Raises UN Reform Fear (FT)

By Mark Turner At The United Nations

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

Josette Sheeran, a US undersecretary of state, appears almost certain to be named as head of the UN World Food Programme on Tuesday, in a decision diplomats fear marks an early blow to reform promises by Ban Ki-moon, the incoming secretary-general.

A UN official said that James Morris, the current head of the WFP, told senior staff at the weekend of the decision to appoint the US official candidate to a post traditionally viewed as a US fiefdom. The announcement, some diplomats believe, would be an indication that fledgling efforts to make appointments on technical merit have foundered.

The decision was officially taken by Kofi Annan, the current UN secretary-general, in partnership with Jacques Diouf, head of the Food and Agriculture Organisation. But the outcome would be viewed as a clue to the operating style of Mr Ban, with whom Mr Annan consulted.

According to a number of diplomats and officials, there had been early indications that another candidate – Tony Banbury, WFP's regional director for Asia and a former White House employee – had led on merit. While an American, he was not Washington's choice.

DOJ_NMG_0091747

But late last week it emerged that, following high-level US lobbying and consultations between Mr Annan and Mr Ban, the decision was made to go with the US government's official nominee.

Ms Sheeran serves as undersecretary of state for economic, business and agricultural affairs, but commentators have noted her history as managing editor of the Washington Times and her association with Rev Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church, which part-owns the newspaper.

According to South Korean officials and one senior UN adviser, Mr Ban did not alter Mr Annan's decision. Seoul's deputy UN ambassador, Oh Joon, insisted on Friday that Mr Ban only came to know about the WFP process last week and that in a telephone call he told Mr Annan he respected the process and decision he had already made.

But several diplomats believe Mr Ban helped sway the process, raising questions about his willingness to assert the UN's independence when put under pressure by powerful governments.

Mr Oh said Mr Ban's first priority, when he arrives in New York in the next few weeks, will be to staff his private cabinet. But there is also mounting speculation as to how he will share out powerful jobs such as political affairs and peacekeeping.

Mr Ban campaigned on a platform of UN reform, but it is unclear whether he will go down the traditional route of sharing out top jobs between the strongest countries or will assert his independence and appoint a professional cadre of technocrats.

Sheeran Will Lead U.N. Food Program (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan today will nominate Josette Sheeran, a senior State Department official and former managing editor of The Washington Times, to be executive director of the World Food Program, U.N. officials said.

The five-year appointment remains subject to approval later today by the WFP executive board, which is considered a formality. Miss Sheeran is expected to take up her duties as head of the Rome-based agency, which administers nearly $3 billion in annual food aid, early next year.

At the State Department, where she has served since August 2005 as undersecretary of state for business, economic and agricultural affairs, Miss Sheeran is charged with promoting the interests of U.S. farmers and business owners in global policy discussions, according to her official biography.

Before that, she served as deputy in the office of U.S. Trade Representative Robert B. Zoellick, where she negotiated agreements with African, Asian and Latin American countries.

From 1997 to 2000, Miss Sheeran was president and chief executive officer of Empower America, where she was a high-profile presence on the media, academic and fundraising circuits. She was an editor of The Washington Times from its founding in 1982 until she left as managing editor of The Times in 1997 to join Empower America.

Miss Sheeran, 52, was selected by Mr. Annan last year to sit on a panel advising the United Nations on how to more effectively deliver humanitarian relief and development assistance.

The report of the High-Level Panel on System-wide Coherence, a group that includes leaders of Pakistan, Mozambique, Norway and senior ministers of several other countries, is to be released Thursday.

Miss Sheeran was chosen for the WFP post from a short list, which was never formally announced but was said by Secretariat officials to have included WFP Asia director Tony Banbury, an American with ties to the Clinton White House; Swiss development minister Walter Fust; and Robert Fowler, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations.

But the appointment of Miss Sheeran, the Bush administration's nominee, had been expected: Washington contributes about one-third of the WFP's $2.9 billion budget and often applies pressure to ensure its nominees are successful. An American has managed the WFP for about the past 15 years.

The WFP is one of the United Nations' most prominent agencies, with primary responsibility for feeding the victims of conflicts, natural disasters and long-building famines. Last year, the agency fed nearly 100 million people in 82 countries.

Miss Sheeran will oversee a staff of 10,500 across the world, who deliver 4.2 million tons of high-energy biscuits, enriched milk and flour, and other food staples to people in need.

The United States contributes about $1 billion a year to the WFP, in cash as well as food staples and logistical support. The European Commission is generally the second largest donor, with $200 million, and Japan is third, with about $136 million in voluntary contributions.

This is likely to be the last appointment by Mr. Annan, who leaves office on Dec. 31. The United States has called on him repeatedly not to make any long-term appointments that will bind his successor, Ban Ki-moon of South Korea.

However, the administration lobbied hard for Miss Sheeran's appointment, according to U.N. sources, who said Washington wants to keep an eye on an agency whose work is largely U.S.-funded.

DOJ_NMG_0091748

Sources in Washington, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the administration initially had planned to nominate Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, who is not seeking re-election today. Instead, Mr. Kolbe was nominated to head the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. The fund's board met last week but was unable to agree on a new executive director.

Ortega Set To Reclaim Nicaraguan Presidency (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 6 -- Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist president and nemesis of President Ronald Reagan, appears to have won back Nicaragua's top job.

With 62 percent of precincts reporting, Ortega was comfortably leading the field of five presidential contenders with 39 percent of the vote, virtually ensuring him a first-round win under Nicaragua's electoral rules.

In a public appearance Monday night, Ortega, 60, declined to declare victory until the full count was in. "We are ready to work together [with the other candidates] to eradicate the poverty of Nicaragua, to provide security to the private sector, to provide security to the diverse foreigners in our country . . . and to develop relations with the entire international community," Ortega said, as his wife and campaign manager, Rosario Murillo, stood grinning by his side.

If the results from Sunday's vote hold, they will mark a stunning comeback for the Cold War icon, who has failed twice to regain power since 1990, when voters disillusioned by a decade-long war with U.S.-backed insurgents and government abuses cast his Sandinista National Liberation Front from office.

Ortega's return to Nicaragua's presidency would also constitute an embarrassing setback for the Bush administration. American officials have recently made thinly veiled threats that the United States would impose economic sanctions and other punitive measures if Ortega was reelected, arguing that Ortega has not changed despite his embrace of Catholicism, pronouncements in favor of a market economy and efforts to cast himself as the candidate of "reconciliation."

U.S. officials appeared motivated in part by concerns that Ortega would be an eager partner in pushing an anti-American alliance with Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez. Ortega's return is particularly galling to many in the Bush administration who devoted their careers to getting rid of him in the 1980s.

Longtime political analysts in Managua said that Ortega was too pragmatic to attempt to resurrect controversial policies implemented during his 1979-90 government that drew international condemnation -- such as military conscription, confiscation of some private property and press censorship.

"Ortega is not going to be stupid and commit the mistakes of the past," said Emilio ?lvarez, an analyst and critic of the Sandinistas. "He knows that the Soviet parachute is gone and that he is totally dependent on the assistance of the United States, the International Monetary Fund and foreign investment."

Instead, ?lvarez predicted that Ortega would try to reach out to Nicaragua's impoverished populace with more modest measures, such as raising taxes to pay for salary increases for low-level government workers and for increased spending on education.

Still ?lvarez worried that Ortega "is erratic. He has these messianic dreams of being the savior of the people that make him vulnerable to unworkable economic schemes."

During the campaign, Ortega caused alarm in the business community by suggesting that he wanted to compel banks to lower the fees they charge Nicaraguans living overseas to wire money to relatives back home.

Carlos Chamorro, editor of the respected weekly newsmagazine Confidencial who broke with the Sandinistas a decade ago, agreed. "Nobody thinks the country is going to go belly up with Ortega," said Chamorro, whose mother, Violeta Chamorro, defeated Ortega in the 1990 elections. "But he represents a step backwards because he could bring economic uncertainty and slow the process of investment and job creation."

Ortega's supporters, including many underemployed youths too young to remember the years of Sandinista rule, are convinced that he is the only candidate who empathizes with their plight. As word of his early lead filtered out, they poured into Managua's streets, setting off firecrackers and cheering ecstatically.

Ortega's closest rivals, meanwhile, held news conferences Monday to announce that they were not yet ready to accept defeat.

"This is not over until the last vote is counted," said Eduardo Montealegre of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance, who trailed Ortega by 8 points in the preliminary count.

Jos? Rizo, of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party, said the preliminary results were misleading because they did not include many polling stations in Nicaragua's remote rural areas, where his support is strongest. He said a count by his campaign workers put him close enough behind Ortega to force a runoff election.

DOJ_NMG_0091749

However, the results released by the electoral commission were bolstered by similar findings from a "quick count" of a representative sample of ballots released Monday by Ethics and Transparency, a widely respected Nicaraguan civic group that fielded 11,050 observers to every polling and counting center in the nation to carry out their own tally alongside the official one.

At a news conference in Managua on Monday, Pablo Ay?n, president of Ethics and Transparency, said their count, giving Ortega 38 percent of the vote, had a margin of error of 1.7 percent.

Although there were complaints of irregularities at some polling stations, international observer teams declared that the election was orderly and lawful.

Leftist Headed Toward Victory In Nicaragua (NYT)

By James C. McKkinley Jr. And Jill Replogle

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 6 — Sixteen years after he left power, Daniel Ortega, a former Marxist president and the Sandinista leader who is still regarded as a sworn foe by many in Washington, appeared headed to a victory on Monday in the Nicaraguan presidential election.

Though electoral officials had yet to release final tallies from Sunday's vote, preliminary results and the country's electoral watchdog groups all indicated that Mr. Ortega, who had failed three times before to gain the presidency in elections, would win a clear victory.

An Ortega win in a five-way race would be a defeat for the Bush administration, which strongly opposed his election and worked hard to unite a fractious opposition against him with little success. The White House has said it would withdraw aid from an Ortega government.

With about 61 percent of the vote counted, Mr. Ortega had 38.6 percent of the ballots, about 8 points ahead of the second-place candidate, Eduardo Montealegre, a Harvard-educated financier and conservative Washington has openly supported. Final results were not expected until Tuesday, an election official said.

Now 60 years old and balding, Mr. Ortega has maintained he is no longer a Marxist, but more of a pragmatist. He has promised to keep good relations with the United States and chose a former political opponent as his running mate. He has also vowed to help the poor and run a positive campaign around the themes of "peace, love and unity."

But he maintains close ties to Cuba and to Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, the leftist president who has become a thorn in the side of the United States. Mr. Chávez gave the Ortega campaign significant support by sending subsidized oil to Nicaragua and distributing it through Sandinista politicians.

Mr. Ortega's expected victory appeared to be another gain for leftists in Latin America, who, despite recent setbacks in Peru and Mexico, have also persuaded voters to abandon conservative governments in Brazil, Argentina, Chile and Bolivia.

Although the results were preliminary, supporters of the Sandinista National Liberation Front party of Mr. Ortega set off fireworks around the city on Monday, and drove around honking horns, shouting victory slogans and waving red and black Sandinista flags. Mr. Ortega had yet to make a statement.

Cuba immediately congratulated Mr. Ortega. "This is good for the people of Nicaragua and for the integration of Latin America," Foreign Minister Felipe Pérez Roque told The Associated Press on Monday.

Mr. Ortega's opponents refused to recognize his expected victory until all the votes were counted. The United States took a similar stance. The State Department's deputy spokesman, Tom Casey, said Monday that the administration would wait to comment until the Nicaraguan electoral council announced who won. He also said it was too early to comment on procedural problems during the voting, noting that several groups of observers planned to file reports.

Mr. Casey said the United States delegation in Nicaragua had remarked on "high turnout and given praise to the Nicaraguan people for their patience and their willingness to show support for this democratic process."

Mr. Ortega was one of the leaders of the Sandinista rebels that swept to power in 1979, toppling the Somoza dynasty of right-wing dictators friendly to the United States and setting up an authoritarian left-wing government.

With the cold war still driving United States policy, President Reagan imposed sanctions on the country and financed anti-Sandinista guerrillas, known as contras, in part by secretly selling arms to the revolutionary Islamic government in Iran. It was Mr. Ortega who led his Soviet-backed army in a bloody decade-long civil war.

The last time Mr. Ortega ran Nicaragua, he seized private assets and redistributed land to peasants. Capital fled the country, along with many of its business leaders. He vows a different approach this time.

The advertising campaign against the former rebel leader was vicious, showing images from the civil war, women weeping, guns blaring. His opponents lost no chance to remind people of the economic collapse that followed the fighting and the United States embargo.

DOJ_NMG_0091750

Mr. Ortega was elected president in 1984 and served from 1985 to 1990, before losing to Violeta Chamorro. He struggled to regain power through the ballot box, but without success, in 1996 and 2001.

This time, however, a change in the election law and a strong throw-the-bums-out sentiment in the country after campaign financing scandals involving former President Enrique Bolaños helped carry him to what appears to be a victory.

He was also aided significantly by a change in election rules that allows a candidate to win in the first round with only 35 percent of the vote, so long as he is 5 points above his closest opponent. If Mr. Ortega had not won on the first round, most political strategists predicted he would not have survived a second round, as the splintered anti-Sandinista vote would have united.

As it was, the anti-Sandinista vote seemed split mostly between Mr. Montealegre, with 30.9 percent, and José Rizo, the candidate of the conservative ruling party, who had 22.9 percent, according to the Supreme Electoral Council, the Nicaraguan election authority. Two other candidates, Edmundo Jarquín, a dissident former Sandinista, and Edén Pastora, a former Sandinista who later became a contra rebel, trailed behind.

Results of a quick count carried out by a local monitoring group, Ethics and Transparency, tracked with the official results.

"It's been a pretty exact count, we can say that Ortega's triumph is almost sure," said Carlos Tunnerman, a political analyst and former Nicaraguan ambassador to Washington from 1984 to 1988.

Former President Jimmy Carter, who was in Nicaragua to monitor the election, said the quick count was "among the most definitive I have ever seen." The count is based on a large, and strategically varied, sample of votes from urban and rural areas and different social strata, explained Mr. Carter and local analysts.

On Sunday night, following the first presentation of results by the election authorities, Mr. Montealegre denounced the early closing of some polling places and problems with the delivery of voter identification cards. He said he would not concede defeat until all votes were counted.

Mr. Carter agreed that there were minor problems with the voting process, but said he did not think they were significant enough to affect the results.

"The likelihood is that those few anomalies, which exist in every election in the world, will not be substantive enough collectively to change the apparent results of this election," Mr. Carter said.

Electoral observers have said the vote was mostly peaceful and orderly, despite long lines and some angry confrontations among voters who claimed polling stations closed before they could vote.

Observers from the Organization of American States said 2 percent of potential voters were not able to cast ballots, and they estimated turnout around 70 percent, The A.P. reported.

Because the front-runner was a cold-war icon for the left, the race generated interest in the United States. Even Oliver North, a former White House aide to President Reagan, visited to speak against Mr. Ortega. Mr. North was at the heart of what became known as the Iran-contra affair.

But in recent years, American money has flowed into Nicaragua in the form of investments. The country has cheap labor and low crime rates, and recently joined the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

During his campaign, Mr. Ortega emphasized his goal of peace and reconciliation, choosing bright pink as the color for his campaign and adopting the rhythm of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" for his jingle.

For some, Mr. Ortega and the Sandinistas still conjure up memories of the war and tough economic times. Marlon José Sánchez Padilla, 36, who sold oranges on Sunday outside of a polling station in the town of Nindirí, bitterly recalled his two years of military service in the 1980s. "Many people were mutilated," he said. "Now he promises the sky, earth and highways, but we don't believe him anymore."

Others at the polls on Sunday said it was time to give Mr. Ortega another chance. "It seems that Daniel Ortega has asked for pardon," said Ninosca Leets, 46, a housewife who said she fled to the United States during the former Sandinista government. "He's asked for reconciliation. He's asked for a change, and I think he should be given the opportunity."

Ortega Nears Victory In Nicaragua Election (WSJ)

By Jose de Cordoba

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Sandinista Party leader Daniel Ortega appeared headed toward a first-round victory in Nicaragua's presidential election, handing the U.S. a diplomatic defeat and bolstering populist forces in Latin America led by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

With returns in from about 61% of polling stations in Sunday's election, the 60-year-old Mr. Ortega, a former guerrilla leader and president, had an eight-percentage-point lead over conservative rival Eduardo Montealegre. Yesterday, an analysis of the vote by a respected civic organization, the Nicaraguan Civic Group for Ethics and Transparency, said Mr. Ortega would win about 38% of ballots cast. He needed at least 35% to avoid a runoff.

DOJ_NMG_0091751

While Mr. Ortega campaigned as the candidate of reconciliation and has refrained from criticizing the U.S., his victory will no doubt be seen as a triumph for Mr. Chávez, whose influence had been waning lately owing to a number of setbacks. He had failed in his attempt to win a seat on the United Nation's Security Council and his political allies in Peru and Ecuador lost, in part, because they were identified with Mr. Chávez and his rhetoric.

In Nicaragua, Mr. Chávez may have won some votes for Mr. Ortega by supplying Sandinista allies with cut-rate diesel fuel and fertilizer. Mr. Chávez also has promised to set up an arm of Venezuela's development bank in Nicaragua to fund local projects.

Washington, on the other hand, actively campaigned against Mr. Ortega, in a kind of echo of the battles of the 1980s, when a U.S.-backed rebel force known as the Contras battled Mr. Ortega's Sandinista government. The U.S. ambassador staged a public campaign against Mr. Ortega and senior U.S. officials said aid and investment could be sharply cut and the country would come to ruin if Mr. Ortega triumphed. Political analysts are sure to debate whether the U.S. campaign backfired.

Mr. Ortega is a hard-knuckle political boss with a devoted, though minority, following, according to most polls. He had lost three previous attempts at the presidency because many Nicaraguans identified him with the hyperinflation, scarcity and the 30,000 dead left by the country's decadelong civil war against Contra forces. He succeeded this time because his opposition was fractured and he had cut a political deal that reduced the percentage of the vote needed to win in the first round to 35% from 45%.

In deeply religious Nicaragua, Mr. Ortega received a politically beneficial blessing from his old foe, Managua's retired but powerful Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo. The cardinal married Mr. Ortega and Rosario Murillo, his longtime companion and closest political adviser. Perhaps not coincidentally, the Sandinistas reversed course and helped to overturn a 100-year-old law that permitted abortion in case of danger to the mother's life; the practice is completely outlawed.

Mr. Ortega and the Sandinistas came to power in Nicaragua in 1979 when they toppled the U.S.-backed dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza. He left power after being defeated in elections in 1990, though the Sandinista leadership allegedly stole hundreds of millions of dollars in state lands and assets.

One of the poorest countries in the Americas, Nicaragua has been experiencing an economic upturn thanks in part to a free-trade agreement with the U.S. that has spurred investment and to a modest tourism boom. To keep the country on track, Mr. Ortega will have to convince the U.S., as well as his countrymen, that he has changed from his days as a doctrinaire Communist.

"Nicaragua is like a plane that is taking off. If the pilot makes a bad move, the plane will crash," says Antonio Lacayo, a prominent businessman here. "Ortega must convince everyone that he will keep Nicaragua within the system of free enterprise and civil liberties and democracy."

Mr. Ortega says his days as a Marxist revolutionary are behind him and that he would like to have friendly relations with the U.S. Many fear his authoritarian tendencies could be given free rein if he gets generous financing and strategic support from Mr. Chávez.

Mr. Ortega's supporters rejoiced. "It's going to be different this time," said Pedro Joaquin Romero, a former Sandinista lieutenant, who has been confined to a wheelchair since a 1986 ambush by Contras. "I think he can get the country moving forward."

Ortega's Likely Return Seen As A Blow To US Policy (FT)

By Adam Thomson In Managua

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista guerrilla leader and leftwing president, on Monday appeared on course to return to power in Nicaragua after an absence of 16 years, according to an incomplete count by electoral authorities.

With about 40 per cent of votes counted by Monday evening, the 60-year-old Mr Ortega was in the lead with 40.1 per cent. Eduardo Montealegre, a former banker and the centre-right candidate for the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance (ALN), was trailing by about seven percentage points.

An Ortega victory would be a blow for US foreign policy in central America. The leader of the National Liberation Sandinista Front (FSLN) needs 40 per cent of the vote or at least 35 per cent with a minimum margin of 5 per cent over the second-placed candidate to avoid a run-off.

Ever since Mr Ortega lost power to the centre-right Violeta de Chamorro in 1990, Washington has manoeuvred to avoid his re-election. During this year's election campaign, Paul Trivelli, the US ambassador in Managua, has spoken out frequently to warn Nicaraguans of the perceived dangers of a Sandinista government.

DOJ_NMG_0091752

Recently Mr Trivelli also warned of Mr Ortega's growing friendship with Hugo Chávez, the oil-rich and anti-US Venezuelan president.

In a recent interview with the Financial Times, Mr Trivelli even warned that an Ortega-led government would provoke significant changes to the currently healthy bilateral relationship.

"The whole gamut of the relationship that I talked about between the US and Nicaragua would definitely be re-examined – and not only by the executive or the State Department or the White House but by the US Congress," he said.

On Sunday, however, the US government's fears appeared to find little echo among voters. Thousands of electoral observers, including many sent by the European Union and the Organisation of American States, reported trouble-free voting.

In the afternoon, citizens lined up peacefully at a polling station in Granada, Nicaragua's oldest city, while polling officials stained the right thumbs of those who had already voted.

Even so, a statement issued on Sunday by the US presidential delegation said that it had received reports of anomalies such as the premature closing of voting stations as well as slow counting. It concluded: "We are therefore not in a position at this time to make an overall judgment on the fairness and transparency of the process."

On the campaign trail, Mr Ortega, who still wears his trademark moustache but has swapped his military fatigues for casual civilian clothes, has done his best to reassure Nicaraguans that his government would be different to the one he headed in the 1980s.

As part of his message of peace and national unity, Mr Ortega has ruled out the possibility of bringing back compulsory military service.

While his speeches have contained anti-US rhetoric – he has mentioned his desire to modify the Cafta trade pact – he has also defended private business and has ruled out a return to property confiscations.

Ortega Seen Winning Nicaragua Election (AP)

By Traci Carl

AP, November 7, 2006

Daniel Ortega, the revolutionary Marxist who battled a U.S.-backed Contra insurgency in the 1980s, was closing in on Nicaragua's presidency, appearing Monday to have defeated four opponents with promises that he was a changed man.

Electoral officials had yet to release final results from Sunday's vote, but preliminary results and two of the country's top electoral watchdog groups all gave Ortega about 40 percent of the vote. That was more than enough to avoid a runoff against Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre, who trailed by at least seven percentage points.

Ortega's rivals refused to recognize his victory, saying they would wait until all the votes had been counted. The United States, which has threatened to pull aid from an Ortega government, also said it was too soon to declare the Sandinista leader a winner.

"This isn't over until the last vote has been counted," Montealegre said.

If his victory is confirmed, the Cold War icon would join a growing number of leftist Latin American rulers, led by Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, who has tried to help his Nicaraguan ally by shipping cheap oil to the poor, energy-starved nation.

"This is good for the people of Nicaragua and for the integration of Latin America," Cuban Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque told The Associated Press Monday.

Ortega's supporters celebrated in the streets late Sunday, swaying to his campaign song set to the tune of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance."

Herberto Jose Lopez, who earns about $235 a month selling CDs from a kiosk, said Monday he voted for Ortega in hopes that he would help Nicaragua's poor.

"I've got a wife and kid and I'm lucky because I have a job, but most people will tell you the same thing: The current administration just governs for the guys in ties," said the 32-year-old Lopez.

Some Nicaraguans worried that an Ortega win would drive away the country's business leaders and elite, as they did the first time he came to power.

"We're just trying to figure out which country to go to," said 27-year-old Karen Sandoval, a Coca-Cola marketer shopping with a friend at an upscale Managua mall. "This sets the country back 20 years."

Ortega, who served as president from 1985-90, toned down his once fiery rhetoric during the campaign, promising to support the Central American Free Trade Agreement and even maintain good relations with Washington.

The balding, 60-year-old leftist often appears more preacher than revolutionary, calling for peace and reconciliation and urging his supporters to pray.

He says he has changed profoundly since he befriended Soviet leaders, expropriated land and fought Contra rebels in a war that left 30,000 dead and the economy in shambles.

DOJ_NMG_0091753

An Ortega victory would cap a 16-year quest to return to his old job. Ortega lost the presidency in 1990, ending Sandinista rule and the Contra war. He has run for president in every election since.

Ortega's vote percentage was similar to what he received in his last two failed presidential bids, but the right was divided this time between Montealegre and ruling party candidate Jose Rizo. The constitution allowed him to win on the first round with only 35 percent of the vote and a lead of five percentage points over his closest rival.

With 40 percent of the vote counted, Ortega had 40 percent to Montealegre's 33 percent. Three other candidates trailed: Rizo, Sandinista dissident Edmundo Jarquin and former Contra rebel Eden Pastora. Statistical surveys of votes conducted by two respected Nicaraguan electoral watchdog groups also both gave Ortega a similar margin.

Electoral observers have said the vote was mostly peaceful and orderly, despite long lines and angry confrontations by people who said polling stations closed before they could vote. Observers from the Organization of American States said 2 percent of potential voters weren't able to cast a ballot, and they estimated turnout around 70 percent.

The race generated intense international interest, including a visit by Oliver North, the former White House aide at the heart of the Iran-Contra controversy, which created a huge scandal when it emerged that Washington secretly sold arms to Iran and used the money to arm the Contras.

These days, U.S. money is flowing to Nicaragua in the form of investments by foreign companies drawn by the country's cheap labor, low crime rates and recent decision to join the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

Nicaraguan presidents cannot serve consecutive terms, and President Enrique Bolanos steps down Jan. 10.

Ortega Headed Back To Power In Nicaragua (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA — Daniel Ortega, the rebel leader driven from power 16 years ago by a U.S.-backed war and the missteps of his own Sandinista movement, was cruising Monday toward victory and an unlikely political resurrection in Nicaragua's presidential vote.

The result was a blow to the Bush administration, which worked actively to discourage Nicaraguans from voting for Ortega, a 60-year-old former Marxist now allied with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, the bete noire of Latin American and U.S. conservatives.

With 62% of the ballots counted, Ortega was outpolling conservative challenger Eduardo Montealegre, 39% to 31%. Two separate "quick counts" that took samples of the vote found Ortega would win a clear and "irrefutable" first-round triumph.

Ortega's apparent victory was celebrated Monday evening in the impoverished neighborhoods of this and other Nicaraguan cities, where the Sandinista National Liberation Front's core supporters have remained loyal through years of revolution, counterrevolution and electoral defeats.

Cars cruised down Managua's main streets with horns honking and passengers waving the black and red flag of the Sandinista Front.

"I feel like I did in 1979, because this is a new revolution," said Violeta Mena, 44, remembering the day when the Sandinistas marched into Managua after defeating the army of dictator Anastasio Somoza. "This is not an armed revolution, it's a revolution for social justice."

Though his followers still call him el comandante, Ortega won by reinventing himself as a moderate and a dealmaker in the long tradition of Latin American populist politics.

Over the last two years, Ortega has forged a series of cunning alliances that have left his opponents on both ends of the political spectrum weak and divided.

Ortega reconciled with former enemies, including the hierarchy of the local Roman Catholic Church and former commanders of the right-wing Contra army who fought to overthrow him in the 1980s. And Sandinista legislators used their influence to change the rules of the electoral contest to make a first-round victory easier.

"He's a smart man and a shrewd politician, obviously," former President Carter said. Carter, who as president met Ortega when the Sandinistas came to power in the 1979 revolution, was leading a 62-observer delegation here.

Having pulled off an unlikely political second act, Ortega "has an opportunity to heal his country and to heal the disparity between his country and the United States," Carter said.

Ortega was winning a first-round victory in Sunday's vote thanks in large measure to a constitutional amendment the Sandinistas negotiated with one of Nicaragua's most powerful politicians — former President Arnoldo Aleman, now serving a 20-year sentence for fraud and money laundering.

The amendment lowered the threshold for a first-round victory from 45% to 35%. Aleman, in exchange, received a loosening of the conditions of his house arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0091754

In 1990, 1996 and 2001 Ortega lost presidential elections to conservative candidates even though he won a greater percentage of the votes in each of those races than he did Sunday.

Carter and other international and Nicaraguan observers said the voting had proceeded normally, despite claims by conservative candidates and the dissident Sandinista Renovation Movement of widespread irregularities.

"The election has taken place in a climate of tranquillity," said Claudio Fava, head of the European Union's team of election monitors. "Above all, it is a victory for the Nicaraguan people…. There was no fraud."

U.S. officials, who had strongly urged Nicaraguans not to vote for Ortega and threatened economic consequences, responded cautiously Monday, saying they would withhold comment pending final results.

"The Nicaraguan electorate has responsibility for choosing its leaders," a State Department statement said. "We will work with those leaders based on their commitment to actions in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

After meeting with Carter at a Managua hotel Monday night, Ortega told reporters that Nicaragua would continue to "give security to the private sector, protect foreign and national investors … and work to eradicate poverty in the country."

Ortega's opponents were not prepared to concede defeat.

"This is a battle to transform Nicaragua," Montealegre, a Harvard-educated banker, said Monday morning. "It won't be over until the last vote is counted."

Another conservative candidate, Jose Rizo of the Liberal Constitutional Party, was running third in the official count, with 23% of the vote.

Oscar Rene Vargas, a sociologist and political analyst here, said the split in the conservative vote, along with a lingering crisis of poverty, immigration and unemployment, helped deliver a Sandinista victory.

Between 1990 and 2005, he said, the number of Nicaraguans living in poverty increased from 2 million to 4 million.

"People had a lot of expectations that life would get better" with conservative governments, Vargas said. "Instead, life got worse." Hundreds of thousands of Nicaraguans emigrated to neighboring Costa Rica, El Salvador and other countries in search of work.

With Ortega looking strong in polls before the election, Paul Trivelli, the U.S. ambassador in Managua, worked behind the scenes to unite Nicaragua's conservative politicians behind a single, anti-Ortega candidate.

Trivelli warned that $220 million in U.S. aid to Nicaragua could be imperiled in the event of an Ortega victory, and U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said U.S. aid to the country would be endangered if "anti-democratic forces" prevailed in Nicaragua. Three Republican congressmen called on the Bush administration to stop people in the U.S. from sending money to Nicaragua should Ortega win.

The American lobbying has been enough to alarm the Organization of American States, which in October said it "regretted" the U.S. intervention. "The future of Nicaragua's political institutions should depend only on the decisions of the people of this nation," an OAS observer mission said in a statement.

The European Union and watchdog groups have been critical of Venezuelan attempts to influence the Nicaraguan vote. Chavez is widely believed to have helped fund the Ortega campaign, which dominated the airwaves here.

Michael Shifter, vice president of Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington research group, said U.S. officials have been disturbed at the prospect of Ortega's return. But he said the U.S. effort to prevent Nicaragua from turning to Ortega was out of proportion to any threat the politician could pose to the country and region.

"It's a setback to U.S. policy, but sort of a self-inflicted one, since he's not crucial to U.S. security interests, as they set him up to be," Shifter said.

He said Ortega was not likely to try to push Nicaragua far to the left, and would have to remain closer to the center to accomplish his goals in the country and the region. Ortega will be an ally of the left-leaning regimes in Venezuela, Cuba and Bolivia, but "his capacity to extend his influence is limited," he said.

Who is Ortega?

1945: Born in La Libertad, Nicaragua, to middle-class parents.

1963: Joins Marxist Sandinista National Liberation Front.

1967: Arrested and imprisoned on bank robbery charges.

1974: Released in exchange for hostages, becomes a Sandinista commander.

1979: Sandinistas overthrow dictator Anastasio Somoza and form five-person Junta of National Reconstruction. Under the junta, Nicaragua makes advances in literacy, healthcare, women's rights and working conditions, but sparks opposition with land seizures, economic controls and forced relocation of Miskito Indians.

1984: Elected president, amid boycott by opposition groups.

1986: President Reagan warns that defeat of the U.S.-funded Contra rebels would create "a privileged sanctuary for terrorists and subversives just two days' driving time from Harlingen, Texas."

DOJ_NMG_0091755

1990: Loses presidential election to former junta member Violeta Barrios de Chamorro amid spiraling inflation, a U.S. trade embargo and widespread discontent over conscription to fight the U.S.-supported Contra war.

Nicaragua's Ortega Ready For Comeback (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, November 7, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Daniel Ortega, the Marxist who led the fight against U.S.-backed Contra rebels in the 1980s, appeared to be heading to victory in Nicaragua's presidential election, according to partial results released Monday.

The Bush administration openly supported his two conservative opponents to block the election of another leader in Latin America with anti-U.S. leanings. Venezuela and Bolivia have elected anti-American leftists. Brazil also has a leftist president.

U.S. officials, including Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Paul Trivelli, the U.S. ambassador to Nicaragua, warned that foreign investors might move elsewhere if Ortega won. Trivelli has called Ortega's democratic credentials “very doubtful.”

During his campaign, Ortega called for unity and reconciliation and vowed he would maintain the country's vital economic ties with the United States, which has provided $1.2 billion in aid since 1990. But he also said he would strengthen relations with Latin American leaders such as Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

With more than 60% of the vote counted, the Supreme Electoral Council said Ortega had 39% of the vote and Eduardo Montealegre, a U.S.-backed, Harvard-educated banker, had 31%. Three other candidates in the race trailed. Ortega needed 35% and a 5-point lead to avoid a runoff.

It would be a remarkable comeback for the former president and Sandinista leader who for the past 16 years has tried and failed to recapture leadership.

Jubilant Ortega supporters filled the capital's streets late Sunday after the vote. Opponents said the celebration was premature. “This isn't over until the last vote has been counted,” Montealegre said.

Ortega, 60, was elected president in 1984. The next year, a five-year war broke out against U.S.-backed contra rebels. Nicaragua is the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere after Haiti, according to the U.S. State Department.

Asked by reporters in Washington on Monday whether it was possible Ortega had changed since his Marxist days, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared skeptical. “We'll see,” she said.

Nations Fight Perceived Corruption Image (AP)

By David Rising

AP, November 7, 2006

Nearly three-quarters of 163 countries ranked in a new survey suffer from a perception of serious corruption, while in nearly half it is seen as rampant, a watchdog group reported Monday.

Transparency International's 2006 Corruption Perceptions Index gives the worst scores to many of the world's poorest countries, including almost all African nations, indicating a strong correlation between corruption and poverty.

The stragglers also included several so-called "failed states," including Iraq, which dropped from place 137 last year to second-last as the situation there continues to deteriorate.

"Corruption traps millions in poverty," the agency's international chairman Huguette Labelle said in a statement. "Despite a decade of progress in establishing anti-corruption laws and regulations, today's results indicate that much remains to be done."

The agency's scale is based on the perceptions of the degree of corruption by businesspeople and country analysts. Countries are ranked out of 10, and anything below five indicates "serious" perceived levels of corruption, and anything below 3 "rampant," the agency said.

Several former Soviet republics fared relatively well, with Estonia ranking 24th with a 6.7 rating, Lithuania with 4.8 in 46th and Latvia with 4.7 in 49th. Estonia's place was the highest of the 10 mostly former communist countries that joined the EU in 2004.

In contrast, the perception of corruption in Russia was a dismal 2.5, putting it in a 121st place tie with several other nations including Rwanda and Swaziland. Even Kazakhstan fared better, scoring 2.6.

Faring the best were Finland, Iceland and New Zealand, in a first-place tie with rankings of 9.6.

Filling out the top 10 were Denmark, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland, Norway, Australia, and the Netherlands.

Britain was 11th with an 8.6 rating, Germany 16th at 8.0 and the United States 20th with 7.3.

France tied with Ireland with a 7.4 rating in 18th place, while Italy mustered only 4.9 in 45th place.

The only African countries to score more than 5 were Botswana and Mauritius.

At the bottom of the list in place 163 was Haiti with a 1.8 rating, just slightly worse than Guinea, Iraq and Myanmar which tied in second-last with a 1.9.

DOJ_NMG_0091756

Transparency International did not rank countries for which not enough data was available, including Afghanistan, Somalia and North Korea.

US Suffers Fall In Corruption Ranking (FT)

By Hugh Williamson In Berlin

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

The US has suffered a "significant worsening" in its perceived levels of corruption following a series of business scandals and increasing worries over political party funding, Transparency International, the anti-corruption watchdog, said on Monday.

In an international ranking of countries released ahead of Tuesday's mid-term congressional elections, the US fell to 20th place from 17th last year.

Its score fell from 7.6 to 7.3, with 10 representing "least corrupt" and 0 "rampant corruption".

The Berlin-based pressure group's annual Corruption Perceptions Index ranks 163 countries based on opinion polls and expert assessments.

Huguette Labelle, TI's global chairwoman, said the reasons could include the greater awareness of corruption after the Enron and Worldcom business scandals, and growing concern in the US that private and business donations to politicians was having a corrupting influence on political affairs.

"Issues of ethics and corruption have been on the front-burner for some time with the US electorate and have played a role in the election," Nancy Boswell, president of the group's US chapter, said in an interview from Washington DC.

Finland, Iceland and New Zealand are the world's least corrupt countries, while Haiti, Burma, and Iraq are most corrupt, according to the index.

This year's index score for Iraq of 1.9 is based only on surveys made after the invasion. The score in 2004, based largely on pre-invasion surveys, was 2.1.

"The systems for upholding integrity in Iraq, the rule of law and courts, are not functioning, or have been destroyed," said David Nussbaum, TI chief executive.

The index also revealed a link between corruption and poverty, TI said, with all low-income countries scoring below 5.0.

Such high levels of corruption could also have very serious consequences, for instance when food and vaccines did not reach poor people. "Corruption kills," Ms Labelle said.

Hilary Benn, British development minister, said: "In poor countries corruption harms the poorest people most of all.

"It is shocking that, according to Transparency International Kenya, bribery costs Kenyans about US$1bn [€787m, £526m] each year, yet more than half of all Kenyans live on less than $2 per day."

Mr Nussbaum said the index highlighted the need for associations of bankers, accountants and company lawyers to pay more attention to corruption.

These were failing to clamp down on members who provided a "veneer of legitimacy" to corrupt politicians in developing and transition countries, he said.

Such professional groups should be doing more to tackle bribery on a grand scale that was facilitated by some of their members.

He cited the International Bar Association, and the International Compliance Association as examples of organisations that should act more convincingly.

He urged professional associations to launch their own investigations into bankers, accountants or others who allegedly "provide the arteries through which corrupt money can flow", or provided offshore facilities to invest stolen funds.

He said anti-corruption codes of conduct of such associations were often "too vague" to be effective, and training programmes were outdated.

"For companies, thinking just in terms of compliance in not enough," he said.

Source: Transparency International

Kidnappings Return To Haunt Long Ethnic War In Sri Lanka (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Like a returning ghost, a rash of mysterious abductions has come to haunt this country once more.

Men and women are being grabbed from their homes, sometimes after dark, sometimes in broad daylight. Ransom is demanded in some cases; in others, political intimidation seems to be the point. A few have been freed, but corpses have also turned up. With rare exceptions, the crimes remain unsolved.

DOJ_NMG_0091757

The abductions are a terrifying sideshow in Sri Lanka's newly revived ethnic conflict, and they contain eerie echoes of the horrors of a generation ago, when this island nation achieved notoriety for tens of thousands of disappearances.

For nearly a quarter of a century, the ethnic Sinhalese-dominated government has been locked in battle with Tamil separatist guerrillas. A new menace has come in the form of a breakaway Tamil rebel faction, widely accused of being allied with the government and — say kidnapping victims lucky enough to tell their tales — of having a hand in the abductions.

The government denies having any link to the group, called the Karuna faction, and describes the latest abductions as a law-and-order problem that it can tackle.

It is difficult to know who is responsible, or exactly how many people have been seized.

The International Committee of the Red Cross says it received more than 350 reports of disappeared persons through late October. The National Human Rights Commission logged 419 such complaints between last December and September.

A private human rights advocacy group, called Home for Human Rights, has documented 203 cases of missing persons in the first nine months of this year, using newspaper clippings and other reports. It lists 965 more extrajudicial killings, some of whose victims might also have been abducted.

The victims come from all walks of life: a radio reporter, a university dean, a fish trader. For the most part, they are Tamil, the country's main ethnic minority. Many of the abductions have been carried out in government-controlled territory — sometimes in the heart of this highly fortified capital, at other times in the north and east, close to military installations. Some of those kidnapped have won release only after their families appealed to the highest echelons of the state.

A white van appears repeatedly in their recollections: it is the iconic symbol of the late 1980's, when white vans were used in a wave of abductions as the government fought a violent leftist insurrection.

Despite the official denials, the abductions have spread a cloud over the administration of President Mahinda Rajapakse, including a recommendation by the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, to dispatch foreign monitors to investigate rights abuses here.

[Instead, on Nov. 6, Mr. Rajapakse's government announced formation of a government commission of inquiry, to be aided by foreign observers. Ms. Arbour's office cautiously welcomed the plan but warned of the need to "establish not only individual responsibility for crimes, but the broader patterns and context in which they occur."]

The spike in rights abuses corresponds to the swift deterioration of a 2002 cease-fire between the Sri Lankan military and the ethnic rebels, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

The rights record of the Tamil Tigers has hardly been exemplary. They have been repeatedly accused of abductions, including of children whom they draft into military service. The rebels are also implicated in a rash of assassinations, in particular attacks on ethnic Tamils who work with the state.

The terror of this war has grown ever sharper with the emergence of the Karuna faction, which broke away from the Tamil Tigers.

Sathasivam Kumararatnam, the fish trader, was packed into a white van on a Thursday morning in late September from a street corner near his house. His captors, he said, pistol-whipped him, blindfolded and gagged him, bound his wrists and took his cash.

He was beaten and interrogated about his links to the Tamil Tigers. His family was then pressed for nearly $10,000 for his release. The Kumararatnams bargained his captors down to half that amount, and when a courier came to pick up the ransom, Mr. Kumararatnam's first-born son, Ravindran, beat him to a pulp. He also forced a confession out of him. "I'm with the Karuna faction," Ravindran said he heard him say.

The police confirmed that a man arrested in connection with Mr. Kumararatnam's kidnapping had confessed to links to the rebel faction. They gave no further details.

His captors have since released Mr. Kumararatnam. But he is not yet free. He still receives threatening phone calls, he says. "This time, we will kill you," the callers tell him.

The political nature of many of the abductions, even in cases where the kidnappers' identities are hard to pin down, seems clear.

Nadaraja Kuruparan, a Tamil radio reporter, said he was not asked for a single rupee after he was yanked from his car one early morning in August. He was held overnight at what appeared to be a private house, he said, and told he would have to "clarify" some of his reports. He was released on the outskirts of Colombo the following day, and given taxi money to return home.

The government had previously warned the station about Mr. Kuruparan's popular talk show, on which he had interviewed a Tamil Tiger leader this year. Since his kidnapping, he has decided to take the talk show off the air.

In another case, Balasingam Sugumar, the dean of arts at the main public university in Batticaloa, in the east, was plucked from his house and detained for 10 days, despite his family's quiet efforts to buy off his captors, the family said.

DOJ_NMG_0091758

In exchange for his release, his abductors demanded the resignation of a senior university administrator, whom they accused of having links to the Tamil Tiger rebels. It remains a mystery how the white van that came to get him on a Saturday night in late September managed to pass through the military checkpoints that sit on both ends of his road.

His family says they do not know what ultimately led to Mr. Sugumar's release, only that they reached out to representatives of each of the warring parties, including President Rajapakse, who promised to investigate.

Mr. Sugumar refused to be interviewed. [He has since fled the country, his family said.]

For now, there seems to be little consensus within the government on who is behind the abductions, let alone what to do about them.

A senior negotiator for the government, Palitha T. B. Kohona, said the kidnappings represented a law-and-order challenge for the state. "We would like to get to the bottom of this," he said. "We will intensify investigations if necessary."

Gotabaya Rajapakse, the president's brother, who also serves as defense secretary, said in late October that "lots of people" had been apprehended in connection with the abductions. But he did not have details on how many and in what period.

His claim was contradicted by a retired judge whom the president appointed to look into the abductions. The judge, Mahanama Tilakaratne, said the police had made virtually no arrests. He also said he believed many of the recent abductions were a result of personal grudges and had little to do with the ethnic conflict.

By way of example, he took out the file of one victim and pointed out that he was suspected of an extramarital affair. The judge said he could not share details of any other cases.

Many of those who disappeared a generation ago are still unaccounted for. Their faces stare out from a simple memorial erected on the outskirts of Colombo. Once a year, their families come to lay flowers.

In late October came a weeping father, W. A. W. Weerasinghe, to remember his son, Krishantha, who was stuffed into a white van one afternoon more than 16 years ago and has not been heard from since.

Along with dozens of other parents, Mr. Weerasinghe, 68, laid flowers and wept. "Disappearance is a crime against humanity," reads a tablet at the base of the memorial. "Let us not allow it to happen again."

At the time of those disappearances, President Rajapakse was an opposition lawmaker and a human rights activist whose colleagues were among the thousands abducted and killed. Nine months after Mr. Weerasinghe's son disappeared, Mr. Rajapakse headed to Geneva to draw the attention of the United Nations to human rights abuses in his country, carrying with him reams of files on missing persons.

According to human rights groups and news reports from that time, the Sri Lankan police seized the documents at the airport.

Will Bush Lose Lebanon, Too? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

President Bush learns tonight whether Republicans will lose control of the House, the Senate, or both. But what's a mere midterm when his administration is on the verge of losing an entire country?

That country is Lebanon. Twenty months ago, when Syrian troops were abruptly forced out in the so-called Cedar Revolution after a 29-year occupation, the Levantine state was a byword for the ascendancy of the Bush Doctrine. "It's strange for me to say this," the Lebanese Druze leader Walid Jumblatt told columnist David Ignatius in February 2005, "but this process of change has started because of the American invasion of Iraq. I was cynical about Iraq. But when I saw the Iraqi people voting three weeks ago, eight million of them, it was the start of a new Arab world."

Fast-forward to the present and then watch as the Cedar Revolution gets played in reverse. The White House issued a remarkable statement last Wednesday warning of "mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government." That evidence includes recent threats on the lives of leading anti-Syrian figures, about a dozen of whom were assassinated last year. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah has also promised massive demonstrations if his demand for a "national unity" government -- in which he and his allies would gain enough seats in the cabinet to exercise a veto -- is not met by the end of this week.

This could be scene-setting for another civil war, if the Lebanese have the appetite for it. Mr. Nasrallah's opponents, including the notorious Christian militiaman Samir Geagea, have put it about that if Hezbollah goes ahead with its demonstrations they will stage massive counterprotests and perhaps barricade the roads into Beirut.

What would Mr. Nasrallah do then? "He's going to push the troops of others to bring about an incident," speculates Lebanese commentator Walid Phares of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies. "He'll start a massive demonstration in front of [Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's] office and demand his resignation. He'll portray himself as the opposition. What he would love most of all is to have the media broadcast the downfall of the Bush-allied government."

DOJ_NMG_0091759

That's one scenario, though it probably won't come to that: Mr. Nasrallah would prefer maximum autonomy within the country than actual responsibility over it. Instead, Lebanon's political classes are likely to settle on a compromise that would sacrifice at least one of the three most cherished goals of the Cedar Revolution. The first is disarming Hezbollah, as required by the 1989 Taif Accords and demanded by U.N. Resolutions 1559 and 1701. But that latter resolution, part of the cease-fire agreement arranged by Condoleezza Rice last summer, does more to shield Hezbollah from Israel than the other way around.

Second is a successful conclusion to the U.N. investigation into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The investigation, led by low-key Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz, is said to be within weeks of wrapping up, and informed U.S. diplomatic sources expect that it will indict senior figures in the Syrian regime, including relatives of President Bashar Assad. But the indictments must be followed by a trial in Lebanon, which Mr. Assad is desperate to quash. Hence the Hezbollah power play: If Mr. Nasrallah and his allies can gain a third of the cabinet's seats, they can prevent the Hariri case from ever going to trial.

Finally, the Cedar Revolution was supposed to put an end to Syria's meddling in Lebanon. But that won't happen if at the end of this week's political negotiations the Lebanese government allows President Emile Lahoud, still and forever a Syrian puppet, to remain in office even as the country moves to early elections. Nor does it help that Mr. Assad continues to prove his worth to Mr. Nasrallah by serving as his main conduit of arms.

In all this, Hezbollah has been helped by the weakness of its domestic opponents. The Cedar Revolution demonstrated that Lebanon's anti-Syrian forces were a majority in the country. But those forces are fractious and unsure of themselves, and Mr. Nasrallah was able to draw down their support by striking a deal with the opportunistic Maronite leader Michel Aoun. Israel's incompetent military campaign last summer was another boon for Mr. Nasrallah, since anything less than his complete defeat in war was bound to embolden him politically.

Then there is the forthcoming report of former Secretary of State James Baker's Iraq Study Group, which is rumored to urge the Bush administration to re-engage Damascus diplomatically. In recent days Mr. Assad has been talking a blue streak about his willingness to make peace with Israel, a signal that he might be willing to play ball on that front and maybe in Iraq if only the administration lets him have his way in Lebanon.

The term for Mr. Baker's advice is "sell-out," and it is entirely characteristic of his past Mideast diplomacy. As an alternative, Mr. Phares argues that Ms. Rice should convene a conference of Lebanese NGOs in Washington as a way of bracing them for what he calls a "second Cedar Revolution." Also noteworthy is the internal Shiite opposition to Hezbollah: "The Shiite community never gave anyone the right to wage war in its name," Sayed Ali al-Amin, the Shiite mufti of Tyre, recently told Beirut's An-Nahar newspaper. With winter approaching and Hezbollah reportedly sharply cutting back on its reconstruction funds to homeless Shiites, there's an opportunity here to discredit Mr. Nasrallah and separate his organization from its religious base.

Saving Lebanon will require focus, nerve and imagination, qualities hitherto absent from Ms. Rice's tenure at State. Maybe if her boss loses his majority in Congress, he'll be less inclined to let the remainder of his legacy go down the drain with it.

DOJ_NMG_0091760

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Tuesday, November 07, 2006 9:55 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 11/7/06 Civil Division News

Charge or Release Posada, Judge Orders

Appeals Court Weighs Prisoners' Right to Fight Detention

Court Hears of American's Iraq Sentence

Gov't says U.S. Taliban soldier Lindh deserves documents privacy

Detroit judge dismisses House Democrats' lawsuit over $39B budget bill

HealthSouth to pay $4M to settle Medicare case

Abortion Cases Pit Justices vs. Congress

Legal System Gives Boost To Chinese Asylum Seekers

Creekstone answers USDA in court over mad cow testing

Press Release: United States Files Brief Supporting Utah's Right to Keep Children Safe From Adult-Oriented Electronic Messages; The CAN-SPAM Act Does Not Preempt State Child Protection Registry Laws

Los Angeles Times

November 7, 2006

Charge or Release Posada, Judge Orders

By Carol J. Williams

MIAMI -- He has admitted to bombing Havana hotels, served time for plotting to assassinate Fidel Castro and for more than 20 years was a fugitive from charges of blowing up a Cuban airliner.

But 17 months after Luis Posada Carriles was arrested and sent to a Texas immigration lockup, U.S. officials have declined to label him a terrorist or charge him with a crime. Friday, a federal judge in El Paso, Texas, gave the U.S. government until Feb. 1 to bring a case against Posada or the reputed bomber will be freed.

He has become a political liability for the Bush administration in its declared global war on terrorism.

As a veteran of nearly five decades of covert operations in Latin America, including the Bay of Pigs invasion, clandestine Cold War actions and the Iran-Contra affair, Posada knows where Washington's bodies are buried.

If Posada were to be prosecuted, he probably would seek to defend himself against any criminal charges by arguing that his violent actions were on behalf of his CIA masters.

His Miami lawyer, Eduardo Soto, alluded to his client's past collaboration with U.S. intelligence services as he pressed the 78-year-old Cuban militant's unsuccessful quest for political asylum.

``A public trial of Luis Posada would certainly reveal embarrassing details on the degree to which U.S. covert operatives used terrorism as a tool in the 1960s," said Peter Kornbluh of the independent National Security Archive at George Washington University.

Kornbluh has compiled declassified CIA and FBI evidence of Posada's role in the 1976 plane bombing, near Barbados, of a Cuban airliner in which all 73 people on board died. Among the documents in the archive's online dossier is one recently obtained through Freedom of Information Act litigation that shows Posada informed his CIA minders of the plot to blow up the airliner three months ahead of the attack.

The administration has avoided bringing a criminal case against Posada, who enjoys strong support among Miami's politically powerful Cuban exiles, by handling him like any other immigration offender and simply seeking his deportation.

Posada returned to Florida in March 2005, reportedly on a fellow exile's shrimp boat sent to fetch him from an island off the Yucatan Peninsula. He'd made his way there six months after being pardoned by outgoing Panamanian President Mireya Moscoso in August 2004 after serving four years for attempting to kill Castro at a Panama summit in 2000.

Moscoso's clemency decree for Posada and three U.S. militants was seen as a favor to the Bush administration in a presidential election year when the Cuban exile vote in Florida was vital.

Posada moved about Miami with impunity, despite indignant demands for his extradition by Cuba and Venezuela, where he is a naturalized citizen. Authorities finally arrested him two months after his arrival when he invited journalists to his Miami residence for a news conference.

A federal immigration judge in El Paso, where Posada has been held since May 2005, ruled last year that he should be deported to a country other than Venezuela or Cuba, which want to try him for the jetliner bombing. The federal government has spurned those countries' extradition requests, contending Posada would be at risk of torture or execution.

The State Department approached at least six friendly foreign governments to take Posada, but Canada, Mexico, Guatemala, Panama, Costa Rica and El Salvador all refused. The Mexican government later said it would hand Posada over to Cuba if he re-entered Mexico.

Soto argued in August that U.S. authorities couldn't hold Posada indefinitely after abandoning efforts to send him abroad. U.S. Magistrate Norbert Garney agreed and recommended in September that Posada be released.

In October, the Justice Department urged the court to keep Posada in jail.

``Luis Posada Carriles is an admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks. The Department of Justice believes that Posada is a flight risk and that his release would be a danger to the community," spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement notified Posada that the government had decided to prolong his detention because of concerns that his release ``would have serious foreign-policy consequences," according to an agency statement.

Under anti-terrorism powers claimed by the administration, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice needs only to ask Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to brand Posada a terrorist to keep him locked up while the government pursues criminal action, said David Sebastian, Soto's paralegal on the case.

Much as the administration can indefinitely detain terrorism suspects at the U.S. military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, without legal recourse or formal charges, so, too, can it hold Posada with unilateral certification that he poses a threat to national security. The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" missive makes clear that the administration considers Posada a terrorist but has yet to pursue that formal designation.

Soto has filed a writ of habeas corpus challenging the government's continued jailing of Posada on the immigration violation. That move presents a dilemma for the administration: It could be forced to let a man officials call a terrorist walk free or prosecute him and risk public airing of some of Washington's darkest secrets.

U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez on Friday gave the administration the Feb. 1 deadline to prosecute or release Posada.

Neither the State Department nor the Justice Department would say what, if any, actions were being taken to ensure Posada remains in detention.

END

New York Times

November 7, 2006

Appeals Court Weighs Prisoners' Right to Fight Detention

NEIL A. LEWIS

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 The Bush administration's successful effort to have Congress eliminate the right of Guantanamo prisoners to challenge their detentions before federal judges is now moving toward what may be an epic battle in the courts.

And while lawsuits on the topic are spread across the judiciary, the principal battleground, legal experts say, is the federal appeals court in Washington. That court has been considering for three years whether the hundreds of prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, have the right of habeas corpus -- that is, the ability to ask a federal judge to review the reasons for their detention.

But the law passed by Congress last month eliminating the habeas right supersedes almost all of the arguments that have gone before and is now the focus of the legal confrontation, government and civil liberties lawyers agree. In a ruling last June, the Supreme Court had said that an earlier measure did not eliminate habeas lawsuits that were already in the courts. However, in October, the administration used more explicit language, saying the new law retroactively blocked federal courts from entertaining habeas lawsuits by Guantanamo detainees.

The three-judge appeals court panel will have to decide whether the pending lawsuits brought by the 430 or so remaining detainees at Guantanamo should be thrown out, as the Bush administration has argued, or whether the new law is unconstitutional, as civil liberties groups have contended.

Whatever resolution is reached by the three appellate judges -- David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, both appointees of Republican presidents, and Judith W. Rogers, appointed by a Democrat -- it will almost certainly end up before the Supreme Court. A decision could come from the appeals court before the end of the year.

Lawyers for the detainees said in a recent brief that despite the wording of the new law, Congress could not take away the right to bring such habeas corpus lawsuits because that would violate the Constitution.

Their brief notes that the Constitution provides that Congress may suspend the right only in cases of rebellion or invasion, as President Abraham Lincoln did during the Civil War. Congress may provide a substitute, but only one that is equivalent to a full-blown habeas action, the lawyers said in their brief.

Justice Department officials said they would argue that the law is constitutional when they issue their formal reply in a brief due next Monday.

David B. Rivkin Jr., a White House counsel in the administration of the first President Bush, said he believed the department would emphasize that the new law provided an adequate substitute method for a detainee to challenge his confinement.

A proceeding held for each prisoner at Guantanamo, called a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, is presumed to provide a legally sufficient justification for detention, under the new law. That proceeding, in which three military officers decide if a prisoner is rightfully deemed to be an unlawful enemy combatant, may be appealed directly to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Mr. Rivkin, an authority on national security law who supports the administration, said the law did not suspend habeas corpus but instead provided a new way for it to be exercised.

"The government is saying, 'Look, we're not denying anyone's chance to get habeas,' " he said. "We're just providing a different way."

Mr. Rivkin said the judges on the appeals court panel should be especially receptive to the idea that the process is fair because the law provides for that very court to hear any appeals from the military tribunals.

But the detainees' lawyers have argued that the law provides for only a limited review of the military tribunals by the appeals court. Under the new law, they said, the appeals court may not look behind the record of the military tribunal, and the judges, in effect, are required to accept all of the military's assertions.

Similar objections to the law are contained in a brief filed by seven former federal judges, who were appointed by both Democratic and Republican administrations. The judges say in their brief that the law has "one specific and fundamental flaw," namely that the military tribunals may accept evidence obtained by torture. The judges said the limited review for the appeals court in the new law "cannot remove the stain of torture because the court, at least according to the government, cannot alter or expand the record created by the military."

They said that "no habeas court would permit detentions based on evidence obtained in this manner."

END

APError! Hyperlink reference not valid.November 7, 2006

Court Hears of American's Iraq Sentence

WASHINGTON_An American facing a death sentence in Iraq turned to the Supreme Court Monday in a late effort to keep the military from handing him over to Iraqi authorities.

Papers filed with Chief Justice John Roberts asked the court to allow Mohammad Munaf to remain in military custody until U.S. courts resolve whether U.S. forces can turn over Americans who are suspected terrorists to the Iraqi government .

Munaf was convicted and sentenced to death by an Iraqi judge last month on charges he helped in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad. He claimed his trial was flawed and his confession was coerced.

Munaf sought a federal court order to prevent his transfer.

U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth said last month that he had no authority to intervene because the Iraqi-born Munaf, who became a U.S. citizen in 2000, was being held by coalition military forces, not by the U.S. military alone.

The U.S. Appeals Court for the District of Columbia Circuit also declined to step in, but ordered the military to hold off on handing Munaf over to the Iraqis until the Supreme Court rules in his case.

Whether the U.S. military or coalition forces have custody of Munaf is at the heart of a legal fight over the fate of American citizens being held in Iraq. Critics say it is disingenuous because the prisons Munaf and others are being held in are operated by the U.S. military.

The appeals court in Washington is considering the similar case of Shawqi Omar, an American citizen accused of being a top al-Qaida lieutenant in Iraq. A different federal judge blocked Omar's transfer and the appeals court, which heard arguments in September, has yet to rule.

END

APError! Hyperlink reference not valid.November 7, 2006

Gov't says U.S. Taliban soldier Lindh deserves documents privacy

NEW YORK_The government is opposing a move to have the written arguments seeking a shorter prison term by American-born Taliban soldier John Walker Lindh made public.

At a hearing in Manhattan yesterday, a government lawyer urged a judge to reject arguments by The Associated Press that Lindh's reasoning for a reduced sentence should be public because there is high public interest in his case.

An attorney for A-P disagreed, telling the judge it was the government's burden to prove it has a compelling reason for keeping sealed court papers that might reveal what happened to Lindh after he was captured.

The 25-year-old Lindh -- who grew up in Marin County -- is seeking to have his 20-year prison sentence shortened. His lawyer says because the conditions of his confinement have been so harsh, he should get a shorter prison term.

Lindh was captured in Afghanistan when U-S forces invaded the country to topple the Taliban.

END

AP

November 7, 2006

Detroit judge dismisses House Democrats' lawsuit over $39B budget bill

DETROIT_A federal judge on Monday dismissed a lawsuit filed by U.S. House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion budget bill because the House and Senate did not approve identical versions.

House Democrats accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush in February. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, sued in April along with 10 other House members to prevent the law from being implemented.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1.

When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months. The lawsuit said the oversight amounted to an additional $2 billion in spending, and the plaintiffs claimed that because they never had the chance to vote on the version signed into law, the law was invalid.

The Department of Justice had sought the lawsuit's dismissal, claiming the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment and were not in "any way personally affected or injured."

Messages seeking comment were left Monday night with Conyers' office and the Justice Department.

The White House and Republican leaders in Congress have said the matter is settled because the mistake was technical and top House and Senate leaders certified the bill before transmitting it to the White House.

END

Memphis Business Journal

2:10 PM CST Monday

HealthSouth to pay $4M to settle Medicare case

HealthSouth Corp. has agreed to pay $4 million to the U.S. to settle a case of double dipping at the Medicare bucket, the U.S. attorney announced Monday.

David Kustoff, U.S. attorney for Western Tennessee in Memphis, said the payment will settle civil allegations that HealthSouth was involved in a scheme from 1994-2004 to charge Medicare twice for the same prosthetic devices. Prosecutors alleged that HealthSouth would get some devices, such as braces and artificial limbs, at no charge for inpatient therapeutic purposes, and then turn around and bill Medicare for the devices. In some cases, Medicare paid both the supplier and HealthSouth for the same device.

HealthSouth was prosecuted under the federal False Claims Act. The case was brought by the Justice Department's Civil Division in Memphis, in conjunction with the inspector general of Health and Human Services, and the FBI.

Birmingham, Ala.-based HealthSouth (OTCBB: HLSH) is a nationwide rehabilitation company. In Memphis, it operates two rehab hospitals; one is adjacent to Methodist-University Hospital in Midtown, and the other is near Methodist-North in Raleigh. HealthSouth also has several outpatient clinics providing physical rehab, occupational medicine and sports medicine.

END

The National Law Journal
11-07-2006

Abortion Cases Pit Justices vs. Congress

Marcia Coyle

In weighing the constitutionality of a federal law, the U.S. Supreme Court sometimes gives deference to congressional findings of fact. How will it view the critical finding at the heart of its latest abortion challenge?

The justices this week will hear arguments in two cases testing the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380; Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. Partial-birth abortion is a term used for an abortion procedure, intact dilation and extraction, infrequently used in second-trimester pregnancies.

Although the high court's abortion precedents and the future of a woman's right to choose abortion will dominate discussions, the cases also are very much about separation of powers and the roles of the legislative and judicial branches in making and interpreting laws, say scholars on both sides.

"Our concern is [that] the Court's dislike of Roe v. Wade will drive the amount of deference it's willing to give to Congress," said Mark Moller, senior fellow in constitutional studies at the Cato Institute, which filed an amicus brief on the issue. "We think this is a much larger issue that goes far beyond Roe. It's about who gets to decide what the law is."

The Court's approach to deference in these cases, he added, can affect "a whole array of different rights."

In enacting the 2003 law, Congress made explicit findings in the statute that partial-birth abortion "is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother." A health exception to abortion restrictions has been central to the court's abortion jurisprudence since the landmark Roe v. Wade. The lack of such an exception was a key basis for a 5-4 majority's decision to strike down a Nebraska partial-birth abortion law, very similar to the federal law, just six years ago. Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914.

In the 2003 law, Congress criticizes Stenberg and the findings of the trial judge that gave rise to the Stenberg high court case. The federal lawmakers call for a "high degree" of deference to their own findings, a call echoed by the Bush administration and its supporters in briefs defending the federal law.

NEUTRAL FACT-FINDING?

But opponents contend that that type of deference is not due because Congress did not engage in neutral fact-finding. A fundamental right, requiring heightened court scrutiny and independent review of congressional findings, is at issue, and two district judges, in extensive trials in the two cases, made findings contrary to those of Congress.

The heart of the congressional fact-finding process -- and the reason Congress receives its greatest deference on economic or sociological facts -- is its ability to use a diverse array of means to collect and analyze information, said Charles Tiefer of the University of Baltimore School of Law, a former solicitor to the U.S. House of Representatives.

However, he added, "Where the issue is a matter of weighing social values against civil liberties, Congress may or may not have a good feel for the viewpoint of the voting population, but it doesn't have some superior method of somehow factually establishing where the balance point is."

The high court, with some ups and downs, gave considerable deference to congressional findings from the late 1930s to the mid-1990s and the advance of the Rehnquist Court's federalism movement, said Tiefer and others. In the last decade, a divided court struck down a number of applications of federal laws to the states, often because of a lack of congressional findings or despite extensive congressional findings.

Some lawmakers have voiced considerable unhappiness with the court's "lack of respect," most recently in the confirmation hearings for Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

While scholars agree that it's hard to find a consistent approach across the justices' rulings, Neal Devins of the College of William and Mary Marshall-Whythe School of Law suggests that where the court generally applies a rational-basis standard of review to a law affecting a right or classification, the court gives extreme deference to Congress.

"The whole theory of rational-basis review is essentially these are matters the legislative process will self-correct if mistakes were made," said Devins, who has studied the findings issue. "But then, there are fundamental rights cases, like cases involving abortion, where the court says the nature of the right or the classification involved is such we can't defer to the government."

The government argues that a series of First Amendment rulings by the high court "confirm that the degree of deference owed to congressional findings does not turn on the right at issue or the applicable level of scrutiny."

That position is "astounding and ridiculous," said David Faigman of the University of California Hastings College of the Law, who, with other scholars, filed an amicus brief on the findings issue on behalf of the law's opponents.

When legislation is subject to heightened scrutiny because it burdens a basic right, he said, the court has always made an independent review of factual findings. The government's position -- deference in all cases -- would permit legislative bodies to effectively overrule, through the guise of "fact-finding," the court's most critical decisions, he added, thereby undermining the court's pre-eminent role in constitutional interpretation mandated by Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803).

Ultimately, all agree, the pivotal figure is Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who dissented in Stenberg but holds a very strong view of the Supreme Court's role in the Constitution's scheme.

"He could view what Congress did as an affront to the court," said Devins. "This is where the rubber meets the road for Kennedy -- to find out which is the bigger pull -- the disapproval of Stenberg pull or the judicial supremacy pull."

END

New York Sun

November 7, 2006

Legal System Gives Boost To Chinese Asylum Seekers

BY JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

A thorny legal issue in many asylum cases involving illegal immigrants from China arises from a simple biological fact: once here, immigrants frequently have children. Often they have more children than they would be permitted in China, where strict family-planning practices limit married couples to one or two children. When threatened with deportation, some of them claim asylum on the grounds that if returned to China, they could be sterilized for the reproductive freedom they had here.

Such asylum requests received a significant boost by two recent decisions from a federal appellate court in New York. The decisions represent a judicial about-face for the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which in August, 2005 had told a Chinese immigrant who fathered two American-born children that his fear of sterilization upon deportation was "speculative at best."

With the decisions — one was issued in September and the other a week ago yesterday — the court allows for the possibility that regional governments in China count the American-born children of Chinese immigrants against the quota of children each couple can have. In the decisions, the court ordered the Justice Department's Board of Immigration Appeals to review Chinese documents suggesting Chinese nationals can be punished for the children they have abroad.

China's family planning policies have produced a flow of asylum cases since Congress broadened the definition of a refugee in 1996 to include those persecuted under their home country's family planning policies. Last year, Congress lifted a cap that limited to 1,000 the number of immigrants who could receive asylum on the basis of family planning claims.

China accounts for the vast majority of asylum claims involving claims that deportation could ultimately mean sterilization. Because family planning regulations and enforcement vary by region, the courts have had difficulty judging the likelihood that a Chinese immigrant would be sterilized.

The 2nd Circuit's recent about-face followed its review of several purported Chinese documents submitted as part of an asylum application. The documents suggest that forced sterilization is in effect in the Fujian Province, which is opposite Taiwan and is a source of emigrants from China. The documents, purportedly from family planning administrations in the Fujian province, say "the reproductive behavior" of Chinese nationals abroad will be sanctioned according to family-planning rules back home in China, according to the decision.

Another document that the court considered was the Q&A handbook from the Family Planning Administration of Changle City in the Fujian Province. This document, the court ruled, "lends powerful potential support to" to the claim for asylum " because it states that a parent of two children … would, on her return, be subject to forced sterilization, even if one were born outside of China," the decision reads.

In light of the documents, the 2nd Circuit ordered the Board of Immigration Appeals to review again the case of an immigrant, Shou Yung Guo, a mother of two, including an American-born child. Previously, the BIA had rejected her asylum claim. The court also chastised the BIA for ignoring the documents.

"Since the documents Guo submitted are so self-evidently material, we are hard-pressed to understand how the BIA could have dismissed them so casually," the judges on the panel, Thomas Meskill, Robert Sack, and Barrington Parker, wrote.

The Guo decision was followed last week by a decision much talked about by immigration attorneys. The latest case, which cites the same documents, suggests the court is taking a new approach to these asylum cases.

In that decision, a different panel of three judges considered the case of Tian Ming Lin, the father of two American-born children, also from Fujian Province. Lin, afraid he himself would be sterilized, said that his own mother had been sterilized following the birth of her third child, according to court documents. The court sided with Lin.

"Returning a person to a part of China where he or she will face an officially sanctioned policy of forced sterilization, however, would appear to violate United States law, which expressly holds that a person with a well-founded fear of forced sterilization is a refugee eligible for asylum," the court wrote. The judges deciding the Lin case were Rosemary Pooler, Sonia Sotomayor, and Robert Katzmann.

The court's decisions in the two cases caused at least one anti-immigration activist to question whether courts should be benefiting immigrants who manage to evade authorities or appeal deportation orders for long enough to have large families.

The director of special projects for the Federation of American Immigration Reform, Jack Martin, said the cases gave illegal immigrants from China "a new option."

"The illegal immigrant from China can protect himself from deportation by managing to stay in the United States long enough to have children," Mr. Martin said.

But a New York lawyer who represents Chinese immigrants facing deportation, Gary Yerman, said it would be a mistake to see these decisions as a reward for illegal immigrants who manage to evade authorities.

"People aren't having children so they can use them as props." Mr. Yerman said. "We're talking about people who are in their 20s or 30s and through the natural matriculation of life they are having children. They are not trying to dupe the law."

Mr. Yerman praised the decisions in Lin and Guo as establishing "a modicum of consistency."

The 2nd Circuit has expressed some discomfort with its recent approach to these cases. In another case involving a Chinese asylum seeker, decided last month, the court asked the BIA to decide, as a matter of policy, whether having two children was enough alone to support an asylum application based on fear of sterilization.

END

Wichita Eagle (KS)

November 7, 2006

Creekstone answers USDA in court over mad cow testing

BY PHYLLIS JACOBS GRIEKSPOOR, The Wichita Eagle

Creekstone Farms Premium Beef has answered the U.S . Department of Agriculture's court documents opposing the company's motion for summary judgment in its lawsuit againstUSDA.

Creekstone sued the USDA in March for refusing to allow the Arkansas City beef processor to voluntarily test all the cattle it slaughters for BSE, commonly called mad cow disease.

USDA officials have told the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that Creekstone's case is now largely moot because Japan and Korea have re-opened their borders to U.S. imports. Several countries had banned imports of U.S. beef because of concerns over mad cow.

The USDA maintains that it has the right to regulate private testing for BSE on the basis of a 100-year-old law intended to stop the sale of bogus hog cholera serums to Midwest farmers.

In its filing, Creekstone maintains that the USDA is using the law in a way it was never intended, not to protect ranchers from suppliers of bogus serums but to regulate competition among beef processors.

Creekstone's filing also maintains that the company is seeking to test 100 percent of its beef for BSE to enhance its brand reputation and to make it possible to sell beef for higher prices in both domestic and foreign markets.

The filing supports Creekstone's claim of serious economic harm both in the main document and in several friend of the court briefs filed in support of Creekstone's case.

Testing all the cattle processed at the Arkansas City plant would cost Creekstone about $6 million annually, but officials have contended that regaining lost markets would more than pay for the additional cost.

Creekstone, founded more than 10 years ago, produces premium Black Angus beef and, in addition to the export market, sells to retail outlets and restaurants. It also produces natural beef, with no added hormones or antibiotics.

Before the Japanese ban, sales to Japan accounted for about 30 percent of Creekstone's production.

END

Market Wire News

November 5, 2006

Press Release: United States Files Brief Supporting Utah's Right to Keep Children Safe From Adult-Oriented Electronic Messages; The CAN-SPAM Act Does Not Preempt State Child Protection Registry Laws

SALT LAKE CITY, UT -- (MARKET WIRE) -- 11/05/2006 -- The U.S. Department of Justice filed a Statement of Interest in "Free Speech Coalition v. Shurtleff," a case brought by a lobbying group for the pornography industry to overturn the Utah Child Protection Registry. The Statement, written on behalf of the United States, unequivocally supports the State of Utah and its right to implement a Child Protection Registry law.

The United States writes: "With this statement, the United States seeks to ensure that the preemption provision in the Controlling the Assault of Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing Act of 2003 ('the CAN-SPAM Act') is interpreted correctly so as to provide due regard for the traditional police power of the states, without depriving the preemption provision of its intended effect. Contrary to plaintiff's position, the CAN-SPAM Act does not preempt the Utah Child Protection Registry Act."

The United States also refutes the pornography industry's claim that the Utah Child Protection Registry violates the First Amendment: "This claim, if successful, would unjustifiably favor the dubious 'right' to send unsolicited sexually-oriented material directly and indiscriminately to personal e-mail addresses, heedless of whether they belong to adults or children, and regardless of the expressed wishes of the owner of the addresses, over (1) the fundamental right of individuals to decline to receive unwanted material (sexually-oriented and otherwise) and (2) the right of parents to direct the rearing of their children -- a right that the Supreme Court has recognized to be 'basic in the structure of our society.'"

The United States concludes its 21-page legal argument: "It is a virtue of our federal system that states can, in Justice Brandeis' words, provide the 'laboratories' for experiments that the federal government is not prepared to implement on a national basis. … The protection of the fundamental right of parents to protect their children from harmful sexually-oriented material is indisputably a worthy goal. At this preliminary stage, [the Free Speech Coalition] has not provided the Court with any basis for its request that the Court halt Utah's experiment in its tracks."

The Utah Child Protection Registry was enacted by the Utah legislature in March of 2004. The law went into effect in July of 2005. The law allows e-mail addresses, mobile phone numbers, instant messenger IDs, and fax numbers that may be accessible to children to be registered for free with the State of Utah. Once registered, the addresses become off-limits to solicitations for adult-oriented materials. To date, more than 170,000 electronic addresses have been protected under the law. More information about Utah's law may be found online at: www.kidsregistry.utah.gov. The State of Michigan maintains a similar program (www.Michigan.gov/protectmichild/) which has not been challenged.

The pornography industry filed suit in November of 2005 against both those officials in the State of Utah charged with enforcing the law, and also Unspam Registry Services, Inc., the Park City, Utah-based company that administers the laws on behalf of both Utah and Michigan. "The Department of Justice has clarified the CAN-SPAM Act and effectively closed the potential legal loophole pornographers were trying to use in order justify sending adult-oriented material to Utah's children," said Matthew Prince, CEO of Unspam Registry Services, Inc. "The United States has affirmed that even in the age of the Internet, states have the right to help parents keep unwanted material out of their homes."

The case is currently pending before Judge Dale Kimball in U.S. District Court. The first hearing in the case, to decide the pornography industry's motion for preliminary injunction, is scheduled for Wednesday, November 8, 2006 at 3:00pm in Room 220 of the Frank E. Moss Federal Courthouse.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, November 08, 2006 8:32 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, November 08, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061108.pdf

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Al Qaeda Plotter Sentenced In UK 2
FBI Disputes Report On Terrorism Prosecutions 2
CIA Seeks Information Limits On Al-Qaeda Suspects At Guantanamo 3
US, EU Bolster Antiterror Cooperation 3

Homeland Response:
WPost Says Security Background Checks Should Be Fast, Thorough 3

War News:
Iraqi Interior Ministry Aides Face Torture Charges 3
US Losses Rising In Iraq 3
Saddam Calls For Reconciliation 4
Maliki's "Resistance" To US Praised 4
Army Revamps Procedure For Classifying Information 4

Corporate Scandals:
Auditing Firms Call For Financial Reporting Reforms 4
FBI Raids Manhattan Offices Of Sky Capital LLC 5
Michigan Lawyer Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Investment Fraud 5

Criminal Law:
High Court To Consider Retroactive Application Of Sentencing Rule 5
Jury Convicts Pennsylvania Man Of Robbing Gun Store 6
FBI, Mississippi Police Investigating Copper Theft Ring 6
At Least Three States Investigating Acorn Voter Registrations 6
NYC School Administrator Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison For Internet Solicitation 6
French Court Clears Six Of Criminal Charges In 1992 Jetliner Crash 6
Inmates At Texas Prison On Hunger Strike To Protest Conditions 7

Civil Law:
Dana Seeks Court Approval For New Bonus Plan 7
Supreme Court To Hear "Partial-Birth" Abortion Case Today 7

Civil Rights:
FBI Investigating Allegations Of Voting Irregularities 8
Virginia Approves Amendment Banning Same-Sex Marriage, Civil Unions 10
Macon, GA, To Pursue City-County Consolidation 10
Texas Water District Challenges Voting Rights Act 11
WSJournal Says Vouchers Produce More Integrated Schools 11

Antitrust:
DOJ Seeks Information On Private Equity Firms' "Club Deals." 11
EU Approves Philips Purchase Of Intermagnetics 11
Visa Will Stay On The World Cup Sponsorship Sidelines 12

Environment:
Experts Agree Hurricane Season "Already Over." 12
Forest Service Welcomes Small, Preventive Forest Fires 12
High-Flying Missouri River Carp Post Threat To Fishermen 12
WSJournal Says SCOTUS Will Make Key Ruling With Duke Energy Pollution Case 13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Defeat Declared For Marijuana Measures In Colorado, Nevada, South Dakota 13
DEA Assists In Investigation Of Massachusetts Prescription Drug Theft 14
States Grapple With Meth Lab Cleanups 14
Report: USADA Puts Track Coaches On Notice About Doping Allegations 14
Investigation Of Purported Drug Kingpin In Pennsylvania Nets $2.2 Million 14
Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Explosives Charge 14

Tax:
Merck Discloses Tax Disputes With US, Canada 15

Congress-Administration:
Democrats Capture House; Senate Control Hinges On Virginia, Montana Races 15
Medicare Drug Benefit Struggles To Resolve Billing Errors 19
Members Of Congress Set To Receive Another Pay Raise 19
Dorgan Seen As Spokesman For Democrats' "Antimarket, Antibusiness Protectionism." 20
Ignatius Says Hayden Still Has Much To Accomplish At CIA 20

Other News:
Federal Reserve Reports Drop In Consumer Borrowing 20
Schwarzenegger Wins Re-Election 20
Report Says Oil Industry Has Barely Increased Investment In Production 21

Parties Said To Undermine Themselves With Negative Advertising 21
Academics Criticize Widespread Caricature Of Evangelicals 21
NYTimes Urges Spitzer To Pursue Ambitious Agenda 21
UN Still Deadlocked Over Iran Sanctions Resolution 21
Hughes' Internal Memo On Media Relations Leaked To WPost. 22
Border Fence Expected To Overshadow Bush-Calderon Meeting 22
State Department Official Named Head Of UN Food Program ... 22
Israel Withdraws Most Forces From Gaza Strip, But Fighting Continues 23
Ortega Declared Victor In Nicaragua 23
Panama Wins UN Security Council Seat 24
WTO Entry Said To Be No Cure-All For Vietnam's Economy 24
Aid Workers Say Some Returning Home To Darfur 24
EU-Turkey Relations Seen As Fraying 24

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 24

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 25

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al Qaeda Plotter Sentenced In UK. ABC World News (11/7, story 9, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In a London courtroom, chilling evidence of al Qaeda plans to attack US targets was made public for the first time at the sentencing of one of the conspirators. High-profile targets were in the crosshairs, part of what was supposed to be a second wave of post 9/11 terror designed to inflict mass casualties."

The CBS Evening News (11/7, story 10, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In London the sentence is life in prison for confessed al Qaeda terrorist Dhiren Barot. The judge also released chilling videotape shot by Barot as he plans attacks on the New York Stock Exchange and other targets in this country."

NBC Nightly News (11/7, story 8, 2:15, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Five months before the 9/11 attacks, al Qaeda terror planners shot this video of potential targets. Prominent financial buildings in New York City. At one point the camera tilts over and zooms in on the World Trade Center as the photographer imitates the sound of an explosion. When police found this video in London two years ago, alarmed US authorities raised the terror threat level in several cities. Today, it's man who led the US surveillance operation for al Qaeda, Dherin Barot, was sentenced to prison." Peter Clarke, Scotland Yard: "What he wanted to do was collapse those buildings with everybody inside them. The destruction is almost unimaginable. The scale of the carnage would be immense."

The New York Times (11/8, Cowell, 1.21M) reports Barot was "said by the police to have been the most senior figure of Al Qaeda brought to trial in Britain. The sentence he received was one of the longest handed down in recent years, reflecting claims by British counterterrorism officers that they had thwarted major conspiracies when they arrested him in August 2004, after he made detailed observations to plan synchronized attacks in New York, Newark, London and Washington, D.C." Barot's "plans for attacks in the United States were put on hold after the Sept. 11 attacks, and he began to focus on Britain. He planned attacks using so-called dirty bomb radiation devices and the detonation of a subway train under the River Thames."

The Washington Post (11/8, A16, Jordan, 748K) reports Barot, "a former airline ticket clerk and Muslim convert, was arrested in London in 2004 and pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit mass murder." His "sentence provides the possibility of parole after 40 years. According to prosecutors who read from Barot's notes and computer files, Barot was pleased by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and planned to kill hundreds, if not thousands, of people in the United States and Britain to create 'another memorable black day for the enemies of Islam.' Concern about his plots led President Bush to heighten security alerts and tighten security at financial buildings in the Northeast in 2004. British police seized documents that included detailed drawings of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and other buildings."

FBI Disputes Report On Terrorism Prosecutions. The Washington Times (11/8, Seper, 88K) reports, "The FBI rejected as 'inaccurate' a report by a research organization that said federal prosecutors turned down the vast majority of the international terrorism cases brought by the bureau during the first nine months of fiscal 2006." The Syracuse University Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse analysis "said the percentage of FBI referrals involving suspected terrorists that were rejected by Justice Department lawyers in the past few years has been generally increasing and reached a peak of 87 percent in fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30." However, the FBI said in a statement, "It is astonishing that TRAC continues to present statistics that demonstrate a fundamental misunderstanding of the basic principles on how federal investigations and prosecutions work."

DOJ_NMG_0091775

CIA Seeks Information Limits On Al-Qaeda Suspects At Guantanamo. The Miami Herald (11/8, Rosenberg) reports, "Even as 14 top al Qaeda suspects are in U.S. military custody, the CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around the high-value detainees now held at the Guantánamo Bay detention center, including alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed." The Herald continues, "The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton, in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Guantánamo captive Majid Khan, one of the 14." The Herald adds, "The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called 'black sites,' out of reach of the International Red Cross, are national security secrets. … Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extra-judicial detention of her client, to 'conceal illegal or embarrassing Executive conduct.'" The Herald notes, "Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he is linked to a series of unhatched plots: to blow up gas stations in the United States, to poison U.S. water supplies and to assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. … It is not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links; and he has so far not been charged with a crime."

US, EU Bolster Antiterror Cooperation. AFP (11/8) reports, "The United States and the European Union have created a group to bolster cooperation in the battle against terrorism and other crime-fighting initiatives. … 'We decided to establish a high-level contact group, not to carry out a bureaucratic exercise, but to try to identify how our common values, our common principles, can be translated to common proposals,' European Justice Commissioner Franco Frattini told reporters here Monday. … 'We need a positive spirit of cooperation, ... not focus on divisions and different approaches,' added Frattini, who was at the center of tense negotiations with Washington last month regarding the transfer of airline passenger data." AFP adds, "For his part, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the creation of a contact group 'will improve the cooperation between prosecutors in the United States and prosecutors and magistrates in EU member states, and it will enhance our ability to fight international crime.' … Gonzales said such cooperation has already taken place on a case-by-case basis when states' laws have allowed officials to share pertinent information in criminal cases, but he would not specify what types of information would be shared more freely under the new agreement."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

WPost Says Security Background Checks Should Be Fast, Thorough. The Washington Post (11/8, A26, 748K) editorializes, "Anywhere from 900,000 to 1.8 million workers will leave the government in the next six years. But according to a recent report from the Government Accountability Office, the government isn't filling positions that require security background checks fast enough -- and the delay is costing federal agencies money and talent." Meanwhile, "The Post's Stephen Barr reported last week that the Bush administration appears to be in danger of violating the 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act, which stipulates that 80 percent of applications for federal security clearances must be completed in an average of 120 days by Dec. 17. The GAO warns that such delays may increase costs and pose risks to national security." The Post states, "Competent background checks are ultimately more valuable than fast ones, but there is no reason the government can't have both."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Interior Ministry Aides Face Torture Charges. ABC World News (11/7, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For the first time since the fall of Baghdad, the government of Iraq is charging Iraqi police with torture. The Interior Ministry has charged 57 of its employees, including a police general, with torturing hundreds of detainees at a Baghdad prison."

The New York Times (11/8, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Some of the 55 Interior Ministry employees charged with torturing prisoners at a detention center in eastern Baghdad remain free, even though arrest warrants for them were issued as long as two months ago. ... While Western officials and some Iraqi officials say [Interior Minister] Bolani has already gone much further than his predecessors, they worry that he lacks enough political support to conduct all the necessary purges, particularly at the ministry's upper levels."

US Losses Rising In Iraq. UPI (11/7, Sieff) reports in a bleak article, "Insurgents and militias in Iraq are continuing to inflict significantly higher rates of casualties per day on US forces. ... Therefore, 71 U.S. soldiers were killed during the 22 days from Oct. 16 through Nov. 6, at an average rate of just below 3.23 per day. ... Also, if the even higher rate of wounded casualties of the Sept. 19-Sept. 27 period is factored in, the rate of U.S. wounded has now been running as high, or higher, than the seven day July 'spike' for seven weeks in succession. These figures too bear witness to a deteriorating and widening war."

DOJ_NMG_0091776

ABC World News (11/7, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "An American soldier has been killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad. That brings the death toll in the first week of November, to 19."

Saddam Calls For Reconciliation. Coverage of Saddam's court appearance after his death sentence noted his changed demeanor, coming after a truculent reaction to the sentence. The CBS Evening News (11/7, story 9, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "From overseas tonight a call for peace and forgive forgiveness in Iraq. Saddam Hussein's former second in command called on Baath Party leaders to end their attacks and Saddam himself called on Iraqis, and Kurds to forgive, reconcile and shake hands. He was back in court as testimony resumed at his second genocide trial. Two days ago at his first trial, Saddam was sentenced to death by hanging."

The Chicago Tribune (11/7, Daragahi, 623K) reports a "subdued Saddam Hussein, already sentenced to death in a human rights trial that concluded Sunday, walked into a courtroom again today and called on warring Iraqis outside to let bygones be bygones." Hussein said, "I call upon all Iraqis, Arabs and Kurds, to forgive, reconcile, and shake hands." The Tribune adds Hussein and "six other defendants face charges of crimes against humanity for their role in orchestrating the 1988 Anfal campaign, in which Iraqi forces attempted to crush a Kurdish rebellion in the north by destroying countryside villages that harbored anti-government guerrillas." Hussein and "two other co-defendants already face the death penalty for crimes against humanity for their roles in targeting the Shiite village of Dujayl. That case is subject to an automatic appellate review which begins in no later than four weeks."

USA Today (11/8, Jervis, 2.27M) calls him "somber," reporting, "Saddam has often used his appearances in court as a platform to make speeches, attempting to divert attention from the charges he faces and rally public opinion."

The Washington Post (11/8, Anderson, 748K) calls him "subdued," adding that he "took an active role in his trial Tuesday, minus the theatrical bluster and tirades that have marked many of his other court appearances."

The New York Times (11/8, Burns, 1.21M) reports that he had become "a courteous arguer of legal points who seemed to have put his tempestuous performance on Sunday aside so as to concentrate on his continuing legal battles. ... Court officials have said they expect the case to last well into next year, possibly into the spring or summer. But the question now is whether Mr. Hussein will live to see its conclusion — or, as Iraqi officials say is now more likely, be taken to the gallows weeks or even months before the Anfal verdicts are delivered." Initial plans to hold a "series of trials" of Saddam have given way to the "worsening war. Senior Iraqi officials, including the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, believe that Mr. Hussein, alive, remains a potent rallying point for Sunni insurgents fighting American troops and the American-backed, Shiite-led government."

The AP (11/8, Salaheddin, Reid) reports on the "somber and subdued" Saddam, adding, "Saddam's goal in making the statement was unclear. However, the remarks followed at least two other public declarations by Saddam in recent weeks in which he urged national unity — perhaps to secure a more favorable place in history or to encourage contacts between the Americans and his supporters."

Maliki's "Resistance" To US Praised. In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/8, 1.21M), CSIS scholar Frederick Barton writes, "American authorities view Mr. Maliki's resistance as worrisome. But it's just the opposite: his independence is our last best chance for a sustainable Iraq. For the first time, a real politician appears to be fighting for his life. ... The table is now set for the prime minister to demand the phased withdrawal of United States forces from Iraq. In taking that single bold step, Mr. Maliki will do more to develop a political base than any recent Iraqi leader. ... The United States has suggested in the past that if the Iraqi government invited us to leave, we would oblige. We must prepare ourselves for this event."

Army Revamps Procedure For Classifying Information. The Washington Post (11/8, Pincus, 748K) reports, "U.S. Army intelligence has developed a new blueprint for standardizing the way national security information is classified, recognizing that determining whether a particular document is 'confidential' or 'top secret' is ultimately up to the judgment of individuals, according to a memo distributed last month by Lt. Gen. John F. Kimmons, the Army's deputy chief of staff. ... The comments offer a rare view of one service's methods for classifying information at a time of debate over government openness."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Auditing Firms Call For Financial Reporting Reforms. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, C3, Reilly) reports, "The heads of the world's biggest accounting firms want investors and regulators to consider new ways of reporting financial information and clamping down on fraud, even as companies protest increased costs related to corporate overhauls." The Journal continues, "In a paper to be released today at a public-policy conference in Paris, chief executives of the six biggest accounting firms suggest considering whether companies should be subject to forensic audits specifically designed to root out fraud every three or five years, whether stock exchanges should require companies to randomly undergo these tests, or if investors should choose the intensity of the audit they want for a company." The Journal adds, "The heads of PricewaterhouseCoopers, Deloitte & Touche, Ernst & Young, KPMG, Grant Thornton and BDO Seidman say they hope their proposals will kick off a debate over what investors should expect from an audit in terms of fraud detection. The firms have long contended that while standard audits are designed to detect errors that could lead to fraud, the checks can't pick up all corporate wrongdoing. … But many investors believe auditors' main job is to detect fraud and that the firms failed miserably by not catching the huge corporate scandals that rocked markets earlier this decade. And any discussion of additional audit requirements is sure to raise the ire of companies who claim that new internal-control rules in the U.S. are already an unnecessarily costly burden."

DOJ_NMG_0091777

The Financial Times (11/8, Jopson) reports, "Heads of the 'big four' accounting firms and two others plan to say the financial reporting model of the 20th century has become redundant. … PwC, Deloitte, KPMG and Ernst & Young will call for static quarterly financial statements to be replaced by real-time, internet-based reporting encompassing a wider range of performance measures." The Times adds, "With Grant Thornton and BDO, the firms are seeking to provoke regulators and policy-makers. There is rising anger over the cost and perceived irrelevance of much financial reporting. The proposed changes are likely to meet resistance from companies and scepticism from some market watchdogs." The Times notes, "The wave of corporate scandals that began with Enron's collapse in 2001 sparked a raft of regulatory changes. Most, including the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, attempted to shore up the reporting model rather than create a new one."

The New York Times (11/8, Norris) reports, "In a report, the executives said that they supported efforts to standardize accounting and auditing standards around the world and that eventually, 'a new business reporting model' should be developed that would provide better financial information more rapidly. … But while the report, entitled 'Serving Global Capital Markets and the Global Economy,' offered little detail in that area, it was most detailed in its warnings that auditor liability needed to be restricted and in mounting the arguments for that outcome. … It did not offer specific proposals on how liability could be restricted while continuing to protect investors if auditors failed to do a conscientious job. Instead, it pointed to a restriction on auditor liability as being essential to solve many problems of the industry, and suggested that if investors were worried about fraud, they should be willing to pay for more detailed and more expensive audits than those prepared now."

FBI Raids Manhattan Offices Of Sky Capital LLC. Dow Jones/AP (11/8, Remond) reports, "Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided the Manhattan offices of brokerage firm Sky Capital LLC Monday. A person answering the telephone at Sky Capital Tuesday said that Chief Executive Ross Mandell had no comment on the matter. FBI special agents executed a search warrant at Sky and left with boxes of documents, according to a person familiar with the matter. The probe appears related to share offerings to foreign investors."

Michigan Lawyer Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Investment Fraud. The Detroit News (11/2, Egan) reported US District Judge Victoria Roberts last week "sentenced a Northville lawyer who defrauded friends and neighbors of millions of dollars to five years and four months in federal prison." Roberts "rejected testimony from an expert witness who said Charles G. Mady was a pathological gambler who played the commodities market instead of the slot machines and was not fully responsible for his actions. Roberts sentenced Mady…at the top of the federal sentencing guidelines range for embezzlement, and ordered him to pay about $8.5 million in restitution to his victims." The News noted, "The court heard from victims who said they trusted Mady and lost millions of dollars while he sent them statements showing their investments were increasing in value. Some even paid taxes on income they thought they had earned, while they were losing money."

CRIMINAL LAW:

High Court To Consider Retroactive Application Of Sentencing Rule. USA Today (11/8, Biskupic) reports, "A lawyer for a convicted rapist seeking to cut his client's prison time urged the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday to retroactively apply its 2004 decision that limited judges' discretion in sentencing." USA continues, "A decision, which could affect thousands of criminal cases, might clarify complicated sentencing standards and affect when convicts are able to appeal their cases based on any favorable high court ruling that comes after their trial." USA adds, "The 2004 ruling (Blakely v. Washington) said that judges cannot boost a defendant's sentence based on factors, such as cruelty, that were not determined by a jury. The court said the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial requires that any fact essential to a defendant's prison time be proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt. The decision has become part of a series of court cases bolstering the role of the jury. … Until the justices started down this path, trial judges had regularly enhanced a defendant's time behind bars based on weapons, drugs or other factors that the judge determined made the crime worse. The court's trend has spawned uncertainty in federal and state criminal systems, and a new generation of disputes is before the justices." USA notes, "Tuesday's case tested whether the rule of Blakely should be applied retroactively to convicts who were sentenced before 2004 but whose appeals were not yet over. … The Justice Department urged the court not to apply the 2004 rule to past cases. It argues that the decision merely altered criminal procedure and did not rise to the level of a 'watershed' rule affecting the fundamental fairness of a trial."

DOJ_NMG_0091778

The AP (11/8) reports, "At issue is whether a 2004 ruling that limits a judge's discretion in sentencing should apply to older cases. … A Washington state judge sentenced Lonnie Lee Burton in 1998 for rape of a 15-year-old boy, robbery and burglary. Defendants convicted of multiple crimes ordinarily receive sentences that run concurrently, but the judge added together prison time Burton could have received for each crime to form the lengthy sentence." The AP adds, "Eighteen states joined Washington in asking the court to refrain from applying the ruling to older cases, saying that to do otherwise 'would potentially open a staggering and immeasurable number of sentences' to challenges." The AP adds, "The 2004 decision in a case that also came from Washington held that a defendant's constitutional right to a jury trial forbids a judge from deciding facts that add to a prison sentence. … Burton's lawyer, Stanford University law professor Jeffrey Fisher, told justices that the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was wrong to conclude that the 2-year-old decision was not retroactive. … Justices appeared more concerned Tuesday with procedural issues that could doom the case rather than the larger issue of retroactivity."

Jury Convicts Pennsylvania Man Of Robbing Gun Store. The Easton Express-Times (NJ/PA) (11/8, Flanagan) reports, "A federal jury in Philadelphia on Tuesday convicted a man of robbery and related gun charges for sticking up a Palmer Township gun dealer in 2004, according to the U.S. Justice Department." The Express-Times continues, "Under federal gun laws, Frank Berryman of Philadelphia faces a maximum sentence of life in prison. He is scheduled to be sentenced in federal court in February. … 'We sought the conviction and the jury returned a guilty verdict on all counts,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Henson said after the verdict." The Express-Times adds, "Records say Berryman left his home in the 900 block of Flanders Road on March 9 and traveled with three other men to John's Gun and Tackle Room at 2604 Freemansburg Ave. While Berryman, 27, was inside, one accomplice waited in the car, and two others waited outside the shop, authorities said."

FBI, Mississippi Police Investigating Copper Theft Ring. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (11/7) reported, "The FBI and Hinds County Sheriff's Department are asking for the public's assistance in locating five Jackson residents who are suspecting of stealing copper and other metals." Larry McGee, Shirley McGee, Herbert Smith, Casey Torry and Jerry Lee James "have outstanding warrants for receipt of stolen goods, according to the FBI. They are suspected of being in a scheme that involves stealing, receiving, selling and transporting metals across state lines." The Clarion-Ledger notes, "A reward of $1,000 is being offered for information leading to the location and arrest of each individual, according to authorities."

At Least Three States Investigating Acorn Voter Registrations. The Wall Street Journal's John Fund (11/8) writes that Acorn, "a feisty, union-backed" activist group, "after years of scandal involving its election efforts and misuse of government grants…is finally coming under scrutiny, with four of its Kansas City, Mo., workers under indictment for submitting false voter registrations. (As of this writing, all are at large.) Other states -- including Pennsylvania and Maryland -- are also conducting probes." St. Louis election officials "were so inundated with bogus Acorn-generated voter registrants that they mailed a letter to 5,000 registrants, requesting the recipients to contact them. Fewer than 40 responded."

NYC School Administrator Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison For Internet Solicitation. The Poughkeepsie Journal (11/7, Fisher-Hertz) reported US District Court Judge Colleen McMahon on Monday sentenced former New York City assistant principal Steven M. Rubinstein to 10 years in prison" for trying to solicit young girls over the Internet." Rubinstein "was arrested by FBI agents last spring following an eight-month sting operation targeting would-be sexual predators. A search of Rubinstein's computers revealed images of child pornography. Federal investigators said Rubinstein had sexually explicit conversations with two undercover agents who were posing as 13-year-old girls." Assistant US Attorney Cynthia Dunne "noted there was evidence Rubinstein had used a computer at his school office to engage in some of the chats."

French Court Clears Six Of Criminal Charges In 1992 Jetliner Crash. The New York Times (11/8, Clark, Phillips) reports, "A French court on Tuesday cleared five former aviation officials and an ex-Airbus executive of all criminal charges linked to the crash of a passenger jet in the mountains near the German border almost 15 years ago." The Times continues, "The six men went on trial in the northeastern city of Colmar in May on charges of involuntary manslaughter in the 1992 crash of an A320 owned by Air Inter, a now-defunct unit of Air France, in which 87 people died. The defendants faced up to two years in prison." The Times adds, "The verdict on Tuesday was greeted by the aviation industry as a victory in its effort to decriminalize air crashes. … The trial gained a high profile partly because the industry decided to push back against legal systems around the world that had increasingly sought to assign criminal responsibility in crashes. … The defendants were Bernard Ziegler, 73, who was technical director of Airbus at the time; Pierre-Henri Gourgeon, 60, then the head of the French civil aviation agency, DGAC, and now chief financial officer of Air France-KLM; Claude Frantzen, 69, head of training at DGAC; two former Air Inter officials; and Eric Lammari, 50, an air traffic controller."

DOJ_NMG_0091779

Inmates At Texas Prison On Hunger Strike To Protest Conditions. The New York Times (11/7, Blumenthal) reports from Houston, "Likening themselves to prisoners at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo Bay, a dozen inmates on death row in Texas have staged hunger strikes over the last month to protest what they call abusive conditions, including 23 hours a day of isolation in their cells." The Times continues, "The Texas Department of Criminal Justice said that the first inmates began refusing food Oct. 8 and that two were still on hunger strikes in the Polunsky prison unit in Livingston, about 45 miles east of the execution unit in Huntsville. The Polunsky Unit houses death-row inmates until their executions. As of Tuesday, one inmate had missed 35 consecutive meals and one 17 meals, but no one has yet been force-fed, said a department spokeswoman, Michelle Lyons." The Times adds, "Two other prisoners who had not eaten since Oct. 8 began taking food Oct. 27 and Nov. 4, Ms. Lyons said, and others abandoned their protests after a short time. … But Vickie McCuistion, program coordinator of the Texas Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, said some inmates had been reported as eating when they were still refusing food. Ms. Lyons said that a prisoner needed to miss nine meals to be considered on hunger strike and that some who had refused meals had eaten snacks at visiting sessions." The Times notes, "The protests are the latest disruptions at the nation's busiest execution complex, where 23 inmates have been put to death by lethal injection so far this year and another is scheduled to die Wednesday. Although California leads the nation in prisoners on death row, Texas executes them far more frequently, with 378 put to death since capital punishment was reintroduced in 1982. Virginia is second with 97."

CIVIL LAW:

Dana Seeks Court Approval For New Bonus Plan. Dow Jones (11/8, Hopkins) reports, "Dana Corp. is pitching a toned-down version of an executive bonus plan that it hopes won't strike out with Judge Burton Lifland a second time." Dow Jones continues, "As part of an effort to entice senior managers to stay, Dana wants to pay Chief Executive Michael J. Burns up to $4.5 million during 2007 and up to $2.25 million in 2008, the company said in court papers Monday. … The payments are tied to reaching various benchmarks for earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation, amortization and restructuring costs." Dow Jones adds, "The plan is a step down from a previous proposal that entitled Burns to $9.1 million over the next few years, including a $6 million bonus once the auto-parts supplier emerged from bankruptcy protection. … Dana, of Toledo, Ohio, makes axles, frames and other large components for cars and commercial trucks and is highly dependent on General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. … The company is one of at least a half-dozen large U.S. auto-parts companies that have fallen into bankruptcy amid production cutbacks by the country's biggest auto makers. … The company said that under the new plan, five other top managers would share a pool of up to $3.18 million in 2007 and would be entitled to a pool of at least $1.59 million the year after. The company didn't disclose the benchmarks that would trigger payments." Dow Jones notes, "U.S. Trustee Diana G. Adams said Dana crossed the line in making the request because the Bankruptcy Code doesn't allow the court to offer advice on how to frame legal arguments."

Supreme Court To Hear "Partial-Birth" Abortion Case Today. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, A8, Bravin, 2.03M) reports, "Today, the Supreme Court will hear a Bush administration appeal to reinstate the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, a 2003 law struck down by lower courts because it included no exception for the woman's health. The partial-birth ban fits with a national strategy to impose greater restrictions on the procedure while deferring a direct challenge to Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that first located a right to abortion within the Constitution's privacy provisions. … Abortion foes feel confident that the federal partial-birth ban will pass muster with the required five justices. The question is whether the court will rule narrowly…or will use the opportunity to…significantly expand legislative authority to restrict abortion." The Christian Science Monitor (11/8, Richey, 58K) reports, "In their confirmation hearings last year, John Roberts and Samuel Alito sidestepped pointed questions about whether they would overturn abortion precedents. Now, a year later, the country is about to get some answers. … While the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act poses no direct threat to major abortion precedents like Planned Parenthood v. Casey and Roe v. Wade, activists on both sides of the debate are watching closely to see if the two federal ban cases - and new justices on the court - trigger a turning point in abortion jurisprudence permitting more rigorous regulations at the state and federal level."

DOJ_NMG_0091780

The Washington Post (11/8, A3, Lane, 748K) reports, "As the Supreme Court prepares for today's oral arguments on the federal 'partial birth' abortion ban, both sides are focusing on the same question: 'What will Kennedy do?' … The pivotal figure in the biggest Supreme Court abortion battle in half a decade is Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the 70-year-old centrist with an 18-year record of eclecticism on abortion and other social issues. Abortion rights advocates believe that, despite his past support of a state ban on the late-term procedure that opponents call 'partial birth,' he may now assume the moderating 'swing vote' role that retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor formerly played. Kennedy's performance may not only determine the fate of this federal abortion law but also foreshadow the overall balance of power on a court that is still defining itself after the addition of two conservatives picked by President Bush."

Insiders To Argue PBA Ban Before Supreme Court. The Legal Times (11/8, Mauro) reports, "When a high-stakes Supreme Court argument looms, litigants often turn to the heavy-hitting veterans of high court advocacy. Not so for the abortion rights groups who will be fighting the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 before the Court on Thursday." The Times continues, "When the pair of cases on the issue is called, staff attorneys Eve Gartner of Planned Parenthood and Priscilla Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights will rise to the occasion. It's Gartner's first high court argument and Smith's second, but their bosses are confident about sending them into the fray. … 'I didn't think about it for more than five seconds,' says Planned Parenthood's Roger Evans, who adds that Gartner is the first staff lawyer to argue before the high court for the organization, which has been party to many of the major abortion cases in history. 'She knows the issues better than anyone walking,' says Evans, noting that Gartner has handled the case from the beginning." The Times adds, "Same story from Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, who says Smith was the only lawyer considered. Smith represented Nebraska physician LeRoy Carhart, who sued the state for prohibiting him from performing certain types of abortions, all the way through district court and the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. 'The facts really matter in this case,' says Northup."

"Partial Birth" Abortions Equated With Infanticide. In an op-ed for USA Today (11/8, 2.27M) Jay Sekulow, chief counsel of the American Center for Law and Justice, writes, "There is no reason to keep partial-birth abortion legal. It's a gruesome, barbaric procedure that occurs partly outside the mother's body, typically by inserting scissors into the back of the baby's head. As several of the justices hearing the cases today have acknowledged, it's hard not to label this procedure 'infanticide.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Investigating Allegations Of Voting Irregularities. The AP (11/8, Sampson) reports, "The FBI said Tuesday that it is looking into complaints that callers tried to intimidate or confuse Virginia voters in the hard-fought race between GOP Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger Jim Webb. State Board of Elections Secretary Jean Jensen said her office had forwarded several reports to the FBI of voters receiving phone calls intended to discourage them from voting or directing them to the wrong polling place. … The FBI is checking the reports, agent Stephen Kodak Jr. said." The AP notes, "New Mexico Democrats have filed court complaints similar to those in Virginia, accusing GOP callers of providing voters with incorrect information on polling locations in Albuquerque. … In Ohio, a prosecutor also warned voters to be wary of fraudulent calls claiming that their voting precincts had been changed." USA Today (11/8, 9A, Hall, 2.27M) notes the Virginia investigation in its story about the Allen-Webb race, and the Washington Post (11/8, A29, Davenport, Barr, 748K) notes it in a story focusing on the lack of problems in the Maryland election. Meanwhile, CNN.com (11/7, Arena, 9:19 p.m.) reported on the FBI Virginia probe, based on broadcast reports during the day yesterday.

The AP (11/8, Hastings) reports, "Election Day was tainted by complaints of dirty tricks that led to FBI investigations in at least two states, with some voters reporting intimidating phone calls, misleading sample ballots and even an armed man outside a polling place. Nonetheless, poll watchers said voting across American went relatively well, despite machine malfunctions and long waits in some states." This AP story also notes the Virginia probe and adds, "In Indiana, the FBI was investigating allegations that a Democratic volunteer at a polling site in the college town of Bloomington was found with absentee ballots after counting had begun. … In Arizona, three men, one of them armed, stopped Hispanic voters and questioned them outside a Tucson polling place, according to voting monitors for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which photographed the incidents and reported them to the FBI."

The AP (11/8, Brunt) reports, "Poll closings and results were delayed in several counties and the FBI investigated possible ballot tampering in a crucial county as Indiana decided key races for Congress and the General Assembly. But the catastrophic Election Day that Democrats predicted because of Indiana's new voter ID law didn't come to pass, election officials said." The AP adds, "In Monroe County…state police, election officials and the FBI looked into allegations that a Democratic volunteer was found with unprocessed absentee ballots in her possession after the county began tallying absentee votes."

DOJ_NMG_0091781

The New York Daily News (11/8, Meek, 729K) reports, "The FBI yesterday was investigating reports of Election Day dirty tricks amid allegations of padlocked offices, cut phone lines, threats of arrest, "robo-calls" and hacked Web sites around the country. Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said there was no indication of widespread fraud, but FBI officials confirmed agents were probing several incidents. 'We'll look into these matters to see if there are any potential violations,' one FBI official said. Both Republicans and Democrats flung allegations, denials and counteraccusations."

Additionally, USA Today (11/8, 5A, Wolf, Gomez, 2.27M), the Wall Street Journal (11/8, A5, Kronholz, Conkey, Dreazen, 2.03M) and the Washington Post (11/8, A29, Davenport, Barr, 748K) note the FBI investigations in their stories focusing on the relatively few glitches at polling places across the country yesterday, despite the wide-spread use of new electronic voting machines.

Number Of Voting Rights Complaints Said To Be Low. CNN.com (11/8, Frieden) reports, "As polls began to close in the East, Justice Department officials said voter complaints to federal officials had been 'low' on Tuesday." CNN continues, "Fewer than 200 calls were received by the Civil Rights Division hotline in Washington, down from about 1,200 complaints received during the 2004 elections. … 'Nearly all of the civil rights and access problems dealt with minority language voting issues,' said one Justice Department official familiar with federal election monitoring. The official was unaware of any cases in which voters were denied the right to vote based on race or ethnicity." CNN adds, "A second Justice Department official described the number of voting access issues as 'low to normal.' … 'Every election there are always going to be problems, and there were some this time, but there was nothing really out of the ordinary,' the official said. … The officials asked not to be identified because the Justice Department does not comment officially on election-related issues." CNN notes, "Justice officials also described criminal fraud issues as relatively low. The officials confirmed there had been scattered complaints relating to alleged intentional acts directed at voters. Although they provided no specific numbers, they said the scope of such allegations were not out of the ordinary for recent election cycles. … 'It will take a day to sort out exactly what complaints were received,'one of the officials said. Justice Department officials would not comment on any specific problems that arose Tuesday."

Voting Irregularities Alleged In Detroit. WXYZ-TV, ABC 7, Detroit (11/8) reports, "With just a few hours before the polls close there are allegations of voting irregularities. Tuesday afternoon, the NAACP called for an emergency news conference in Detroit." WXYZ-TV continues, "The NAACP said they received approximately 74 complaints on their voter hotline by voters who believe they were registered, but were turned away at the polls because their names did not appear on the registration list. … Rev. Wendell Anthony, Detroit NAACP, said 'The constitution guarantees every American the right to vote and when you're one of the 74 and your vote is not counted, you have a problem. We in the NAACP have a responsibility; we have a duty to make certain that every vote counts. That's why we have monitors out, that's why we have challengers out. We have 108 lawyers out in every precinct in this city. That's why we cannot sit by and wait for a barrage of complaints to come in.'" WXYZ-TV adds, "The NAACP has also accused two people of posing as election officials in polling places. … Rev. Anthony said the election is too critical for voters to be turned away. The NAACP has filed complaints with the U.S. Justice Department."

House Democrats Seek Probe Of GOP Campaign Tactics. Bloomberg (11/8, Peterson) reports, "Two Democratic U.S. lawmakers accused Republicans of 'possibly illegal' campaign tactics, claiming they arranged automated, late-night telephone calls to spark voter anger against Democrats running in today's election." Bloomberg continues, "The so-called robo-calls may have violated federal and state laws, Representatives John Conyers and John Dingell, both of Michigan, said in a letter that urged the Justice Department, the Federal Election Commission and the Federal Communications Commission to investigate." Bloomberg adds, "The often-repeated calls were designed to 'generate anger' at Democratic candidates by leading voters to believe Democrats made them, the lawmakers said yesterday in the letter. With control of Congress on the line in today's voting, both parties are watching the other's last-minute campaign tactics. … 'In fact, the calls are being funded' by the National Republican Congressional Committee, 'which has reportedly provided $600,000 to fund this deception,' Conyers and Dingell wrote. … NRCC spokesman Ed Patru said the group wasn't associated with any illegal calls. There are 'hundreds of groups' from various political parties that could make such calls, he said."

DOJ, OPM Monitor Polling Places. Federal Computer Week (11/8, Hubler) reports, "The Justice Department has sent more that 500 federal observers and more than 350 other employees to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states to monitor today's midterm elections. The record-breaking effort partially reflects voters' concerns about the balloting process, namely the accuracy and functioning of electronic voting machines." FCW continues, "The number of federal workers dispersed for the election is more than double the total sent on Election Day 2002, the previous record for observers at a midterm election, according to a Nov. 6 Justice statement." FCW adds, "Since passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Justice has regularly sent observers and monitors around the country to protect election-related civil rights, the statement reads. This summer, President Bush signed the reauthorized Voting Rights Act, which protects Americans' rights to participate in the electoral process without discrimination. … Under the law, Justice is authorized to ask the Office of Personnel Management to send federal observers to areas that have been certified for coverage by a federal court or the attorney general. … Included among the 69 jurisdictions in 22 states where OPM observers and/or Justice employees are monitoring polling places today are: Chambers, Lee and Tuscaloosa counties in Alabama; Broward, Duval, Hillsborough, Osceola and Palm Beach countries in Florida; Chicago and Cook County, Ill.; Boston and Springfield, Mass.; Bergen, Essex, Hudson, Middlesex and Salem counties in New Jersey; Kings, Queens, Richmond and Westchester counties in New York; and Cuyahoga County, Ohio."

DOJ_NMG_0091782

The Federal Times (11/8) reports, "The Justice Department deployed an unprecedented number of federal employees to monitor today's midterm election. More than 500 observers assigned by the Office of Personnel Management and more than 350 Justice employees were sent to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states." The Times continues, "The figures more than double the total sent on election day in 2002, which was the previous record for a midterm election, according to a department news release." The Times adds, "Under the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which President Bush reauthorized this summer, Justice can ask OPM to send federal observers to areas that have been certified for coverage by a federal court or the attorney general. … The observers and monitors will watch and record activities during voting hours at select polling locations. Justice's Civil Rights Division is coordinating the federal activities and contact with local election officials. In addition, the department has deployed observers and monitors who speak Spanish, Arabic, and a variety of Asian and Native American languages."

Government Executive (11/8, Shoop) reports, "OPM has a pool of 900 intermittent employees who are called into service as monitors on an as-needed basis, according to Nancy Randa, OPM's deputy associate director for human resources products and services, who testified on the agency's role before a House subcommittee in November 2005. The pool includes federal retirees, students, private sector workers and full-time employees of other federal agencies. … The observers 'serve as neutral monitors, who do not intervene if there are violations,' Randa testified. 'They only watch, listen and record events that occur at particular polling sites on election days.' They participate in one-day classroom training sessions prior to serving, and attend pre-briefing sessions the day before elections."

Local Television. KTVU- TV San Francisco, Oakland, San Jose (11/7, 7:00 a.m.) broadcasts, "The Feds are sending observers to polling sites in 22 states, more than double the amount in 2002. We talked about it with Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez who said they are there to prevent voter fraud and intimidation and other problems. Not gonna guarantee we have perfect elections. We won't have perfect elections going forward." This story received moderate coverage all across the country in both major and smaller cities. Some examples include:

NC8- TV Washington, DC (11/7, 8:00 a.m.) broadcasts, "The Justice Department says it will help state and local officials make sure that today's voting is honest. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the department will have monitors at polling stations across the country to watch for voter fraud or anyone denied voting rights."

WSB- TV Atlanta (11/7, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasts, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the monitors are there to prevent voter fraud, intimidation and other problems. We're not going to guarantee we'll have a perfect election. Problems do arise but our jobs for those of us is to ensure we try to minimize the problems to the extent we can."

WKRN- TV Nashville (11/7, 5:30 a.m.) broadcasts, "The Justice Department says it will help state and local officials make sure that today's voting is honest. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says they'll have monitors around the country to watch for voter fraud or disenfranchisement."

WAPT- TV Jackson, KFOX- TV El Paso, WBTW- TV Florence, Myrtle Beach, KELO- TV Sioux Falls, Mitchell, KAUZ- TV Wichita Falls, Lawton, KPLC- TV Lake Charles, KMSB- TV Tucson, WWL- TV New Orleans also reported the same story starting from 11/6 evening news at 9:00 p.m.

Virginia Approves Amendment Banning Same-Sex Marriage, Civil Unions. The Washington Post (11/8, A46, Jenkins, 748K) reports, "A constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and civil unions in Virginia passed easily yesterday, adding the state to more than 20 others that have prohibited the practice. The measure was strongly backed in all parts of the state except for Northern Virginia, where a majority of voters appeared to agree with the argument that the amendment would affect all unmarried couples, not just gay ones."

Macon, GA, To Pursue City-County Consolidation. The Macon Telegraph (11/8, Fain) reports, "Macon-Bibb County consolidation took a small step forward, the City Council approved a new method for collecting garbage fees and city officials increased the 911 surcharge for cellular telephones today." The Telegraph continues, "During today's Macon City Council meeting, the council voted 9-6 to push toward unification of the Bibb County and city governments and ask the Middle Georgia Regional Development Center to draw new voting district lines. … 'This is the time for consolidating our governments,' said Councilwoman Filomena Mullis, who sponsored the resolution. … 'From what I'm hearing in the community, a vote would not pass,' countered Councilwoman Elaine Lucas." The Telegraph notes, "There are several more steps before consolidation could become a reality. The Bibb County Commission also is expected to take up the issue before the RDC draws new voting districts for a proposed nine-member, countywide governing body. Then the commission and council would vote again on those districts, and the state Legislature would need to approve them. The U.S. Justice Department would have to sign off on the districts before a countywide referendum would be held. Similar consolidation efforts have been rejected in Bibb County."

DOJ_NMG_0091783

Texas Water District Challenges Voting Rights Act. The Austin (TX) American-Statesman (11/8, Toohey) reports, "Four years ago, a water utility in Northwest Austin wanted to move its polling place out of a garage but was required to ask the federal government for permission and wound up paying $1,250 in legal fees. … Now, in response, the Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1 has filed a lawsuit against the Department of Justice that could wind up eliminating portions of the Voting Rights Act." The American-Statesman continues, "The lawsuit, filed Aug. 4, challenges the federal government's authority to require certain areas with a history of discrimination at the polls, including Texas, to get 'preclearance' before changing aspects of how they conduct their elections. … The lawsuit says that the district should be released from the requirement because it has no history of racial discrimination and that if not exempted on those grounds, it should be released because the requirement is unconstitutional." The American-Statesman adds, "The lawsuit has the support of people who say the provision is a holdover from a bygone era and does not protect the rights of minority voters. … The lawsuit has alarmed civil-rights and minority-rights groups, who say all portions of the Voting Rights Act are still necessary. The act was passed in 1965 but was re-authorized by Congress this summer, an action that advocacy groups point to as proof of its relevancy. … The case is now before a U.S. District Court in Washington, although many expect it to go to the Supreme Court."

WSJournal Says Vouchers Produce More Integrated Schools. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, 2.03M) writes in an editorial, "One frequent, and nasty, argument against school vouchers is that they will end up resegregating public schools." Yet "the truth is the opposite." In contrast to claims by the Urban League and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, a new study by the Milton and Rose Friedman Foundation found that in 2003 in Milwaukee, voucher schools were "13% more racially diverse," while those in Cleveland were "18% more diverse, than their public school counterparts." So, "vouchers increase racial mixing in schools."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Seeks Information On Private Equity Firms' "Club Deals." The Financial Times (11/8, Guerrera, Masters, Politi) reports, "The US antitrust authorities are seeking comprehensive information on all 'club deals' involving five of the world's largest private equity firms since 2003 – a sign that the informal probe into alleged collusion in the buyout industry is broader than expected." The Times continues, "News of the details of the investigation, which began in September with a letter from the Department of Justice to the buyout funds, will quash widespread speculation the government is focusing only on a handful of recent high-profile deals such as last year's $15bn takeover of Hertz rent-a-car business." The Times adds, "People who have seen the letter, sent to Carlyle Group, Clayton Dubilier & Rice, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Merrill Lynch and Silver Lake Partners, said it requested a list of all the documents related to consortium deals since January 2003. The authorities are also believed to be seeking e-mail communications. … E-mails have proven useful to investigators in recent financial probes because they can provide real-time evidence of a person's intent to commit a crime - a crucial element in prosecutors' decision on whether to bring charges against individuals. … Contrary to previous speculation, which focused only on successful deals, the letter is believed to be asking for information on all bids by groups of buyout funds for US companies, even when the consortium ended up on the losing side." The Times notes, "The investigation has shaken a buyout sector that had been revelling in the ability to raise unprecedented amounts of capital from investors and exploit favourable conditions in the debt and equity markets to clinch ever-larger deals. … However, the breadth of the request suggests that the authorities may take a long time to narrow the focus of the probe. Often government investigators will come back with a grand jury subpoena seeking more detailed information if they believe they are on the track of something specific, lawyers familiar with the process said. But they cautioned that not every investigation ever reaches that stage."

EU Approves Philips Purchase Of Intermagnetics. The AP (11/8) reports, "EU regulators gave Royal Philips Electronics NV the go-ahead Tuesday for its euro1 billion (US$1.26 billion) purchase of a major supplier, U.S. magnet maker Intermagnetics General Corp., that will boost its medical equipment unit." The AP continues,

DOJ_NMG_0091784

"The European Commission said an investigation found the tie-up would not damage competition in Europe, after examining whether the new company would be able to control the supply of radio-frequency coils to Philips' rivals that also make magnetic resonance imaging, or MRI, systems. … 'The market investigation has shown that these risks are minimal, mainly due to economic incentives and the presence of several other suppliers of coils for MRI systems,' regulators said. … They found that MRI system manufacturers could also make coils themselves if they had to, so Philips would not be in a position to cause antitrust problems." The AP adds, "Philips, the second largest maker of medical equipment globally after General Electric Co., said in June it expects the acquisition will win customers in the short run, and improve the company's supply chain and development of new products in the long run. … Philips offered US$27.50 (euro21.87) per share for Intermagnetics in a bid unanimously supported by the company's boards."

Visa Will Stay On The World Cup Sponsorship Sidelines. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, C3, Sidel) reports, "Visa International will have to stay on the sidelines during a legal tussle over its sponsorship of the World Cup soccer tournament." The Journal continues, A U.S. appeals court has denied an attempt by the payments network to join litigation between rival MasterCard Inc. and the Federation Internationale de Football Association about the way the sponsorship was awarded last spring. The decision, handed down late Monday, upholds a September decision by the U.S. District Court in New York, which is handling the case." The Journal adds, "MasterCard has sued the soccer association, known as FIFA, for awarding the coveted eight-year sponsorship to Visa. MasterCard, which has sponsored the tournament and other World Cup events for the past 16 years, contends that it had right of first refusal for a new pact. … Although it wasn't named in the MasterCard case, Visa sought to join the litigation, because it will be affected by the outcome. … 'While it is true that our request to join the suit has been denied, we are confident that our contract rights will be honored, and look forward to activating this sponsorship in January 2007,' Visa said in a statement."

ENVIRONMENT:

Experts Agree Hurricane Season "Already Over." USA Today (11/8, 3A, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "The quietest hurricane year in a decade officially ends in three weeks, but meteorologists and disaster managers on the Gulf and Florida coasts agree that the season is already over. 'We dodged a bullet this year,' says meteorologist Gerry Bell of the National Weather Service's Climate Prediction Center. 'If there was ever a time that we needed a break, we got one.' … In Louisiana, where complete recovery from hurricanes Katrina and Rita is years away, 'the longer the hurricanes miss us, the better off we'll be,' says Mark Smith of the state emergency preparedness office. 'No one has ever been as prepared for the worst as we were this year. Thank God we didn't have to touch on that.'"

Forest Service Welcomes Small, Preventive Forest Fires. USA Today (11/8, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports, "In the worst year for wildfires in nearly half a century, it may seem odd to celebrate how well some of them burned. But the Payette National Forest in central Idaho is doing just that. 'It was a real long season, but we got some nice fire effects,' says Sam Hescock, a fire management officer on the 2.3-million-acre forest where more than 150 fires this summer and fall burned about 70,000 acres. … Hescock's satisfaction reflects a shift in how the federal government approaches fire management. That shift began in earnest a decade ago and is gaining momentum. Land managers at the U.S. Forest Service and other agencies are becoming more comfortable co-existing with fire rather than reflexively trying to stomp it out with all the men and materiel at their command. Their reasoning is that fire is a natural part of the landscape that clears out underbrush and small trees and creates forest openings in a mosaic pattern. Such conditions help keep small fires from growing into the kind of large, catastrophic blazes that have become increasingly common in recent years."

High-Flying Missouri River Carp Post Threat To Fishermen. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, A1) reports from Columbia, MO, "Fishermen used to joke that when the fish are biting on the Missouri River, 'they're practically jumping into the boat.' … To Duane Chapman, this isn't funny any more. Almost every time he goes out in his 22-foot skiff, fish jump in or over his boat. He has been repeatedly battered by 20-pound flying fish, which he compares to slimy bowling balls. Not long ago, an incoming fish slammed into the boat's throttle, sending the skiff roaring into a mud bank." The Journal continues, "These fish -- called Asian silver carp -- were imported to the U.S. in the 1960s. Now, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is taking aim at the species. It's proposing a ban on the importation and interstate transportation of the fish, saying, 'Silver carp have leaped into moving boats injuring people and damaging equipment.'" The Journal adds, "Mr. Chapman and other fish biologists, however, say more needs to be done. They believe only one biological mechanism can get rid of the carp: the American stomach. But convincing U.S. diners to eat these fish may be a challenge. … The skittish, torpedo-shaped carp reproduce faster than native fish and beat them out for food. They also have a peculiar habit: Upon hearing the rumble of a motorboat, or any other noise they deem strange, they leap as high as eight feet in the air, arcing into and around boats like silvery missiles. … The native habitat for the Asian silver carp is the Yangtze River in China. The fish were brought to the U.S. to help clean up algae and other microscopic wastes at fish farms and municipal waste-treatment plants. Some escaped into the Mississippi River and migrated to the Missouri and the Ohio rivers. Now, they inhabit the waters of 15 states, and experts worry the Great Lakes will be next."

DOJ_NMG_0091785

WSJournal Says SCOTUS Will Make Key Ruling With Duke Energy Pollution Case. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes that Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy "is shaping up to be one of the more important environmental law cases the U.S. Supreme Court has heard. Among the potential stakes: $100 billion (yes, billion) or more in redundant pollution controls at refineries and power plants around the country; the future of the market-based approach to environmental regulation; and, broadly, whether there are any limits on what federal agencies like the EPA can do with the powers delegated to them by Congress. The central issue is a set of rules dating back to the 1970s Clean Air Act known as New Source Review (NSR). … If the Supreme Court ends up siding with Duke Energy, don't be surprised to see headlines accusing it of making common cause with polluters. But the truth is this would be a victory for the rule of law. It would also help the country get on with a market-based approach to pollution control, which almost all honest observers acknowledge is more efficient anyway."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Defeat Declared For Marijuana Measures In Colorado, Nevada, South Dakota. In a story about voting around the nation, the AP (11/8) notes Colorado and Nevada voters "rejected measures that would have legalized possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by anyone 21 and older."

In a separate story the AP (11/8) reports, "Facing the second-longest ballot in Colorado history, voters also overwhelmingly rejected a proposal to legalize the possession of up to an ounce of marijuana, a proposal which Denver voters approved last year. Amendment 44 lost with 62% voting against it." The New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Washington Post, USA Today, Time magazine, and Greeley Colorado Tribune used a version of the AP story.

In Reno, the AP (11/8) writes that Nevadans "seemed poised to reject legalization of small amounts of marijuana. … Question 7 to legalize adult possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale was failing, 58 percent to 42 percent, in early returns." The Las Vegas Sun used this AP story.

The Denver Post (11/8) reports Mason Tvert, SAFER's campaign director, "argued through the election season that marijuana is a safer alternative to alcohol. On Tuesday, he said he knew that it would be a tough battle to change '75 years of marijuana prohibition overnight.' … Amendment 44 opponents were pleased Tuesday that the initiative failed, saying legalization would increase teen drug use."

The Rocky Mountain News (11/7) writes, "Even if it had passed, Amendment 44 wouldn't technically have made pot smoking legal in Colorado. It is still a violation of federal drug laws - though federal drug enforcement officials have said publicly they will not actively seek to arrest, try and convict users in possession of an ounce or less." Federal drug enforcement officials "said they feared drug traffickers would begin shipping more pot to Colorado because it would have been viewed as 'a drug tourist spot.' But Tvert argued that the current fines - a misdemeanor offense and a $100 ticket - show that the government doesn't really consider possession of an ounce of marijuana a serious problem anyway. 'If they did, they wouldn't have such light penalties,' he said."

The Rocky Mountain News (11/8) also writes that through Robert McGuire, spokesman for the Colorado Chapter of Save Our Society from Drugs, they "successfully brought the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy to campaign against [the measure] as well as employing the help of Colorado Attorney General John Suthers. Suthers said he was pleased to see the amendment go down to defeat and said voters never bought the argument made by Tvert that marijuana was safer than alcohol."

The Colorado Daily (11/8) reports Tvert "said SAFER will continue to work to change marijuana laws nationwide and here in Colorado with the principle that 'it's time that the government stops punishing adults who make the rational, safer choice to use marijuana instead of alcohol,' he said."

In a report on Colorado's gubernatorial race, the Washington Times (11/8) notes that Amendment 44 "was behind 53 percent to 47 percent. Two years ago, Denver voters approved an identical measure, paving the way for the statewide campaign."

The Grand Junction (CO) Daily Sentinel (11/8) notes how kids viewed Amendment 44.

On its Web site, KMGH-TV, Denver (11/7) reports, "After 32 percent of precincts reporting, early results show that voters are against legalizing marijuana possession, with 62 percent voting no and 38 percent voting yes."

The Las Vegas Journal Review (11/8) reports Las Vegas police Lt. Stan Olsen, who "worked against Question 7, said the measure, the latest in a string of failed efforts to legalize the drug here, was pushed by outsiders rather than Nevadans. 'They were trying to use us as a social experiment, as lab rats. Voters are engaged. They're bright. This was a bad bill of goods, and they knew it,' Olsen said. … Despite the apparent loss, backers of the measure were heartened by the turnout in favor of the measure."

DOJ_NMG_0091786

On its Web site, KOLO-TV, Reno, Nevada (11/8) writes, "Question 7 (legalization of marijuana), was voted down."

The Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader (11/8) reports a movement to "legalize the use of marijuana for medical uses was headed for defeat with partial election results available late Tuesday. South Dakota's Initiated Measure 4 was patterned after laws in 11 states. Passage looked doubtful at 11 p.m. with 141,734 votes against legalized use compared with 127,713 votes in favor, a 53-47 margin, with 743 precincts out of 818 reporting."

The AP (11/8) reports proponents "wanted South Dakota to become the 12th state to allow some medical patients to smoke marijuana to ease their pain. Opponents, led by law enforcement officials, said allowing medical marijuana would send a mixed message to children concerning drug use."

Local TV Coverage. KCNC-TV, Denver (11/7, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Amendment 44 asked voters to approve one ounce or less of marijuana to be legal for people over the age of 21 across the state. Right now that one is failing. Sixty-two percent voting against that, 38% voting in support of that."

KLAS-TV, Las Vegas (11/7, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "There were a number of important ballot initiatives on this year's ballot. Including one in particular, the marijuana initiative that had the entire country looking to what voters would do. … The fight to legalize an ounce of marijuana lost tonight. Question 7 was crushed with over 55 percent of voters saying 'No' to making the drug legal."

DEA Assists In Investigation Of Massachusetts Prescription Drug Theft. The Boston Globe (11/8) The FBI "joined the investigation yesterday into a sophisticated weekend theft of about 1.8 million prescription drug pills from a Mansfield warehouse. … State Police and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration are also involved, though a DEA spokesman said the agency is taking an advisory role. … Mansfield Police Sergeant Detective Sam Thompson said the stolen drugs, which included painkillers and anxiety medications, could have a street value of $10 a pill. … 'Prescription drug abuse is a serious area that has been expanding,' said Anthony Pettigrew, DEA New England spokesman. 'People don't believe anything you can get from a doctor can be harmful.'"

States Grapple With Meth Lab Cleanups. The Christian Science Monitor (11/8, Arnoldy) reports some states, "led by Colorado, have enacted tough regulations that require former [meth] lab sites to undergo a formal safety assessment - and more cleanup, if needed - before they can be reinhabited. … Other states mandate home sellers to disclose the presence of former meth labs. The patchwork of state approaches reflects the uneven spread of the drug, the potential costs of cleanup, and concerns about setting safety standards in the absence of definitive scientific research, experts say." The Monitor says federal money "is also going to assessments and cleanups. … The DEA offers free training and equipment to first responders and shoulders much of the bill for a contractor to remove lab materials whenever called to a scene. 'Technically the contractor has cleaned it out,' says Steve Robertson. 'If it was my property I would rip out the carpet, I would scrub the floors, I would repaint everything, because these ... are very hazardous chemicals.'"

Report: USADA Puts Track Coaches On Notice About Doping Allegations. The AP (11/8) reports track coach Trevor Graham "received notice from the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency that he is accused of violating doping rules. Graham…was indicted by a grand jury last week on three counts of making false statements to federal agents. Now, he has 10 days to respond to USADA's allegation letter. The case then will be presented to a review panel that recommends whether sanctions should be levied. … Also receiving an allegation letter, sources said, was track coach Remi Korchemny, who pleaded guilty to one misdemeanor count of doling out the sleep-disorder drug modafinil in the BALCO steroids scandal."

Investigation Of Purported Drug Kingpin In Pennsylvania Nets $2.2 Million. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (11/8) reports on $2.2 million found in a cocaine investigation involving Terrance Cole who "was sentenced in March to life in prison for running a drug organization that distributed more than 2,500 kilograms of cocaine from 1991-2003. That's 25 million doses, or about two doses for every man, woman and child in Pennsylvania, according to 2005 census figures." According to the Tribune-Review Cole is the "biggest cocaine kingpin in Western Pennsylvania history."

KDKA-TV, Pittsburgh (11/7) reports, "The Feds won't say why they searched a house, only that they have continued to investigate Cole even after his conviction in March of running a ring that distributed over $50 million worth of cocaine in the Pittsburgh area since 1993."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Explosives Charge. The Dallas Morning News (11/8, Yan, 500K) reports, "A Cedar Hill man accused of delivering a military rocket to a drug dealer pleaded guilty Tuesday to distribution of explosive material to a convicted felon." Eric Duane McNairy "faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine after the November 2004 discovery of a luggage bag containing a U.S. military 66 mm M74 incendiary rocket with a rocket launcher and Vietnam War-era explosives at a Duncanville convenience store." The Morning News notes, "A few months after Mr. McNairy denied knowing about the rocket and grenades, he told FBI agents that the explosives belonged to his brother, who was serving a drug sentence. … So he contacted an associate of his brother, Charles Andrew Brunston…who had recently been released after serving time for a felony drug conviction."

DOJ_NMG_0091787

TAX:

Merck Discloses Tax Disputes With US, Canada. The AP (11/8) reports, "Merck & Co. has disclosed four separate tax disputes in the U.S. and Canada with potential liabilities totaling $5.58 billion, as the drug maker faces tens of thousands of lawsuits over its withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, The Wall Street Journal reported on its Web site Tuesday." The AP continues, "Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck says it is fighting the assessments disclosed in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Journal said." The AP adds, "Merck isn't the only drugmaker hit with steep tax bills. In September, GlaxoSmithKline PLC agreed to pay the U.S. government $3.4 billion to settle a dispute over how to tax deals between the London-based company and its American subsidiary. … As of Sept. 30, Merck had $15.22 billion in current assets, including $6.22 billion in cash. At least one of the transactions in dispute also includes an income statement benefit, which could potentially be reversed depending on the outcome. In the third quarter, Merck earned $940.6 million on $5.41 billion in sales." The AP notes, "Merck already is facing liabilities that could reach tens of billions of dollars related to Vioxx, the painkiller it withdrew from the market in September 2004 after evidence that it increased the risk of heart attacks and strokes. Merck has been fighting the cases one by one. It has won five cases and lost four."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Capture House; Senate Control Hinges On Virginia, Montana Races. The AP (11/8, Sidoti) reports this morning, "Democrats won control of the House early Wednesday after a dozen years of Republican rule in a resounding repudiation of a war, a president and a scandal-scarred Congress. … By early Wednesday, Democrats had won 227 seats, enough for control, and were leading for another 6, which would give them 233. Republicans, who hold 229 seats in the current House, won 186 and were leading in another 16, which would give them 202." Democrats "had captured 26 Republican-controlled seats, and no Democratic incumbent had lost by early Wednesday." Republicans, adds the AP, "surrendered the Texas seat of former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who left the House after being charged in a campaign finance scheme, the Ohio seat once held by Bob Ney, who resigned after pleading guilty in a lobbying scandal, and the Florida district of Mark Foley." In Pennsylvania, "Democrats defeated Curt Weldon in the fallout from a federal corruption investigation and Don Sherwood who admitted to a long-term affair with a much younger woman who says he choked her."

USA Today (11/8, Kiely, 2.27M) reports that "Arizona's J.D. Hayworth, Indiana's John Hostettler and New Hampshire's Charlie Bass, in the class of 'Republican revolutionaries' who helped bring their party into power that year, were among Republican casualties." In addition, "longtime Republican incumbents Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Anne Northup of Kentucky, Charles Taylor of North Carolina, Jim Ryun of Kansas and Clay Shaw of Florida lost their seats. So did New Hampshire's Republican congressmen, Bass and Jeb Bradley." USA Today (11/8, 2.27M) also notes Indiana "was particularly cruel to House Republicans. Reps. John Hostettler, Chris Chocola and Mike Sodrel all lost in a state where Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels' unpopularity compounded the dissatisfaction" with President Bush.

In the Senate, says another AP story (11/8, Raum), Democrats "captured four of the six Republican-held seats they needed to take control of the Senate, winning critical contests in Ohio, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania and Missouri, and inched closer Wednesday to erasing the GOP's majority." Democrats also "mounted challenges for two remaining Republican-held seats in Virginia and Montana -- and were ahead in both. But in Virginia, Democratic challenger James Webb's lead over Republican incumbent George Allen was razor thin and a recount was likely." Republicans and Democrats both "dispatched lawyers to Virginia to tally uncounted absentee ballots Wednesday, as well as canvass votes counted on Election Day."

The Financial Times (11/8, Pruzan) says "voter sentiment also returned Democrats to power in a number of state governors' mansions. In Ohio, a batch of Republican scandals helped Democratic congressman Ted Strickland defeat Ken Blackwell, the Republican secretary of state." In Massachusetts, "Deval Patrick easily won election as the left-voting state's first Democratic governor since 1991. Mr Patrick will also become the north-eastern state's first black governor. Eliot Spitzer's long-expected victory in the New York governor's race also puts that seat in Democratic hands for the first time since 1994. … And in Maryland, Martin O'Malley, Baltimore's Democratic mayor, ousted Republican Robert Ehrlich as governor."

DOJ_NMG_0091788

USA Today (11/8, Nichols, Welch, 2.27M) reports Karl Rove "informed Bush around 11:15 p.m. ET that the House was lost, according to White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. 'Of course he's disappointed,' she said, but 'he's looking forward to working with the Democrats.'" The AP (11/8, Loven) quotes White House press secretary Tony Snow saying of the election results, "The president's not the kind of guy who is going to be somber about things. … They have not gone the way he would have liked." The AP adds, "Bush, unaccustomed to political defeat…watched the results in the White House residence, where Snow described the mood as 'businesslike.' Asked if the president was surprised that the House was shifting to the Democrats, Snow said it wasn't 'a slap-on-the-forehead kind of shock.'"

The New York Times (11/8, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports Bush "has called a press conference for Wednesday afternoon." Asked if Bush "had made phone calls to Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader and likely Speaker of the House, Pelosi," White House spokesman Tony Fratto "said the president would not make any phone calls until Wednesday morning and that he was still hopeful late Tuesday that the Senate would remain under Republican control." Fox News' Bret Baier (11/8, 12:15 am. ET) said at the news conference, the President "will continue to call on democrats to help him win the war and keep the economy going but clearly it's going to be a different sound out of this White House." Bier added that Snow said the White House "was encouraged by what they heard from top Democrats today, that essentially Democrats would not stop funding for the war in Iraq but clearly are going to be pushing for a change in policy."

Before the results we known, the CBS Evening News (11/7, story 2, 1:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "For the last several weeks, President Bush has said he would not be reaching out to Democrats prior to the election because Republicans were going to win. Well, we're now told that the White House is looking for a phone number for the Senate's top Democrat, Harry Reid, just in case they have to reach him. After slamming Democrats nonstop in 13 states during the last 10 days of campaigning, this morning, Mr. Bush made a nonpartisan appeal after voting in Crawford, Texas." President Bush: "No matter what your party affiliation or if you don't have a party affiliation, do your duty. Cast your ballot, and let your voice be heard."

Media commentators are portraying the election results as a referendum on Bush and his Iraq policies. On ABC News (11/7), correspondent Martha Raddatz said, "The bad news that the Republicans are getting tonight points straight to the President. This President has defined himself by national security and his Iraq policy, he's been trying to sell his so-called strategy for victory in Iraq for the last year. He has made so many speeches around Iraq. Tried to tie it in the global war on terrorism. It hasn't worked." Also on ABC News (11/7), George Stephanopoulos said, "This is really shaping up as a protest vote against President Bush and a protest vote against the Iraq war."

On CBS News (11/7), former Bill Clinton spokesman Mike McCurry said, "This is really a referendum on George Bush. He is on the minds of voters in a way that most Presidents really aren't, not even Bill Clinton in his midterm elections was as much a factor in those elections as George Bush is tonight. I think one way or another, the White House is going to have to get some he's message from this election"

In the Los Angeles Times, Ronald Brownstein writes that "for six tumultuous years…Bush has provoked intense opposition while mobilizing passionate support for an ambitious conservative agenda. On Tuesday, that perilous strategy crumbled -- and triggered his party's abrupt fall from power. … In the long run, the results raise fundamental questions about the viability of the strategy Bush and his chief political advisor, Karl Rove, have pursued to build a lasting Republican political majority. … Especially ominous for the GOP may have been the reopening of the gender gap."

On its front-page, the Washington Post (11/8, A1, Baker, VandeHei, 748K) runs an analysis piece titled "A Voter Rebuke For Bush, the War And the Right," in which it calls the midterm contests "a sharp rebuke of…Bush and the Iraq war." The GOP "reign in the House that began with Newt Gingrich in a burst of vision and confrontation in 1994 came crashing down amid voter disaffection with congressional corruption." The New York Times (11/8, A1, Toner, 1.21M) headlines its front-page analysis "A Loud Message for Bush," and says voters have put "a proudly unyielding president on notice that the voters want change, especially on the war in Iraq."

National Review's Editor in Chief Rich Lowry, on Fox News (11/8, 12:10 a.m. ET) said, "I think people have the sense that George Bush doesn't listen. That's always a deadly sin for...a leader."

The Hotline's Chuck Todd, on MSNBC (11/8, 3:30 a.m. ET) claimed that President Bush's recent visit to Missouri may have "doomed" Sen. Jim Talent. According to Todd, Republicans in Missouri "begged" the Talent campaign to ask the President not to come to the state late in the campaign.

The Wall Street Journal (11/8, Fry, 2.03M) reports, "An early wave of exit-poll data, compiled and analyzed by a media consortium, suggested that voters went to polling places frustrated with an increasingly unpopular president, the war in Iraq and a Republican-led Congress that hadn't provided the checks and balances Americans seem to want. … Some six in 10 voters said they disapproved of Mr. Bush's performance as president and of the way Congress is handling its job. Those voters were overwhelmingly giving their support to Democrats."

The Washington Times (11/8, Hurt, 88K) reports "both sides said Mr. Bush's low popularity and voter anger over the war in Iraq were the leading contributors to Republican losses." Under the headline "Republican Blame Game Begins," another Washington Times piece (11/8, Hallow) says "recriminations flew from every which way against Republican leaders as voters turned out yesterday for the culmination of an election campaign that had…Bush's party on the defensive. With the party fighting to avert a midterm meltdown, conservatives were critical of Republicans on both ideological and tactical grounds." The Rev. Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberties Commission, said, "Republicans would have been better off with Mr. Bush heading the ticket, as if it were a presidential year, because Southern Baptists and evangelicals don't feel the same frustration toward Mr. Bush as they feel toward Republicans in Congress. They have much more affection for him than for Republicans in the House and the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0091789

USA Today (11/8, Page, 2.27M) reports Bush "won re-election and Republicans bolstered their control of Congress courtesy of a coalition that included fiscal conservatives, 'values voters' and independents who were worried about terrorism." Yesterday, "that coalition was fractured by opposition to the war in Iraq, disgust about corruption and unease over the economy." George Will, on ABC News (11/7), said the election was "absolutely" a referendum on the Iraq war, adding, "When you shared an earlier graphic that showed disapproval of George Bush and disapproval of the Iraq war, I think they were one percentage point apart. It is a referendum. It means the Democrats succeeded in their plan not to turn it into a choice locally between one candidate and another but a referendum on the war on the national issue." On NBC News (11/7), Campbell Brown echoed those themes, saying, "Even though he wasn't on the ballot, George Bush was a big factor today. President Bush and anger over the war in Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (11/8, Havemann, Neuman, 918K) reports, "This election is six years into Bush's presidency; the last big Democratic win in congressional elections was in 1986, a comparable juncture in Ronald Reagan's administration. Democrats won control of the Senate by picking up eight seats. They added only five House seats, although they already had a huge majority of 253 seats to the Republicans' 182." In a similar story, the Washington Post (11/8, A1, Balz, 748K) says "the sixth year of two-term presidencies often has produced sizable losses and shifts in power in the House or Senate for the party controlling the White House. That was true in 1958, 1974 and 1986. … Presidents hovering in the mid-40s…have seen their parties suffer major setbacks. That was the case for Bill Clinton in 1994, Ronald Reagan in 1982, Lyndon B. Johnson in 1966, and Harry S. Truman in 1946 and 1950. Jimmy Carter had an approval rating of 49 percent in 1978 and Democrats lost 15 House seats that year."

McClatchy (11/8, Thomma) says "it's normal for a president's party to lose seats in the sixth year of a two-term presidency. Over the last 100 years, the president's party has lost an average of 32 seats in the House and five in the Senate in such sixth-year elections."

On CBS News (11/7), former White House communications director Nicole Wallace said White House aides were talking "a lot about history. You look at midterm elections and historically the President's party takes a big hit. President Clinton lost 54 seats in his first midterm. There is a tide of history that every president swims against. You also look at the climate where there's been a, you know, a plethora of scandals that have plagued House Republicans. There's also obviously a lot of angst in the country about Iraq. So they understand this climate. They are at this hour very cautiously optimistic about their chances in some of these very tight races so they say wait-and-see. Let's not analyze the results until we see what's going to happen tonight."

Webb Slightly Ahead In Virginia, Recount Likely. The Washington Post (11/8, Shear, 748K) reports that Allen and Webb were "locked in a dead heat last night, raising the possibility that a recount will decide Virginia's U.S. Senate race later this month." With "most" votes in by midnight, Webb "claimed a slim lead of about 1,800 votes among more than 2.3 million cast -- a difference of less than a tenth of a percent. Some absentee ballots in Fairfax and Arlington counties were still being counted at midnight, and some counties planned to finish those ballots this morning." The Post adds, "The nail-biter left the candidates in limbo as their campaign advisers began to talk about a recount, which could consume Virginia for weeks and raise doubts about which party will control the U.S. Senate." The Post says a recount "would seem a fitting end to a campaign that was filled with scandals, personal revelations and racial accusations."

The Washington Times (11/8, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that Web and Allen "were locked in a razor-thin race in Virginia last night as the nation watched to see whether the contest would change which party controls the Senate." Webb "declared victory before several hundred supporters," while Allen "had no plans to concede, and reminded supporters gathered for him here in Richmond that he has won close elections before."

USA Today (11/8, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Allen piled up big voting margins in conservative, rural counties across Virginia, but as election night wore on, the incumbent's support throughout the countryside was offset by Webb's strong showing in urban areas."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (11/8, Whitley) reports, "Only 17 precincts remained to be counted shortly after midnight. Most of the uncounted ballots are absentee. The Republican Party mounted a strong absentee ballot effort.

DOJ_NMG_0091790

Many absentee ballots are cast by business people, who tend to be Republicans."

According to the Virginia State Board of Elections Web site (11/8, 3:26 a.m.), with 99.75% of precincts reporting, Webb held 49.58 percent of the vote to Allen's 49.22 percent, with Independent Green candidate Gail Parker held 1.11 percent of the vote.

Tester Leading, But Outcome Said To Remain Uncertain In Montana. The Billings Gazette (11/8, 47K) reports that Jon Tester (D) "clung to a lead over" Sen. Conrad Burns (R) Tuesday, "but vote-counting delays prevented a winner from being named.." The Gazette adds, "Despite his lead, Tester was not declaring victory shortly before midnight." In a brief report, the Great Falls Tribune (11/8) reports that with 81 percent of the precincts reporting, Burns was "making a late push." Tester held 49 percent of the vote to Burns's 48 percent, while Libertarian Stan Jones had 3 percent of the vote.

Many Veterans Didn't Win On Election Day. USA Today (11/8, Keen, 2.27M) reports, "Veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan brought unique perspectives on the wars to their campaigns for the House of Representatives. Their military service, though, was not enough to propel most of them to victories." Among the races: IL6 candidate Tammy Duckworth (D), a veteran who lost both legs in Iraq, lost to Peter Roskam (R). MD6 candidate Andrew Duck (D), a "former Army intelligence officer in Iraq," lost to Rep. Roscoe Bartlett (R). MN1 hopeful Tim Walz (D) , who "served in Afghanistan as a member of an Army National Guard artillery battalion," lost to Rep. Gil Gutknecht. PA8 hopeful Patrick Murphy (D), who "deployed to Iraq as an Army lawyer," was in a virtual tie with Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick (R), and TX17 Rep. Chet Edwards (D) beat Van Taylor (R), a former Marine captain. However, PA7 hopeful Joseph Sestak, a "retired Navy admiral who led battle groups in Iraq," beat Rep. Curt Weldon (R).

2006 Emerges As Another "Year Of The Woman." The Wall Street Journal (11/8, A1, Lueck, 2.03M) reports the Democrats' "success stands to make" Rep. Nancy Pelosi "the most powerful woman ever to sit in Congress. … Meanwhile" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "is the Democrats' presidential front-runner for 2008, preparing for what may become the most serious run for the White House yet by a woman. But the advances by women are hardly limited to those two headline-grabbing leaders. Across the nation, record numbers of women sought political office this year. Buoyed in part by the public's desire for change and the perception that women will bring it, many of them battled their way through primaries to make it into yesterday's general election." The Journal notes, "At the state level, a record 2,433 women were running for seats as state lawmakers, according to Rutgers University's Center for American Women and Politics. That breaks a record set in 1992, the so-called Year of the Woman because of vast numbers of wins by female politicians that year. In the Senate, a record 12 women candidates made it through their primaries. … A total of 138 female candidates were running for the House, just short of the record 141 in 2004. In the final tally, women are likely to gain some ground there, though not as much as in 1992, when 19 were elected."

McCain Says GOP Rebuked For Not Adhering To "Conservative Principles." On NBC News (11/7), Brian Williams asked Sen. John McCain "what message" he took "away from these returns, these Republican losses in the Senate, specifically, so far where it pertains to the war in Iraq?" McCain said, "Well, I think the overall results are directly related to a number of things, including the war in Iraq, including the fact that we haven't been careful stewards of the taxpayers' dollars, that many of our base believe we value power over principle. And we haven't adhered to the conservative principles, which I think still the majority of Americans feel it's in their priorities. But on the war in Iraq, of course, it's frustrating. It's frustrating to all of us. Americans are very frustrated. And yet at the same time, I've not heard of a recipe as to how we can work this out. I am hopeful that once we go back into session that we could sit down and work some of this out, because it is terribly frustrating. We know that it's not going well. But I still believe that if you leave at a date certain, or precipitously that the chaos would ensue. Most every military expert I know feels the same way. So we've got to prevail here. But I understand the frustration Americans feel. But I think it's spending, I think it's not keeping to our conservative principles, and I think that the scandals have something to do with it as well."

Parties' Differing Priorities To Come To Fore On Hill. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, A4, Rogers, McKinnon, 2.03M) reports, "Democrats were rolling up election victories last night driven by public concern over the war in Iraq, just as the Army was preparing a new emergency-funding request for $49.2 billion more to pay for overseas operations for the remainder of this fiscal year. The juxtaposition illustrates the new political reality in Washington, a challenge both for newly powerful Democrats and the Republican president: With the Democrats poised to take control of the House in the next Congress, each will be forced to deal with each other if the government is to function over the next two years." House Democrats "have stuck to a modest agenda, such as increasing the minimum wage, toughening ethics rules and reviving stem-cell legislation previously vetoed by the president. Now they inherit a backlog of unfinished spending bills for the current fiscal year, which began Oct. 1, as well as new demands for funding the war." The White House "is braced for subpoenas from hostile committees led by Democrats and for Republicans now more interested in identifying Mr. Bush's successor than in rallying behind a waning presidency. At a Philadelphia-area fund-raiser a few weeks ago, former President George H.W. Bush said he would 'hate to think what...my son's life would be like' if Democrats won enough seats to take over Congress." The Journal adds, "The conventional wisdom is that two years of gridlock are likely."

DOJ_NMG_0091791

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/8, 748K) says "the apparent Democratic takeover of the House of Representatives yesterday is a good thing. Republicans won control of the House in 1994 promising a change from Washington business as usual. Instead, entrenched by gerrymandered redistricting into what they envisioned would be a permanent majority, Republicans slid toward lax oversight, unbridled partisanship and rampant sleaziness, if not outright corruption. … Though we regret the loss of some of the most talented Republican moderates, the GOP deserved to lose its majority." The Post concludes, "As they prepare to wield power, Democrats don't have capital from voters; at most, they enjoy a line of credit."

The New York Times (11/8, 1.21M) editorializes, "Whatever this election accomplished, it did nothing to end the rancor and distrust that define current American politics. Yet, as the campaign went on (and on) there was one issue on which people from both parties appeared to be finding common ground: Donald Rumsfeld has to go. … There is absolutely nothing more for Mr. Rumsfeld to do as secretary of defense except continue to defend failed policies and tinker with unworkable strategies. Most of the men and women who will be part of the 110th Congress in January have come to that conclusion, whatever their party affiliation. They simply need to share it with President Bush."

Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, writes in USA Today (11/8, 2.27M), "The congressional elections that bisect a president's last term has been a grim marker, a place where many a presidency have gone to die. But it doesn't have to be this way." Baker adds that "perhaps in the last two years of President Bush's term, he can shake off the lame-duck curse and redeem a pledge to the American people that he made in the 2000 campaign. He vowed then to be 'a uniter, not a divider,' and indeed he was for a brief period after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. … It is Bush who must take the initiative or face two years that are barren of accomplishment and a poor foundation for the favorable judgment of history."

Medicare Drug Benefit Struggles To Resolve Billing Errors. USA Today (11/8, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Just days before enrollment for next year's Medicare drug benefit begins, federal agencies are still trying to fix a long-running billing problem that at its peak this summer ensnared about half a million people. Despite those efforts, about 50,000 people who chose to have their monthly Medicare drug premiums taken out of their Social Security checks are still having incorrect amounts withheld." Medicare "fixed about 100,000 cases last month, leaving about 50,000 unresolved, says Jim Kerr, an acting deputy director at Medicare." But he added, "It has taken a great deal of time to resolve some of them, unfortunately."

Study Finds More States Offering Plans With Little Drug Coverage. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, D7, Gerencher, 2.03M) reports a new study by Families USA found that "the number of states with stand-alone Medicare prescription drug plans that will offer no substantial coverage for the top drugs prescribed to older Americans in the insurance gap known as the 'doughnut hole' will increase to 13 next year from four this year." According to the report, "beneficiaries in many of the 37 states and District of Columbia with plans that will extend substantial coverage in the gap starting next year will see starkly higher premiums." The findings, "which the health-insurance industry disputes as incomplete, come two weeks before Medicare beneficiaries can start choosing Part D plans for next year."

Gingrich Criticizes Families USA Study. Former speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (11/8, 88K) that "radical left's" strategy is to score political points through "Medi-scare." Gingrich adds that Families USA's study "does not reflect reality." It "defines 'meaningful coverage' as only 25 medications," and "four of the drugs are listed twice because they are prescribed in different doses." Also, it doesn't notethatgeneric drugs can treat the same conditions. Additionally, It only "focuses on the narrow issue known as the 'doughnut hole,'" but "the 'doughnut hole' in general will not be an issue for 71 percent of Medicare beneficiaries." Besides, "every beneficiary in every state can choose an affordable drug plan that offers gap coverage for both generic and brand-name drugs," and "the small minority that reaches the 'doughnut hole' without gap coverage still has workable options."

Members Of Congress Set To Receive Another Pay Raise. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr, in his "Federal Diary" column (11/8), writes, "The prickly issue of congressional pay showed up in a number of anti-incumbent, shake-up-the-establishment campaign ads that ran prior to yesterday's election. They usually included an assertion that the members of Congress had voted to give themselves pay raises. … But congressional pay is also linked to government salary scales. Under the rules, if white-collar federal employees get an annual base pay raise that is less than the formula's suggested increase for Congress, members are paid at the lower rate. Because Congress has not wrapped up negotiations on a 2007 federal employee raise, lawmakers probably won't know the size of their raise until late December, when the president issues pay scales for government workers, diplomats, Cabinet officials and others."

DOJ_NMG_0091792

Dorgan Seen As Spokesman For Democrats' "Antimarket, Antibusiness Protectionism." The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray (11/8) writes, "If you want to be optimistic about how Democratic victories may affect Washington, you should read Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's book 'The Audacity of Hope.' It is an eloquent appeal for sanity and civility in government. If you prefer pessimism, take a look at Sen. Byron Dorgan's new book, 'Take This Job and Ship It.' Or save yourself $24.95 and just glance at the cover. The subtitle tells all: 'How Corporate Greed and Brain-Dead Politics are Selling Out America.' The book is a Lou Dobbsian rant against corporate outsourcing, trade agreements, Wal-Mart, big pharma, big oil and all the other hot-button antimarket, antibusiness issues that Mr. Dobbs, a CNN talk-show host, has used in recent years to boost his nightly ratings. … Sen. Dorgan's screed raises a much more dangerous specter of broad-brush, antimarket, antibusiness protectionism. He isn't alone, as anyone who has heard Sherrod Brown's pitch in Ohi o or watched Bruce Braley's campaign in Iowa now knows. If there is one thing politicians are good at, it is sensing the public mood. If Messrs. Dorgan, Brown and Braley are correctly sensing that mood, business may be headed for a tough ride."

Ignatius Says Hayden Still Has Much To Accomplish At CIA. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (11/8) writes, "When Gen. Michael Hayden became CIA director six months ago, his mission was to calm a troubled agency, get it out of the headlines and restore its professionalism. … Hayden is doing many things right, according to CIA officers and foreigners who work closely with the agency. He is a low-key change agent, communicating well with a workforce bruised by years as a political football." However, Ignatius adds, "there are still too many things wrong at the CIA, which Hayden needs to fix. Officials at other agencies say the quality of CIA analysis varies widely, from top-notch to very ordinary. CIA officers in the field complain about a bureaucratic culture that still punishes risk-takers and rewards those who play it safe. Agency gossip has it that a long line of officers recently bid for a plush station chief's job in Scandinavia, while there were only several applicants each to run the big stations in Baghdad, Kabul and Islamabad."

OTHER NEWS:

Federal Reserve Reports Drop In Consumer Borrowing. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, Whitehouse, 2.03M) reports, "American consumers eased off on borrowing in September, though a persistent rise in credit-card balances suggests some are feeling the impact of the housing market's downturn. The Federal Reserve reported U.S. consumer credit, which excludes mortgage debt, fell at an annualized rate of 0.6% in September to $2.366 trillion, or about $21,000 a household. That was up 3.7% from a year earlier, well below the average year-to-year rise of 7.1% over the past decade."

New Home Orders Continue Steep Decline. The Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg (11/8) reports, "Home builders Toll Bros. Inc. and Beazer Homes USA Inc. said Tuesday that orders for new homes declined and customer cancellations rose as the housing slump deepened. Toll, the largest U.S. luxury home builder, said fiscal fourth-quarter home building revenue fell 10% and orders tumbled 58%. Beazer, the seventh-largest home builder by revenue, said orders dropped 58%." The New York Times (11/8, Porter, 1.21M) reports, "Toll Brothers' backlog of projects declined 25 percent and its signed contracts plunged 55 percent as the company suffered from a rash of cancellations concentrated in the formerly hot markets of Florida and Northern California." USA Today/AP (11/8, Yao) reports Robert Toll, CEO of Toll Bros. "said that at one point, he thought the housing market was nearing the bottom, but business continued to worsen."

Dow Closes Up 50 Points, Just Seven Short Of Record High. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, C1, McKay, 2.03M) reports, "Cheaper fuel and a big order for Boeing jets kept the stock market's ascent going for a second straight day. The Dow Jones Industrial Average climbed 51.22 points, or 0.4%, to 12156.77. It is up 13.4% this year. The Dow during the day crossed its Oct. 26 record close but ended less than seven points shy of it. … Yesterday, the S&P 500 gained 0.2%, or 3.06 points, to 1382.84, up 10.8% so far this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rallied 0.4%, or 9.93 points, to 2375.88, up 7.7% this year."

USA Today (11/8, 2.27M) reports, "Stocks turned in their second-consecutive day of gains on belief that Tuesday's midterm elections will create legislative congestion and maintain the status quo for US companies. 'Gridlock is good; Wall Street doesn't like change,' says Charles Gabriel, senior Washington analyst at Prudential Securities."

Schwarzenegger Wins Re-Election. The Los Angeles Times (11/8, Finnegan, 918K) reports, "A year after his crushing defeat in the special election, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger won a second term today in a landslide over Democrat Phil Angelides." The Times adds, "The state expected 4.9 million Californians to vote at polling stations and another 3.8 million to cast absentee ballots, but the final turnout number - likely to be just over half of registered voters - is weeks away."

The San Francisco Chronicle (11/8, Egelko, 405K) reports that Schwarzenegger "bucked a nationwide Democratic tide" as he "overwhelmingly" won over Angelides

DOJ_NMG_0091793

58 percent to 38 percent, with 60 percent of precincts reporting.

The USA Today (11/8, Ritter, 2.27M) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's cruise to re-election confirms his bipartisan popularity in the nation's most populous state and positions him to tackle an issue that has long stymied national policymakers: health care reform. Political analysts and the governor's staff say a bid to provide coverage for some or all of California's estimated 6.5 million uninsured residents, particularly children, would be the early focus of a second term, which would be his last because of term limits."

Report Says Oil Industry Has Barely Increased Investment In Production. The Wall Street Journal (11/8, A11, Bahree, 2.03M) reports, "The world oil industry has barely increased its investment in oil and natural-gas production during the past five years after accounting for inflation, a new study finds, suggesting global energy prices are likely to encounter upward pressure in the years ahead." The Journal says, "Data compiled by the International Energy Agency show that investment in the oil-and-gas industry was $340 billion in 2005, up 70% from 2000. But cost inflation for goods and services used by the industry accounted for almost all of that increase, according to the IEA... . Adjusted for inflation, the oil industry's investment increased by 5% between 2000 and 2005, the IEA...said." The Journal reports, "Because oil and gas projects take many years to complete, the results of any scrimping on investment during the first half of the decade will become evident only toward the end of the second half. If world demand for oil rises faster than projected, or if production-capacity gains are less than expected, the result would be upward pressure on prices."

Advances In Technology Push Oil Frontier To Gulf Of Mexico's Deepest Waters. The New York Times (11/8, Mouawad, 1.21M) reports, "As oil consumption grows and access to most oil-rich regions becomes increasingly restricted, companies are venturing farther out to sea, drilling deeper... . The next oil frontier — and the next great challenge for oil explorers — lies below 10,000 feet of water, through five miles of hard rock, thick salt and tightly packed sands." The Times says, "Even after hitting pay dirt, it will take another decade and billions of dollars to transform oil from these ultra-deep reserves into gasoline. Some of the technology to pump the sludge from these depths, at these pressures and temperatures, has not yet been developed; only about a dozen ships can drill wells that deep, and no one knows for sure how much oil is down there." Some "argue that the industry is nearing the limits of what it can do to maintain a growing supply of fossil fuels. But for the geologists, scientists and explorers who work here in the Gulf of Mexico, the history of the deep water holds another lesson: technological breakthroughs have always breathed new life into the energy industry. ...Thanks to advances in offshore technology, and tremendous leaps in supercomputers and three-dimensional imaging, this region's deepest waters have become the hottest exploration prospects in the nation."

Parties Said To Undermine Themselves With Negative Advertising. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/8, 2.03M) John Ellis, a former columnist for the Boston Globe, writes, "What makes our politics so sensationally awful is not just the amount of money spent denigrating the category and the profession, but the equally stunning amount of energy that is expended by party apparatchiks to amplify the negative in news-media coverage of politics. … Ultimately, the reaction to this ceaseless negative barrage, if it continues unchecked, will be the rejection of both major political parties. As more and more people are repulsed by the political process, their number will at some point reach a critical mass. Americans share two overriding beliefs: Tomorrow will be a better day and the idea of America is fundamentally important. That critical mass will eventually embrace a party of hope and mission. A new political party that speaks to those beliefs will emerge."

Academics Criticize Widespread Caricature Of Evangelicals. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (11/8, 748K) Joseph Loconte, a professor at Pepperdine University's School of Public Policy, and Michael Cromartie, vice chair of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, write, "Critics have been warning about the theocratic takeover of America ever since" Jimmy Carter's victory in 1976. According to the authors, "This theme is a gross caricature of the 100 million or more people who could be called evangelicals. But the real problem is that it denies the profoundly democratic ideals of Protestant Christianity, while ignoring evangelicalism's deepening social conscience."

NYTimes Urges Spitzer To Pursue Ambitious Agenda. The New York Times (11/8, 1.21M) reports, "New Yorkers could be forgiven for thinking that Eliot Spitzer has already been governor for some time now, given the way every poll has predicted his victory since last summer. Now that voters have finally confirmed his election, change can't come too soon for a powerful and proud state that has allowed its government to become a national embarrassment. … Mr. Spitzer will hardly be doing it all in his first hundred days. But we do expect to see immediate action on his central promise to make state government more responsive to the people and to clean up the way special-interest money distorts policy in the state."

UN Still Deadlocked Over Iran Sanctions Resolution. The New York Times (11/8, Hoge, 1.21M)

DOJ_NMG_0091794

reports that "a meeting of six nations working on a resolution to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions broke up Tuesday evening with the ambassadors reporting widening disagreements and lessening prospects of a swift accord." China's Ambassador, Wang Guangya, said the "mood is not right for serious discussions," emerging from the meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council and Germany. "Clearly, I think in a number of difficult areas that the differences cannot be bridged," Wang said. "So I believe there ought to be more reflections in the capitals, and also I believe that we need to talk to each other," he added. The Times reports that Ambassador Bolton "left the session hurriedly without making his customary comment. … Earlier in the day, Mr. Bolton charged that Russia had pulled back from an agreement made in July by the foreign ministers of the six nations to impose sanctions on Iran if it did not meet an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend its uranium enrichment." Bolton was quoted as saying, "I don't know how we're going to work it out because the Russian version is very different than what we think the foreign ministers agreed to."

The Washington Times (11/8, Kralev, 88K) adds, "Ending months of publicly expressed confidence that Moscow would support Washington's campaign to punish Tehran as long as all other diplomatic options had been exhausted, John R. Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, cast doubt on prospects for a UN resolution in the near future." However, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "played down" the disagreement, saying that negotiations will be long and have their "ups and downs." The spokesman said, "The Russians have their own views on how hard to press the Iranians and how fast to do that. We understand that. We think it is important, however, for the credibility of the Security Council and the entire international community that we now go to a sanctions resolution."

WSJournal Says Iran's Ballistic Missiles Are Threat To Region. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/8, 2.03M) warns, "Iran continues to claim it has a 'right' to its uranium-enrichment program. But one clue that the ruling mullahs have something other than peaceful nuclear energy in mind is the huge investment they're making in ballistic-missile technology, which is far from the most efficient means of delivering a non-nuclear explosive payload. Just last week, Iran test-fired dozens of Shahab-2 and Shahab-3 missiles, which have ranges up to about 2,000 kilometers." The Journal also cite comments made over the weekend by Iranian Revolutionary Guards Commander Yahya Rahim Safavi, who said "he did not anticipate any US interference" in his country's nuclear program because "they know that Iran has missiles with the range of 2000 km which will put their interests in danger." The Journal said is "surprised that more Western Europeans, who will soon be within range of Iranian missiles, don't seem worried about this threat. But let's hope at least President Bush and the next US Congress can make stopping Iran's bomb and missile programs a bipartisan project."

Hughes' Internal Memo On Media Relations Leaked To WPost. The Washington Post (11/8, A25, Williamson, 748K) reports Karen Hughes, the State Department's undersecretary for public diplomacy and public affairs, "sent a long memo to chief diplomats, top deputies and public affairs officers worldwide Friday, spelling out 'Karen's Rules' for working with the media." The Post says the rules "offer a window into how State's chief communicator communicates with her minions across the world. Hint: The memo was given to The Washington Post by a recipient who points out that if all were well, nobody would have leaked it." In the memo, which the Post printed in full, Hughes "encourages diplomats to engage with the media, but it is apparent that the message enforcer does not share control easily."

Border Fence Expected To Overshadow Bush-Calderon Meeting. USA Today (11/8, Llana, 2.27M) reports, "The nearly 700 miles of fencing President Bush authorized for the U.S.-Mexican border two weeks ago could overshadow other issues when Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderón makes his first visit to the White House on Thursday." USA Today notes that although Calderón "is a pro-business, U.S.-friendly candidate" the fence "threatens to create a political barrier even before Calderón officially takes office Dec. 1. On a recent trip to Canada, Mexico's president-elect compared the fence to the Berlin Wall." On Monday Calderón "did not say whether he would reiterate Mexico's objection to the law authorizing a major extension of the fence, which Mexican officials say will cause more deaths by making it even harder for would-be immigrants to cross the border. … Immigration was not among the issues on the original agenda for Thursday's meeting. White House spokesman Tony Snow said last month that the discussion would focus on competitiveness, free trade, economic growth and security in North America. Calderón may have wanted to avoid immigration altogether given the failure of outgoing president and fellow National Action Party member Vicente Fox to get what he called the 'whole enchilada.'"

State Department Official Named Head Of UN Food Program. The Washington Post (11/8, A13, Lynch, 748K) reports Undersecretary of State Josette Sheeran "was chosen Tuesday to head the United Nations' Rome-based World Food Program for a five-year term." The Post notes that Sheeran is "the latest Bush administration nominee to secure a senior position in the world's most prominent international agencies." Ambassador Bolton "welcomed the appointment," saying, "She's obviously an extraordinarily well-qualified candidate." According to the Post, "The State Department mounted an intensive campaign, including a slick election brochure, to ensure continuing US leadership in the organization. … Sheeran overcame challenges from Switzerland's top aid official, Walter Fust; a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, Robert Fowler; and American Tony Banbury, the head of the World Food Program in Asia and formerly a national security aide in the administrations of President Bill Clinton and President Bush. The Bush administration was sensitive to the possibility that Sheeran's former membership in the Rev. Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church would emerge as an issue in the race. A US official pressed The Washington Post not to mention Sheeran's past links to the church, saying it was inappropriate to describe her religious affiliation."

DOJ_NMG_0091795

The Los Angeles Times (11/8, Farley, 918K) says Sheeran's selection "reveals the influence of the United States on the UN's top jobs. With a new secretary-general scheduled to start a five-year term in January, non-American applicants were reassured that the competition this year would be based on merit and experience." Diplomatic sources told the Post "they had heard that Fust and Banbury were at the top of the list. But Sheeran, not Banbury, was the official State Department candidate, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan to remind him of that," said a US diplomat who asked not to be identified. According to the source, "Rice's message was that the US government should have a say in the selection of the WFP director proportionate to its contribution to the program." The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/8, B12) also reports on Sheeran's selection.

Israel Withdraws Most Forces From Gaza Strip, But Fighting Continues. The New York Times (11/8, Fisher, 1.21M) reports, "In theory, today should have been quiet" in Gaza as "Israeli tanks and soldiers withdrew from Beit Hanun early on Tuesday, saying their six-day operation to stop the firing of rockets into Israel was over and had been successful. They said they killed dozens of armed militants, recovered 'large amounts' of weaponry and showed the Palestinians the price of such attacks. But Palestinians and the United Nations said the price was too high. In the first glimpse of Beit Hanun since the operation began—the largest in Gaza since July—it was apparent that large swaths of the northern Gaza neighborhood from where most of the rockets were fired had been devastated." A leader of the United Nations survey team, John Ging, said he was "gravely concerned" by the extent of the damage. The Times notes that although the Israeli operation was "intended to stop the rocket fire, and although it was reduced, it did not stop."

The Washington Post (11/8, A3, Wilson, 748K) notes that Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz "said military operations, usually airstrikes and artillery fire, would continue until the rocket attacks end."

Ortega Declared Victor In Nicaragua. The New York Times (11/8, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "As election officials finished the final vote tallies on Tuesday and his leading opponent conceded defeat, Daniel Ortega, the onetime cold-war nemesis of the United States, was assured of winning the presidency [in Nicaragua] and fulfilling his 16-year struggle to regain power." The Times notes that Ortega "maintains that both he and the country have changed since the 1980s… While Mr. Ortega still rails against "savage capitalism" and the failure of free trade to alleviate poverty, he has become a more pragmatic leftist over the past decade and a half."

The Washington Post (11/8, A18, Aizenman, 748K) notes, "In the waning weeks of the campaign, Bush administration officials issued veiled threats that the United States might impose punitive measures such as a trade embargo if Ortega was elected." In Washington, Assistant Secretary McCormack "spoke in more measured tones" about the results, saying the US has "made a commitment to the Nicaraguan people" and that certain portions of US aid agreements to Nicaragua were negotiated "with some areas of Nicaragua which I think are actually under the...political leadership of Mr. Ortega's party. So they have an interest in continuing that relationship." But McCormack cautioned that the results were "not yet final."

The Chicago Tribune (11/8, Avila, 623K) calls Ortega's victory "a remarkable comeback" that US officials "fear will give them a new left-wing antagonist in Latin America." It also says his victory "poses a new challenge in the region for the Bush administration, which must decide whether to treat Ortega as an enemy or accept his assurances that he has moderated his views." The State Department "said Tuesday that the Bush administration would wait to see the shape of a new Nicaraguan government. But several US officials warned that aid and immigrant remittances to the hemisphere's second-poorest nation would be in jeopardy if Ortega became president and aligned himself with leftist President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela."

Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (11/8, Llana, 58K) says Ortega's win "would deal a blow to the US, which has been keeping a close eye on their old cold war foe. US politicians warned that US aid and investment would wane in this Central American country—one of the hemisphere's poorest—if Ortega, an ally of Venezuela's president Hugo Chávez, retook the helm of Nicaragua." Although Ortega has declared victory, the US Embassy released a statement saying it was too soon to "make an overall judgment on the fairness and transparency of the process," it read. "We are receiving reports of some anomalies in the electoral process," the statement added.

DOJ_NMG_0091796

Panama Wins UN Security Council Seat. The Los Angeles Times (11/8, Farley, 918K) reports, "Panama won a two-year term on the Security Council on Tuesday, making the powerful body's composition for 2007 much less contrarian than the US had feared should Venezuela have won the Latin American seat. But the new council still will include voices that could challenge the United States, such as South Africa, a leader of developing nations." Panama emerged last week as a compromise, "ending a protracted standoff between US-backed Guatemala and Venezuela, a vocal critic of Washington's policies." However, "active US lobbying on behalf of Guatemala cost that country some support, diplomats say."

WTO Entry Said To Be No Cure-All For Vietnam's Economy. On the front page of its Asia edition, the Wall Street Journal (11/8, A1, Hookway, 2.03M) reports, "Vietnam was formally invited to join the World Trade Organization after more than a decade of entry talks in which it steadily reduced its tariffs and pledged to open its banking sector. But the Communist-run country still faces obstacles to expanding its trade: The world's major trading nations, for now, continue to consider it a 'nonmarket economy.' That means Hanoi is vulnerable to claims that it subsidizes its exports and dumps them on the world's markets, analysts say." As a member of the WTO, the Journal says Vietnam" will likely attract more foreign investment, analysts say. In particular, the country will benefit from the removal of quotas that limit its textile exports to Europe and the US. But with WTO membership, which is expected around year's end, Hanoi will have to give up subsidies and tax breaks for domestic companies, as well as open up its markets to foreign competition."

Vietnam Schedules Terror Trial Of Three US Citizens Ahead Of Bush Visit. The Washington Post (11/8, A23, Kessler, 748K) reports, "Three US citizens, including a Florida woman whose case has thwarted passage of a major trade deal between Vietnam and the United States, will be tried on charges of terrorism in Ho Chi Minh City People's Court on Friday, a Vietnamese judge announced yesterday." The Post notes that the trial "will take place just a week before President Bush is to due to arrive in Hanoi for an Asian economic summit. Bush hopes to win congressional approval for the trade bill before departure, but Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) has prevented the bill from coming to the floor of the Senate until the woman's case is resolved."

Aid Workers Say Some Returning Home To Darfur. The New York Times (11/8, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports that villagers in a "corner of southwestern Darfur" have "begun to take halting steps toward reconciliation." According to the Times, "Much of Darfur, a vast swath of territory in western Sudan, is still a battlefield, with vicious fighting between the Sudanese government and rebel forces, and masses of people fleeing their villages each day. But there are other parts, lesser known, where people are heading the other way, going home. It is a journey that is also difficult, with homecomings that may prove to be short-lived. But aid workers estimate that there are several thousand returnees...and many more on their way."

EU-Turkey Relations Seen As Fraying. The New York Times (11/8, Bilefsky, 1.21M) reports, "The already reluctant partnership between Turkey and the European Union looks increasingly as if it may be headed for a messy breakup, prompting many in Europe and the United States to ask an uncomfortable question: will the large, secular Muslim country then look east instead of west? It is a question with potentially great consequences" and the European Commission today is to release a report "critical of the progress Turkey has made toward conforming to European standards and toward qualifying for membership." However, "A more important deadline looms next month at a European summit meeting, where leaders could decide to suspend talks with Turkey on a number of problems, while continuing in other areas. This is something the group never did as it was expanding to its current 25 members."

NYTimes Urges Turkey, EU To Continue Negotiations. The New York Times (11/8, 1.21M) editorializes, "Turkey's negotiations to join the European Union—begun with high hopes—have become a sour affair. The latest blow will fall today, when the European Commission releases a report criticizing Turkey for slowing the pace of domestic reforms and refusing to normalize relations with Cyprus. There is no mystery to either side's waning enthusiasm. Europeans, confronting the rise of violent Islamic radicalism, are wary about letting a huge Muslim country into the club. In Turkey, nationalists in and out of the military and Islamic fundamentalists are pressuring Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan to slow reforms." Although "these are tough issues," the Times says they are "not intractable" and "certainly not a reason to abandon a process that is still very much in everyone's interest."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"A Landslide For Feinstein And Governor.""
"GOP Ceded The Center And Paid The Price."
"Democrats Capture House."
"Times Editor Is Out After Fighting Cuts."
"Schwarzenegger Can Focus On Legacy."

DOJ_NMG_0091797

USA Today:
"GOP Coalition Fractured By Opposition To War."
"Tight Va. Race Could Hold Senate Key."

New York Times:
"Candidates Make Dash For Finish Line."
"Leftist Headed Toward Victory In Nicaragua."
"In Arizona, 'For Sale' Is A Sign Of The Times."
"Kidnappings Return To Haunt Long Ethnic War In Sri Lanka."
"New York Plans To Make Gender Personal Choice."

Washington Post:
"Democrats Take House."
"A Voter Rebuke For Bush, the War And The Right."
"Webb-Allen Race Too Tight To Call; Recount Possible."
"Cardin, O'Malley Claim Victory As Tally Trickles In."

Washington Times:
"Democrats Take Control Of House; Senate Hinges On Race In Virginia."
"18 Seats Switch In Early Results."
"Cardin Leads Steels For Senate."
"Allen Webb In Tight Finish."
"McCain gains Political Capital In Elections."

Detroit Free Press:
"Grandholm: 'Work Begins…At 8A.M.' Rehired Affirmation Action Ban Approved."
"Governor's Win Means She Must Pick Up Pace."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Dems Take U.S. House; Perdue Coast To Win."
"U.S. House & Senate."
"Governor."

Houston Chronicle:
"Perry Re-Elected Easily; Dems Gain In Congress."
"Republicans Lose House; Senate May Also Slip."
"Drama Fizzles Out In Governors Race."
"GOP Handily Retains The Top Spots In Texas."
"Lampson Beats Write-In Capture DeLay Seat."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Election Day; Election Day Analysis; New Voting Machines; Tennessee Senate Race; Montana Senate Race; Races Without Scandal; Iraq Police Charged With Torture; US Death Toll-Iraq; Terror Plot Unfolded; Runway Incident; Record Flooding; Presidential Aspirations.
CBS: Election Day Analysis; Bush's Election Day; Close Races; House Races; Election Day; New Voting Machines; Ballot Initiatives; Election Day Analysis; Saddam Calls For Forgiveness; Terrorist Plot Unfolded; Severe Flooding; Voting Capital.
NBC: Election Day; New Voting Machines; Election Day Analysis; Battleground States; Voting Trends; Severe Flooding; Iraqi Police Charged With Torture; Terrorist Plot Unfolded; The Clinton Thumb.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: WAR-ELECTIONS _ 10 a.m. - 10 p.m. Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan leads a protest against the war in Iraq and possibly against election results. Highlights: 11 a.m. Delivery to the White House of signatures and comments from a petition opposing an attack on Iran. Location: Lafayette Park.

STEM CELL RESEARCH _ The Institute of Medicine and the National Research Council hold a symposium on developments in the field of stem cell research. Location: National Academies, 2100 C St. NW.

HEALTH CARE _ Two-day meeting of the Consumer-Centric Healthcare Congress. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. CIGNA CEO Edward Hanway. 9:45 a.m. Allan Hubbard, National Economic Council. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

CAPITAL REGION HOMELAND SECURITY CONFERENCE _ 8 a.m. - 4:50 p.m. National Capital Region Incident Management and Homeland Security Conference. Highlights: 8:10 a.m. Keynote address by David Ekern, Commissioner, Virginia Dept. of Transportation; Michelle Pourciau, Director, District Dept. of Transportation; John Contestabile, Acting Asst. Secretary of Transportation, MD Dept of Transportation; and Tom Lockwood, director, Office of National Capital Region Coordination, Department of Homeland Security. 10:35 a.m. Remarks by Kevin Gordon, London Resilience Team Government Office for London; and Clive Wright, First Secretary, Global Issues Group, British Embassy 3 p.m. Remarks on Maryland's Evacuation Planning Program, with Tom Tran, MdSHA; followed by WMATA's Emergency Management Plans, with acting director Dan Tangherlini. Location: Dulles Expo Center, 4368 Chantilly Shopping Center, Chantilly, VA.

SPACE SHUTTLE _ 9 a.m. Joy Bryant of the Boeing International Space Station program and former astronaut Steve Osald hold a media availability to discuss the upcoming space shuttle mission. Location: Boeing offices, 1200 Wilson Blvd., Rosslyn. Notes: Available via callin: 866-560-2879; passcode: 5162471.

ETHANOL _ 9:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a program, ``Ethanol: Boon or

DOJ_NMG_0091798

Boondoggle?" The pane; will discuss of the benefits and detriments of ethanol fuel, which is held up as a solution to reducing conventional air pollutants, minimizing greenhouse-gas emissions, ending foreign oil dependency, and reinvigorating the family farm. Panelists: Bruce Dale, Department of Chemical Engineering and Materials Science, Michigan State University; David Pimentel, College of Agriculture and Life Sciences, Cornell University; and Lester Lave, Carnegie Mellon University. Moderator: Kenneth P. Green, AEI. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI, 1150 Seventeenth St. NW.

AFGHANISTAN _ 10 a.m. The U.S. Institute of Peace holds a meeting on Afghanistan five years after the fall of the Taliban, with Seth Jones of Rand Corp., Hekmat Karzai of the Center for Conflict and Peace Studies in Kabul, others. Location: 2nd floor conference room, 1200 17th St. NW.

CONSERVATIVES-MIDTERMS _ 10 a.m. Conservative leaders look at the mid-term election results and ask: What is the future of the conservative movement? What is the future of the Republican Party? What should be the future relationship between conservatives and the GOP? They will discuss a battle plan for the conservative movement between now and the 2008 presidential election. Location: National Press Club, Holeman Lounge.

ELECTION ANALYSIS _ 10 a.m. MoveOn.org holds a post-election teleconference call with an analysis of battleground races and what Congress should do next on Iraq. With Anna Greenberg, VP, Greenberg Quinlan & Rosner; Eli Pariser, executive director, MoveOn Political Action; and Tom Matzzie, Washington director, MoveOn Political Action. Contacts: Trevor Fitzgibbon, 202-822-5200. Notes: Journalists only dial in 877-707-9632. Passcode: Results.

ELECTION-CONSERVATIVES _ 10 a.m. The American Conservative Union holds a news conference to discuss the election results, with Chairman David Keene, former House Speaker Dick Armey, others. Location: National Press Club.

ELECTION-NAM _ 11 a.m. The National Association of Manufacturers and the Business Industry Political Action Committee hold a review of election results, with Jay Timmons, NAM Senior Vice President; Pat Cleary, NAM Senior Vice President; Greg Casey, BIPAC President; Bernadette Budde, BIPAC Senior Vice President; Darrell Shull, BIPAC Senior Vice President. Location: Garfield Room, Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

ELECTIONS-REYNOLDS _ 11:30 a.m. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds holds a news conference to discuss the election results. Location: Capitol Hill Club, 300 1st St. SE.

GOP-ELECTION REAX _ 11:30 a.m. The Chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee Rep. Tom Reynolds holds a press conference to discuss the 2006 midterm elections. Location: Capitol Hill Club, Eisenhower Room, 300 First St. SE.

ECONOMY _ 12 p.m. US Treasurer Anna Escobedo Cabral gives keynote remarks on the economy at a US Chamber of Commerce luncheon for the Council on Small Business. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

ELECTION RESULTS _ 12 p.m. Freedom Works hosts a post-election luncheon discussion for congressional staff and the media. With Dick Armey, former House Majority leader; Ed Goeas, president, Tarrance Group; and Kim Strassel, editorial board, Wall Street Journal. Location: Rayburn Building, Room B369.

ELECTION-BUDGET _ 12 p.m. The National Economist Club holds a program on the midterm elections, with budget expert Stan Collender of Qorvis Communications. Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

ELECTION AFTERMATH _ 12:30 p.m. The Institute for Policy Studies holds a program on the election results and aftermath and the impact on the progressive movement, with Jamin Raskin, author Michael Fauntroy and political strategist Steve Cobble. Location: Suite 600, 1112 16th St. NW.

ELECTION-LABOR _ 12:30 p.m. AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, others, hold a post-election news conference. Release of poll on impact of union voters. Location: AFL-CIO, 815 16th St. NW. Notes: Phone feed available. Call 202-637-5018 for dial in number.

ISRAEL PROJECT-MIDTERMS _ 12:30 p.m. The Israel Project hosts a lunch and Two Post-Election Panels live in Washington, D.C. or by conference call. Highlights: 1 p.m. - 2 p.m. Panel I: Political Journalists and Communications Experts: Eleanor Clift: Contributing editor and columnist for Newsweek; Clarence Page: Pulitzer-Prize winning columnist for the Chicago Tribune; Jonathan D. Salant: Reporter for Bloomberg News; Dan Hazelwood, President of Targeted Creative Communications, Inc. 2 p.m. - 3 p.m. Panel II: Political Consultants. Stan Greenberg: Chairman and CEO of Greenberg Quinlan Rosner; Neil Newhouse: Partner and co-founder of Public Opinion Strategies; Patrick McCarthy, political consultant and analyst; Marshall Wittmann: Senior fellow at the Democratic Leadership Council. Location: The Israel Project, 2020 K Street NW, 7th Floor Conference Room.

CALDERON-LATINOS _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Latino leadership organizations host a luncheon for Mexico's president-elect Felipe Calderon. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

ETHANOL _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Christine Mirzayan Science and Technology Policy Graduate Fellowship Program hosts a seminar, ``Should the Government Drive Us Down the Ethanol Road." Speakers include Dr. David Pimentel, professor of ecology and agricultural science, Cornell University; and Bill Holmberg, chairman, Biomass Coordinating Council for the American Council on Renewable Energy. Location: Keck Center of thje National Academies, 500 Fifth St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0091799

ELECTION-ENVIRONMENT _ 1 p.m. David Hayes, former Deputy Secretary of the Interior and partner and Global Chair of Latham & Watkins LLP Environment, Land & Resources Practice, holds a telephone briefing to discuss the possible impact of the election on climate change policy, reform of the Endangered Species Act, as well as public lands policy and environmental funding priorities. Contacts: Greg McCarthy, 202-637-3319.

ELECTION-ENVIRONMENT _ 1 p.m. Leaders from the League of Conservation Voters, Sierra Club, Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund and the Federation of State Conservation Voter Leagues will hold a post-electoral press conference to discuss the election results. Location: National Press Club.

CHAO-ERISA _ 1:30 p.m. Labor Secretary Chao speaks at the final meeting of the 2006 ERISA Advisory Council. Location: Secretary's Conference Room, Labor Department.

DEMOCRATIC GOVERNORS-MIDTERMS _ 1:30 p.m. Democratic Governors Association (DGA) Chair New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson will be joined at a press conference by Democratic National Committee (DNC) Chairman Gov. Howard Dean to discuss their reactions to Election Day 2006. Location: The Washington Court Hotel, Lower Lobby Level, Sagamore Hill I, 525 New Jersey Ave. NW.

ELECTION-CHRISTIANS _ 2 p.m. Christian evangelical and Catholic leaders hold a press teleconference to discuss how faith and values impacted the evangelical and Catholic vote in the 2006 election. Participants include Ewec. Jim Wallis, Tony Campolo of the Evangelical Association for the Promotion of Education, others. Notes: Callin number: 800-658-0035; passcode: Common Good.

ELECTION-AARP _ 2:30 p.m. AARP sponsors a post-election panel discussion, with former Clinton press secretary Mike McCurry, Bush media adviser Mark McKinnon, pollsters Ed Goeas and Celinda Lake, others. Location: National Press Club.

MIDTERMS-TRADE _ 2:30 p.m. There will be a press call to discuss role of trade issue in 2006 elections and what new composition of Congress means for Bush trade agenda, prospects for reform. Participants include Leo Gerard, President, United Steelworkers; and Lori Wallach, Director, Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch. Notes: Dial-In Press Call -- (800) 762-4758. (Identify as: ``Post Election Trade Issue Call'')

TAIWAN _ 3:30 p.m. The Wilson International Center for Scholars holds a program on a U.S.-Taiwan Free Trade Agreement, with Tain-Jy Chen of National Taiwan University, Dick Nanto of Congressional Research Service and Scott Kastner of the University of Maryland. Location: 5th floor auditorium, at the center, Reagan Trade Building.

CHINA-U.S. _ 5:15 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program on China policy from the White House's view, with Kenneth Lieberthal, senior director for Asia Affairs at the National Security Council from 1998 to 2000, and Michael Green, senior director for Asia Affairs at the NSC from 2004 to 2005. Location: Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

RUMSFELD DOCUMENTARY _ 7 p.m. Screening of the CNN documentary, ``Donald Rumsfeld: Man of War,'' followed by a panel discussion with retired Army Gen. John Batiste, documentary correspondent Frank Sesno, others. Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW.

CORPORATE CITIZENSHIP _ 9 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez, others. present the Corporate Citizenship Award at the 7th Annual Corporate Citizenship Awards. Location: Mellon Auditorium, 13th St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, November 8, 2006 8:34 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, November 08, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061108.pdf

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

British Muslim Sentenced In Terror Attacks (NYT) ... 3
Al-Qaeda Figure Gets Life For Plots Targeting U.S., Britain (WP) 4
FBI Rejects Report On Dropped Terror Cases (WT) ... 5
CIA Seeks More Restrictions On Senior Al Qaeda Suspects At Guantánamo (MH) ... 5
US, EU Establish 'Contact Group' To Improve Antiterror Cooperation (AFP-Y) ... 7

Homeland Response:

Top Secret! (WP) ... 7

War News:

Suspects Still At Large In Iraqi Torture Case (NYT) ... 7
Defense Issues, War In Iraq Await The New Congress (WSJ) ... 9
In The Shadow Of The Noose, Saddam Softens (CHIT) ... 9
Back In Court After Death Sentence, Saddam Calls On Iraqis To 'reconcile' (USAT) ... 10
Hussein Asks Iraqi Factions To Reconcile (WP) ... 11
Hussein Displays Courtesy After Death Sentence Fury (NYT) ... 12
Saddam Calls For Reconciliation In Court (AP) ... 13
Help Iraq Help Itself (NYT) ... 14
Army Revamps How Information Is Deemed Classified (WP) ... 15

Corporate Scandals:

Auditing Firms Urge New Ways To Detect Fraud Forensic Audit Designed To Root Out Wrongdoing Is Suggested In Policy Paper (WSJ) ... 16
Big Four Call For Financial Reports Shake-up (FT) ... 16
A Report By The World's Largest Auditors Urges Relaxed Standards For Liability (NYT) ... 17
FBI Raids New York Brokerage Sky Capital (HC) ... 18
Fraud Lands Man In Prison (DEN) ... 18

Criminal Law:

Supreme Court Asked To Apply Sentencing Rule Retroactively (USAT) ... 19
Supreme Court Debates Two Cases Involving Long Prison Terms (AP) ... 19
Jurors Convict Man Who Robbed Palmer Gun Store (PAET) ... 20
Hinds Co., FBI Looking For Suspected Copper Thieves The Clarion-Ledger (JCL) ... 20
Grapes Of Rathke By JOHN H. FUND (WSJ) ... 21
Ex-educator Gets 10 Years For Soliciting Sex (POUGHJ) ... 22
Court Clears 6 Of Criminal Charges In Crash Of French Jetliner In 1992 (NYT) ... 23
Texas Inmates Protest Conditions With Hunger Strikes (NYT) ... 23

Civil Law:

Dana Seeks Court OK For New Bonus Plan (DOW) ... 24
Abortion Foes Face Pair Of Big Tests (WSJ) ... 25
Roberts Court Faces First Abortion Cases (CSM) ... 26
All Eyes On Kennedy In Court Debate On Abortion (WP) ... 28
Abortion Rights Groups Choose Insiders To Argue High Court Cases (LAW) ... 30
Keep 'partial-birth' Ban (USAT) ... 30

Civil Rights:

FBI Investigating Va. Voter Calls (SLOT) ... 31
Bitter Webb-Allen Contest Goes Down To The Wire (USAT) ... 31
An Enormous Sigh Of Relief From Md. Election Officials (WP) ... 32
FBI Launches Probe Of Virginia Pre-election Calls (CNN) ... 34
Voter Intimidation, Dirty Tricks Alleged (BSUN/AP) ... 34
Machine Problems, Ballot Probe Mar Voting In Indiana Counties (FWNS) ... 35
Cheating To Avoid A Beating? (NYDN) ... 36
Glitches Made Voting Tough For Some (USAT) ... 37
Minor Glitches Beset Some Polling Locations Worker Miscues, Long Lines And New Machines Abound; Voter Suppression Is Alleged By JUNE KRONHOLZ, CHRISTOPHER CONKEY And YOCHI J. DREAZEN (WSJ) ... 38
Number Of Civil Rights Voting Complaints 'low' (CNN) ... 39
NAACP Alleges Voting Irregularities (WXYZ) ... 40
House Democrats Seek Probe Of Republican Campaigning (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 40
Justice, OPM Send Observers To Polling Places (FCW) ... 40
Record Number Of Feds Monitor Elections (FEDTIMES) ... 41
Justice, OPM Dispatch Hundreds Of Poll Watchers (GOVEXEC) 41
Ban On Same-Sex Unions Added To Va. Constitution (WP) ... 42
Macon Council Votes To Pursue City-county Consolidation (MACT) ... 43
Tiny Austin Water District Challenging Voting Rights Act (AAS) ... 43
Vouchers In Black And White (WSJ) ... 44

Antitrust:

Private Equity Deals Face Wider Probe (FT) ... 45

EU Clears Philips To Buy Intermagnetics (AP-YBIZ) 46
World Cup Won't Get Visa's Help In MasterCard Sponsorship Suit (WSJ) 46

Environment:

'We Dodged A Bullet' In This Hurricane Season (USAT) 47
Forest Fire Strategy: Just Let It Go (USAT) 47
Boaters Beware: Things Are Jumping On Missouri River High-Flying Carp Pose Threat To Fishermen, U.S. Says; Solution: Eat Them (WSJ) 48
Clean And Sober (WSJ) 50

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

South Dakotans Reject Tough Abortion Ban (AP) 51
Gay Marriage Ban Backed In Colorado, Gay Benefits Failing (AP) 52
Nevada Voters Raise Minimum Wage, Curb Eminent Domain (AP) 52
44: Legalization Bid Falls Flat (DENP) 53
Marijuana Amendment Goes Up In Smoke (RMN) 53
Pro-pot Proposal Takes A Big Hit (RMN) 54
A-44 Shot Down (CD) 55
Governor's Race Leads Colorado Tip From Red To Blue (WT) .. 56
Mesa County Kids Voting Tabs Differ From Polls On Many Issues (GJDS) 57
Voters Say No To Legalizing Marijuana (KMGH) 57
Voters Reject Marijuana Measure (LVJR) 58
Big Wins For Gibbons, Ensign, And Heller (KOLO) 59
Support Short For Medical Marijuana (SFAL) 59
South Dakotans Defeat Medical Marijuana Measure (AP) 59
FBI Probing Theft Of 1.8m Pills From Warehouse In Mansfield (BOS) 60
States Confront Meth-lab Threat To Environment (CSM) 60
Source: Graham Gets Letter From USADA (AP) 62
$2.2M Found In Probe Of Cocaine Kingpin (PTR) 62
$2 Milliion In Cash Found In Penn Hills Home (KDKA) 63
Man Pleads Guilty In Explosives Case (DMN) 63

Tax:

Report: Merck Discloses 4 Tax Disputes In U.S. And Canada With $5.58B Potential Liabilities (AP) 64

Congress-Administration:

Resurgent Democrats Win Control Of House (AP-Y) 65
GOP's '94 'revolutionaries' Among The Fallen (USAT) 66
Democrats Win House Control In Midterm Elections; Senate Still In Doubt (USAT) 68
GOP Loses 4 Key Senate Races, Wins Tenn. (AP-Y) 70
Democrats Seize Control Of US House (FT) 71
Tight Va. Race Could Hold Senate Key (USAT) 72
Loss Of House Is Rare Defeat For Bush (AP-Y) 73
Democrats Take Control Of House; Decisive Races In Senate Are Tight (NYT) 74
GOP Ceded The Middle And Paid The Price (LAT) 76
A Voter Rebuke For Bush, The War And The Right (WP) 78
A Loud Message For Bush (NYT) 79
Democrats Take Control Of House; Virginia Could Determine Senate (WSJ) 81
Democrats Take Control Of House; Senate Hinges On Race In Virginia (WT) 84
Republican Blame Game Begins (WT) 85
GOP Coalition Fractured By Opposition To War (USAT) 86
Democrats Wrest Control Of The House (LAT) 89
Democrats Take House (WP) 89
Vote Seen As A Poll On Bush (MINNST) 92
Webb Has A Slim Edge Over Allen, But Recount Likely (WP) 93
Allen, Webb In Tight Finish (WT) 95
Webb's Margin Grows (RTD) 96
Tester Leads Burns As Count Drags On (BG) 97
Burns Narrows Gap, Trails Tester By 1 Percent (GFT) 99
Some Vets Of Iraq, Afghanistan Lose Their Election Day Battles (USAT) 99
Election Leaves Women Poised To Play A Greater Role In Politics (WSJ) 99
Election Juxtaposes Ballots And Bullets (WSJ) 101
The Voters' Message (WP) 102
Post-Election Job Number One (NYT) 103
Can Bush Salvage His 2nd Term? (USAT) 103
Billing Errors Dog Medicare Drug Benefit Since Its Start (USAT) 104
States With Insurance Holes In Medicare Drug Plans On Rise By KRISTEN GERENCHER (WSJ) 105
Playing Medi-scare Again (WT) 106
No Simple Formula For Understanding Lawmakers' Pay (WP) 107
Two Books, Two Different Democratic Tones (WSJ) 108

Other News:

Borrowing By Consumers Eases, But Credit-Card Balances Jump (WSJ) 109
Orders For New Homes Tumble (LAT/BLOOM) 109
High-End Or Starter Homes, Builders Remain In A Slump (NYT) 110
Home Builders Report Declines (USAT/AP) 111
Dow Rises Again, Nearly A Record, On Boeing Rally Predictions Of A Divided Congress Gave Investors A Reason To Buy, Along With A Drop In Oil Futures By PETER A. MCKAY (WSJ) 111
Stocks Climb On Gridlock Expectations (USAT) 112
Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger Wins Reelection (LAT) 112
Schwarzenegger Easily Beats Angelides To Win Second Term (SFC) 114
Schwarzenegger Could Use Win To Take On Health Care Revisions (USAT) 115
Investment By Oil Industry Stalls (WSJ) 116
Drilling Deep In The Gulf Of Mexico (NYT) 117
All Slander All The Time (WSJ) 119
Let's Stop Stereotyping Evangelicals (WP) 120
The Task For Mr. Spitzer (NYT) 121
At The U.N., Discord Over Confronting Iran's Nuclear Ambitions (NYT) 121
U.S. Hits Russia On Erosion Of Nuclear Sanctions (WT) 122
Iran's Target Practice (WSJ) 123

DOJ_NMG_0091803

Karen's Rules On Diplomacy: Talk To The Media -- If You Dare (WP) 123
Fence Could Wear On U.S., Mexico Issues (USAT) 124
State Department Official Picked To Run U.N. Food Program (WP) 125
U.S. Pick Gets U.N. Agency Position (LAT) 126
U.N. Names Head Of Food Program (WSJ/AP) 127
Israel Declares End To Gaza Mission, But Firing Continues (NYT) 127
Israel Withdraws Most Forces From Gaza Strip (WP) 128
Nicaraguans' Votes Are In, And Ortega Is Back (NYT) 129
Ortega Wins Back Presidency Of Nicaragua (WP) 130
Former Marxist Elected President In Nicaragua (CHIT) 131
Ortega Appears Set For Nicaragua's Presidency (CSM) 132
Panama To Join Security Council (LAT) 133
WTO Entry No Cure-All For Vietnam Hanoi's 'Nonmarket' Status Will Give Trading Partners A Leg Up In Negotiations By JAMES HOOKWAY (WSJ) 134
Vietnam Schedules Terror Trial Of Three U.S. Citizens For Friday (WP) 135
In A Calm Corner Of Darfur, Villagers Rebuild Ties (NYT) 136
Turkey And Europe: Why Strained Friendship Is Fraying (NYT) 138
Turkey And The European Union (NYT) 139

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Muslim Sentenced In Terror Attacks (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 7 — A British Muslim was sentenced Tuesday to a minimum of 40 years for planning terror attacks in the United States and Britain intended to bring what the judge in the case called carnage "on a colossal and unprecedented scale."

The defendant, Dhiren Barot, 34, was said by the police to have been the most senior figure of Al Qaeda brought to trial in Britain. The sentence he received was one of the longest handed down in recent years, reflecting claims by British counterterrorism officers that they had thwarted major conspiracies when they arrested him in August 2004, after he made detailed observations to plan synchronized attacks in New York, Newark, London and Washington, D.C.

Peter Clarke, the head of London's counterterrorism police, called him "a determined and experienced terrorist" who was "a very important Al Qaeda figure."

He added, "If he had succeeded, hundreds, if not thousands, could have died."

No evidence was presented at trial, however, that Mr. Barot was on the brink of carrying out an attack when he was arrested.

At that time, his ability to temporarily evade British surveillance set off a major terrorism alert in the United States. According to accounts by the British police, Mr. Barot eluded surveillance teams in Britain in July 2004, just as evidence emerged in Pakistan that he planned to attack buildings using limousines packed with gas canisters.

When counterintelligence operatives caught up with him a few days later, he was arrested, according to police accounts.

"This was no noble cause," Judge Neil Butterfield told Mr. Barot during sentencing at Woolwich Crown Court. He added: "Your intention was not simply to cause damage, panic or fear. Your intention was to murder, but it went further. It was designed to strike at the very heart of democracy and the security of the state."

As outlined by prosecutors, Mr. Barot was born in India, but moved to Britain with his parents while still an infant. He converted to Islam in his early 20s, worked for a while as an airline ticketing clerk and attended terrorism training facilities in Pakistan and possibly Afghanistan, the prosecutors said.

His plans for attacks in the United States were put on hold after the Sept. 11 attacks, and he began to focus on Britain. He planned attacks using so-called dirty bomb radiation devices and the detonation of a subway train under the River Thames.

The authorities on Tuesday released a huge array of documents, many of them blacked out to prevent other terrorists from using the same information, including photographs and video clips that the police contended were used in Mr. Barot's research for the planned attacks.

One clip, shot in April 2001, shows the World Trade Center in Manhattan. A person can be heard making a sound like an explosion, but prosecutors offered no evidence linking Mr. Barot to 9/11.

A map, also released Tuesday by the British police, showed a route reportedly taken in Lower Manhattan by Mr. Barot as he filmed reconnaissance video between Broadway and South Street.

The video had been hidden by splicing it into a copy of the Bruce Willis movie "Die Hard: With a Vengeance" about bombings in New York, the police said.

DOJ_NMG_0091804

The prosecution said Mr. Barot's targets included the New York Stock Exchange and Citigroup buildings in New York, the World Bank and International Monetary Fund headquarters in Washington and the Prudential building in Newark.

The documents — many of them from computer hard drives — include cost assessments, detailed plans for detonating explosives and other assessments relating to potential terror attacks.

After describing his plans to use limousines packed with explosives, in one document released Tuesday, Mr. Barot wrote, "Projects are planned to be coordinated back to back as they were with 9/11, thus forming another memorable black day for the enemies of Islam."

He pleaded guilty last month to a charge of conspiracy to murder. Seven other people are to be tried in connection with the case next year.

Al-Qaeda Figure Gets Life For Plots Targeting U.S., Britain (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 7 -- An al-Qaeda operative who planned to bomb the World Bank in Washington and the New York Stock Exchange as well as other landmarks in the United States and Britain was sentenced to life in prison Tuesday.

Dhiren Barot, 34, a former airline ticket clerk and Muslim convert, was arrested in London in 2004 and pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit mass murder.

"You have chosen to use your life to bring death and destruction to the Western world," Judge Neil Butterfield told an impassive Barot in a London courtroom. "You were planning to bring indiscriminate carnage, bloodshed and butchery . . . on a colossal and unprecedented scale." His sentence provides the possibility of parole after 40 years.

According to prosecutors who read from Barot's notes and computer files, Barot was pleased by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and planned to kill hundreds, if not thousands, of people in the United States and Britain to create "another memorable black day for the enemies of Islam."

Concern about his plots led President Bush to heighten security alerts and tighten security at financial buildings in the Northeast in 2004. British police seized documents that included detailed drawings of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and other buildings.

Prosecutors said Barot's planned attacks in Britain were more imminent than those in the United States. He was drawing several plans for synchronized attacks in London, including blowing up a subway train as it passed in a tunnel under the Thames River and exploding limousines loaded with gas cylinders near the Savoy, Ritz and other London hotels.

Prosecutor Edmund Lawson said Barot also kept documents in which he said he wanted to add napalm and nails to the bombs to "heighten the terror and chaos."

"I quote Barot's own words," Lawson said. " 'Imagine the chaos that would be caused if a powerful explosion were to rip through here and actually rupture the river itself. This would cause pandemonium, what with the explosions, flooding, drowning, et cetera, that would occur.' "

Lawson said Barot made a detailed proposal to al-Qaeda financiers in Pakistan, laying out, for example, that he wanted to use a six-man team to blow up the limousines.

"The fact that he wanted to do so many things at once was part of his downfall," said Michael Clarke, a terrorism expert at King's College in London. "It was so big that it would have been very difficult to carry out."

Clarke said Barot might be the "most ambitious" al-Qaeda operative captured in Britain, because he was planning a series of attacks that would create public panic.

Barot, who sat expressionless taking notes as evidence was presented against him, was born in India and raised in Britain. He now faces extradition to the United States, where he has been indicted on terror charges, including conspiring to use unconventional weapons to murder.

Barot's attorney, Ian Macdonald, said Barot's plans were "rough" and far from a point at which they could be executed.

But prosecutors said he was determined and thorough, having trained in terror camps in Afghanistan, Pakistan and other countries. On a trip to the United States in 2001, they said, he researched and filmed his targets, at one point shooting footage from a tourist helicopter flight over Manhattan. His targets included the Citigroup headquarters in New York and the Prudential building in Newark, N.J.

In the courtroom, Lawson showed clips of a video taken by Barot during a visit to New York. When the camera zoomed in on the World Trade Center's towers, a man is heard mimicking the sound of an explosion. According to the Associated Press, the footage was found spliced into a videotape of the Bruce Willis movie "Die Hard With a Vengeance."

DOJ_NMG_0091805

The AP, the BBC and Times Newspapers Ltd. successfully challenged a court ruling that threatened to prevent news media from reporting details of Barot's two-day sentencing hearing, opening the way for the public to hear the details of his terror plot.

The court had originally ruled that publishing details of the case could prejudice trials of seven other defendants linked to Barot who are to be tried next year.

"For well over two years we have been unable to show the British public the reality of the threat they faced from this man. Now they can see for themselves the full horror of his plan," said Peter Clarke, the head of Scotland Yard's anti-terrorist branch.

FBI Rejects Report On Dropped Terror Cases (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

The FBI rejected as "inaccurate" a report by a research organization that said federal prosecutors turned down the vast majority of the international terrorism cases brought by the bureau during the first nine months of fiscal 2006.

The report, by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse (TRAC), raised what it called "troubling questions" about the FBI's investigation of criminal matters involving persons the government has identified as international terrorists.

The TRAC report said the percentage of FBI referrals involving suspected terrorists that were rejected by Justice Department lawyers in the past few years has been generally increasing and reached a peak of 87 percent in fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30.

As a result of decisions by prosecutors to turn down international terrorism referrals, especially in the past few years, the report said the annual number of terrorism prosecutions was down from 118 in fiscal 2002 to "only 19 in the first nine months" of fiscal 2006 based on the latest FBI data available.

"It is astonishing that TRAC continues to present statistics that demonstrate a fundamental misunderstanding of the basic principles on how federal investigations and prosecutions work," the FBI said in a statement.

"This report contains inaccurate figures, relies on a faulty assumption that every referral from an investigative agency should result in a criminal prosecution and ignores the reality of how the war on terrorism is being conducted, particularly the value of early disruption of potential terrorist acts with proactive investigation and prosecution," it said.

The FBI said that while the TRAC report specifically questions the number of international terrorism referrals from the FBI that were not prosecuted, "the reality is that a referral does not mean that criminal charges should be filed."

"Often, matters are referred to prosecutors to assist in further investigation through the use of criminal investigative tools that require legal process such as a subpoena or surveillance order," the FBI said.

The TRAC report said that prior to September 11, Justice Department lawyers prosecuted two out of three referrals for international terrorism but that in the 12 months immediately following the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, the prosecutions surged sharply higher than in the previous year but has since significantly declined.

The bureau also said there were a number of factual reporting errors in the TRAC report.

"Specifically, TRAC is not clear what its declination rate refers to, but the actual matter declination rate for international terrorism cases is 67 percent," the FBI said. "Instead of referring to the actual 36 defendants charged with international terrorism offenses in FY 06 (up to June; 40 during the full year), TRAC mysteriously comes up with 19.

"In addition, 20 defendants were charged with terrorist hoaxes in FY 06," the FBI said.

CIA Seeks More Restrictions On Senior Al Qaeda Suspects At Guantánamo (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, November 8, 2006

Even as 14 top al Qaeda suspects are in U.S. military custody, the CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around the high-value detainees now held at the Guantánamo Bay detention center, including alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton, in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Guantánamo captive Majid Khan, one of the 14.

The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called "black sites," out of reach of the International Red Cross, are national security secrets.

Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extra-judicial detention of her client, to ``conceal illegal or embarrassing Executive conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0091806

Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he is linked to a series of unhatched plots: to blow up gas stations in the United States, to poison U.S. water supplies and to assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

It is not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links; and he has so far not been charged with a crime.

At least some of the 14 men whom President Bush ordered handed over to the military this summer were reportedly submitted to harsh, classified interrogation techniques, including a simulated drowning to break their will, called ``water-boarding."

Moreover, court documents filed by the government suggest that the 14 newest arrivals at Guantánamo, among them alleged Osama bin Laden deputies, would never be integrated into the general population of 437 or so captives -- for fear they would tell other captives about their secret confinement, who could in turn pass on the details to their lawyers.

In seeking to redefine attorney-client contacts, Justice Department lawyers offered a seven-page affidavit from a CIA officer named Marilyn Dorn, who describes herself as ``the Information Review Officer for the National Clandestine Service."

Her office, she says, decides what secret CIA documents can be provided to civilian U.S. courts without jeopardizing ``CIA interests, personnel or facilities."

Because Khan was held for three years in a "top secret" program, she says ``he may have come into possession of information, including locations of detention, conditions of detention and alternative interrogation techniques."

Attorney disclosure in court records of those details, she argues, could compromise clandestine relationships between the U.S. and its foreign allies.

All civilian lawyers at Guantánamo already go through a rigorous security screening before they are allowed to visit; they then must turn over their notes to the military before they can leave the remote Navy base in southeast Cuba. They can only disclose their contents by permission of a classification review team set up by the federal courts.

Now, the CIA seeks a more restrictive review and disclosure process whose "particulars . . . are still being worked out," says Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist.

She could not say whether the government will again propose to eavesdrop on attorney-client meetings, authority a court refused to grant three years ago.

The Khan case also illustrates the ongoing Bush administration effort to curb civilian court intrusion at Guantánamo, a process that has evolved fitfully around two and a half years of court rulings on detainee rights:

First, it says, Khan, a Maryland high school graduate, cannot sue for his freedom in U.S. District Court because Congress has stripped Guantánamo captives of standard habeas corpus recourse.

If he does see a civilian lawyer, it adds, the contents of what he says should be subject to top-secret-style protections more severe than current, ongoing secrecy reviews.

"As each day passes, the likelihood increases that Petitioner Khan will suffer from memory loss and other psychological injuries that will impede his capacity to assist in his representation," his lawyer argues.

Counters Blomquist, the Justice Department spokeswoman: ``Khan's and other cases may involve unique, potentially highly classified information not involved in prior Guantánamo cases."

Gutierrez is already acquainted with the Bush administration's tough interrogation policies through an earlier Guantánamo client -- a Saudi named Mohammed al Qahtani whom the Pentagon subjected to such severe interrogation techniques at the Navy base that FBI agents protested to headquarters.

President Bush identified the 14 men, with 10 different nationalities, around Labor Day as part of a campaign to promote a new plan for holding war crimes trials at Guantánamo to replace an earlier scheme ruled unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court.

None have been charged and none have yet seen lawyers, although they were described by the White House two months ago as the masterminds and financiers of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the October 2000 suicide bombing of the USS Cole that killed 17 American sailors in Yemen and the Oct. 12, 2002, bomb attack that killed 202 people at a popular resort area in Bali.

The filing also reflects government concerns that the new arrivals might broadcast CIA secrets among the captives, through what commanders call the DIN, Detainee Information Network.

Guantánamo commanders and guards have noted for some time that captives spread the news as they have been shuttled between cellblocks, the hospitals and different accommodations designed to reward good behavior.

Prison camp commanders won't say where Khan and the other new arrivals are being housed, but say their prison conditions are the same as longer-held captives at Guantánamo.

DOJ_NMG_0091807

US, EU Establish 'Contact Group' To Improve Antiterror Cooperation (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 8, 2006

The United States and the European Union have created a group to bolster cooperation in the battle against terrorism and other crime-fighting initiatives.

"We decided to establish a high-level contact group, not to carry out a bureaucratic exercise, but to try to identify how our common values, our common principles, can be translated to common proposals," European Justice Commissioner Franco Frattini told reporters here Monday.

"We need a positive spirit of cooperation, ... not focus on divisions and different approaches," added Frattini, who was at the center of tense negotiations with Washington last month regarding the transfer of airline passenger data.

For his part, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the creation of a contact group "will improve the cooperation between prosecutors in the United States and prosecutors and magistrates in EU member states, and it will enhance our ability to fight international crime."

Gonzales said such cooperation has already taken place on a case-by-case basis when states' laws have allowed officials to share pertinent information in criminal cases, but he would not specify what types of information would be shared more freely under the new agreement.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Top Secret! (WP)

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

AGENERATION of baby boom bureaucrats is retiring from the federal government. Anywhere from 900,000 to 1.8 million workers will leave the government in the next six years. But according to a recent report from the Government Accountability Office, the government isn't filling positions that require security background checks fast enough -- and the delay is costing federal agencies money and talent.

The average wait for applications for the top-secret security clearances that the GAO examined was 446 days. The Post's Stephen Barr reported last week that the Bush administration appears to be in danger of violating the 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act, which stipulates that 80 percent of applications for federal security clearances must be completed in an average of 120 days by Dec. 17.

The GAO warns that such delays may increase costs and pose risks to national security. The Post's Karen DeYoung and Walter Pincus reported last month that government contractors -- which employ an increasingly large contingent of the Homeland Security and Defense Department workforce because of federal hiring caps -- are offering bonuses and perks to lure workers who already hold clearances away from direct government employment, significantly increasing the cost of hiring the same people. Long waits for security clearances also drive away talent.

Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, says that the wait time has been cut since the GAO gathered its data. Ms. Springer said that in the past quarter, her agency, which conducts roughly 90 percent of the background investigations in the security clearance process, finished 34 percent of its investigations in the time required by law. That is encouraging, but the rate needs to more than double.

Finishing investigations quickly and doing a good job can be competing goals. Ms. Springer's agency has to complete basic administrative reforms that would decrease the time investigations take without harming their quality, which too often is poor. Some of the best reforms the Office of Personnel Management could make would improve both efficiency and quality, such as retraining a crop of inexperienced new investigators brought in to handle the high number of security clearance requests after Sept. 11, 2001, or conducting serious, regular audits of investigators' work. Competent background checks are ultimately more valuable than fast ones, but there is no reason the government can't have both.

WAR NEWS:

Suspects Still At Large In Iraqi Torture Case (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091808

BAGHDAD, Nov. 7 — Some of the 55 Interior Ministry employees charged with torturing prisoners at a detention center in eastern Baghdad remain free, even though arrest warrants for them were issued as long as two months ago, officials said Tuesday.

Ministry officials announced Monday that the employees, including 18 officers, had been charged after more than five months of investigations into the center, known as Site 4, which was run by an Interior Ministry police unit. A joint Iraqi-American inspection of the prison in May found more than 1,400 prisoners, including at least 37 teenagers or children, jammed into a small area. Some had been beaten or bound and hung by their arms.

Some employees have already been arrested, according to ministry officials. A police general was also implicated; he was demoted and does not face criminal charges, officials said. Another officer accused in the case had been killed in the line of duty, they added.

Searing violence continued in Iraq on Tuesday, including an attack by a suicide bomber inside a Baghdad coffee shop late in the day, killing at least 17 civilians and wounding at least 20, an Interior Ministry official said.

Warrants for the arrest of at least 52 of the suspects in the Site 4 case were issued by the end of August, according to the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq, though Iraqi officials at the Interior Ministry refused to confirm that assertion. Ministry officials said all the implicated employees had been suspended from their posts, though the officials refused to explain why some employees remained free, leaving open the possibility that they may have fled.

Iraq's police forces, which are overseen by the Interior Ministry, have long been accused of operating torture chambers inside detention centers, but the charges are the first against the ministry's employees in connection with such allegations, said Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf, the ministry spokesman.

Sunni Arab detainees have accused members of the Shiite-led security forces of seeking sectarian revenge inside ministry-run prisons. Ministry officials acknowledged Tuesday that a majority of the detainees in Site 4 were Sunni Arabs, but they denied that those suspected of torturing them were operatives for Shiite militias.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in September that he had warned Iraqi leaders that unless they pursued the Site 4 case vigorously, the United States might be forced to suspend aid to the police under the so-called Leahy Law, which prohibits the financing of foreign security forces that commit "gross violations of human rights."

But it remained unclear why the Interior Ministry decided to disclose the prosecution of its employees this week, as was first reported by The Washington Post. General Khalaf said an investigative committee inside the ministry had finally concluded its inquest into the case, prompting the prosecutions and allowing Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani to publicize the charges.

When he took office in late May, Mr. Bolani vowed to clean house. Last month, he began reorganizing the ministry's police forces in response to concerns about militia influence and abuse.

On Oct. 4, he suspended an entire Iraqi police brigade on suspicion that members may have permitted or participated in death squad killings. And on Oct. 17, he removed the two top commanders overseeing police units widely criticized as being heavily infiltrated by Shiite militias.

Mr. Bolani also says he has fired more than 3,000 employees since he took over, some for corruption and human rights violations, and has referred 300 to 600 of those cases to the Iraqi court system.

While Western officials and some Iraqi officials say Mr. Bolani has already gone much further than his predecessors, they worry that he lacks enough political support to conduct all the necessary purges, particularly at the ministry's upper levels.

Last November, American soldiers entered the basement of a different Interior Ministry building in Baghdad and found 169 malnourished prisoners, some of whom, the Americans said, had been tortured. Most of those prisoners were Sunni Arabs. A senior ministry official said Tuesday that the investigative files regarding that case were still under review.

In December, a surprise American-Iraqi search of yet another Baghdad detention center, which was run by an Iraqi commando unit attached to the Interior Ministry, uncovered an even larger number of prisoners in severely overcrowded conditions, with 13 of the prisoners needing to be hospitalized. An inquiry showed that no abuses had been committed there, according to the senior ministry official, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the investigations.

The authorities said Tuesday that at least 25 people were killed and dozens wounded in Baghdad and in Diyala Province.

The American military command said an American soldier was killed by a bomb on Monday in Baghdad. A day earlier, the military announced the deaths of five other American service members, two in a helicopter crash north of Baghdad and three in fighting west of the capital. A British soldier was killed in an attack on Monday in the southern city of Basra; his was the first British death this month, officials said.

Sheik Bashir al-Najafi, a member of the marjaiah, the Shiite religious council of four grand ayatollahs in Najaf, said Tuesday that the council had supported the largest Shiite bloc in the last national elections to ensure Shiite dominance.

DOJ_NMG_0091809

The statement was the marjaiah's first admission that it had backed the bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance; during the elections, the council had refused to openly endorse any party. Grand Ayatollah Najafi's statement appeared to be motivated in part by concern that the bloc was fracturing, saying that disagreement between the Shiite parties "will serve the enemies of Iraq."

Defense Issues, War In Iraq Await The New Congress (WSJ)

By Rebecca Christie

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- National-defense questions and the war in Iraq await the new Congress once the election is over, no matter how the Republicans and Democrats will share power, analysts said.

On Election Day, the most common prediction was that Democrats would take over the House, with Republicans keeping the Senate. This scenario doesn't pit a unified Congress against the White House, but it is expected to turn up the heat nonetheless.

House Armed Services Committee Democrats have a stack of military credentials, based on their own service and that of their children, said Jim Wiltraut, a director of government relations at Washington law firm Buchanan, Ingersoll & Rooney. On the Senate side, a Republican victory points toward Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), a prominent Vietnam War veteran, as Senate Armed Services Committee chairman.

Both will seek to prove themselves in the two years leading up to the 2008 presidential election, Mr. Wiltraut said. As a result, the White House may face a stream of oversight and accountability hearings amid the search for a new solution to Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"I don't think that you come up to a solution to the problem unless you look at what got you to where you are. That's the only way you'll be able to get a clear look at the battlefield," said Mr. Wiltraut, a military veteran who also has worked as a congressional staffer.

Analysts generally expect defense spending patterns won't change all that much. However, there could be a shift from Republican priorities like missile defense to areas like body armor and combat vehicles that have a more immediate connection to Iraq and Afghanistan operations.

If Democrats take control of at least one house in Congress, they will have much more power to seek documents and other data from a reluctant administration, said Center for Defense Information senior adviser Philip Coyle, who was the Pentagon's chief weapons tester under former President Bill Clinton. The House generally has supported the Bush White House, making it hard for critics to seek information.

But a McCain-led Senate panel also would put new pressure on the Pentagon. Mr. McCain has been a longtime critic of Defense Department weapons buying practices, such as the Air Force's ill-fated attempt to lease Boeing Co. tankers and Lockheed Martin Corp.'s former practice of selling military cargo planes through a commercial-style multiyear contract.

Mr. McCain has repeatedly called in the Government Accountability Office and other watchdog groups for advice on how to make the Pentagon's system less prone to cost overruns and conflicts of interest. GAO chief David Walker, the U.S. comptroller general, said Mr. McCain is dedicated to improving the system.

Some defense insiders cautioned that the Democrats must be wary of squandering any new power they gain in yesterday's election. Lexington Institute defense consultant Loren Thompson said Democrats shouldn't make any big cuts without military advice, nor should they push for an immediate pullout.

Write to Rebecca Christie at rebecca.christie@dowjones.com1

In The Shadow Of The Noose, Saddam Softens (CHIT)

By Borzou Daragahi

Chicago Tribune, November 8, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A subdued Saddam Hussein, already sentenced to death in a human rights trial that concluded Sunday, walked into a courtroom again today and called on warring Iraqis outside to let bygones be bygones.

"I call upon all Iraqis, Arabs and Kurds, to forgive, reconcile, and shake hands," the former dictator said after recounting tales of how both the Prophet Mohammad and Jesus Christ both showed forgiveness to their enemies.

Hussein and six other defendants face charges of crimes against humanity for their role in orchestrating the 1988 Anfal campaign, in which Iraqi forces attempted to crush a Kurdish rebellion in the north by destroying countryside villages that harbored anti-government guerrillas.

In the months-long campaign, Hussein's government allegedly killed tens of thousands of Kurds, many of them women and children buried in mass graves after being riddled with bullets.

DOJ_NMG_0091810

Hussein and two other co-defendants already face the death penalty for crimes against humanity for their roles in targeting the Shiite village of Dujayl. That case is subject to an automatic appellate review which begins in no later than four weeks.

Today's court session came amid continued violence in Iraq.

A U.S. soldier in the capital was reported killed, the military said today. He died at approximately 10:40 p.m. Monday of wounds he sustained after the vehicle he was in was struck by a bomb in northwest Baghdad. Authorities in the capital also discovered the bodies of at least 10 men likely killed in sectarian attacks.

In the southern city of Basra, a British soldier was killed Monday by gunmen in city's downtown, said British army Capt. Tane Dunlop said today.

The defendants in the Anfal case include Hussein's cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, known popularly as "Chemical" Ali for his alleged role in dropping bombs loaded with mustard and nerve gas on Kurdish villages and towns during the late 1980s.

Witnesses today described an August 25, 1988 incident in the village of Koreme near the far northern Iraqi city of Dohuk, where three Kurdish dozen villagers were shot by firing squad. At least five survived.

Saddam, who lambasted the judge and the court Sunday and jabbed his finger at the air as the charges were read against him, kept cool today. One witness described escaping from a firing squad, eventually escaping to a cave where he recovered from gunshot wounds.

"I saw 16 soldiers standing, and one of the two officers said sit down,' and the other said 'shoot,'" said Qahar Khaleel Mohammed, a 52-year-old Kurd. "As the shooting started, we fell to the ground."

Hussein stood to complain that witness testimony was not supported by other evidence.

"These two officers [who led the firing squad], what are their names?" he demanded of one witness. "All the complainants took us on a tour, but there is no one to check, only [the witness's] name. Who supports his claim? Nobody. No one."

Hussein's privately retained lawyers continued to boycott the courtroom. They have refused to attend the Anfal trial, arguing that Judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa was predisposed against the defense. Court-appointed lawyers have taken their place.

Back In Court After Death Sentence, Saddam Calls On Iraqis To 'reconcile' (USAT)

By Rick Jervis,

USA Today, November 8, 2006

BAGHDAD — In his first public appearance since being condemned to the gallows, a somber Saddam Hussein pleaded for peace Tuesday.

"I call upon all Iraqis — Arabs and Kurds — to forgive, reconcile and shake hands," he said in court here.

Saddam, 69, is on trial for his role in a 1988 crackdown on Kurds known as the Anfal campaign. He was found guilty and sentenced to death Sunday in a separate trial. In that case, he was convicted of war crimes in connection with the deaths of 148 Shiites in the village of Dujail following an attempt on his life in 1982.

Iraq's former dictator will continue to be tried in the Anfal case while an automatic appeals process plays out in the Dujail conviction.

Saddam has often used his appearances in court as a platform to make speeches, attempting to divert attention from the charges he faces and rally public opinion.

Some Iraqis applauded Saddam's courtroom remarks. "This is a great call," said Haval Anwar, 46, a Kurdish Iraqi who lives in Baghdad. "I hope Arabs and Kurds comply with it and get rid of all these problems," he said.

During the 10 months of the Dujail trial, Saddam was consistently defiant. He often shouted over the judge's demands and occasionally called on Iraqis to resist U.S. and Iraqi military forces.

He has also called for sectarian killings to stop. "I call upon you, the Iraqi people, to stop wounding each other," he said during a court session March 15.

His manner was subdued Tuesday. Saddam, dressed in a dark suit and white shirt, sat quietly along with the other six defendants and calmly took notes as four Kurdish witnesses gave testimony.

Saddam and his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid — dubbed "Chemical Ali" for his alleged role in poison gas attacks in the Anfal campaign — are charged with genocide. The other defendants are accused of crimes against humanity and war crimes. All could be sentenced to death by hanging if convicted.

In other Iraq news:

·Iraq's Interior Ministry said it has charged 57 members of the Iraqi police in the alleged torture of hundreds of detainees at a prison in eastern Baghdad known as Site No. 4. Among those charged were a general, 19 officers, 20 non-commissioned officers and 17 patrolmen or civilian employees.

DOJ_NMG_0091811

·Police told the Associated Press that two mortar shells slammed into a coffee shop in a Shiite neighborhood in north Baghdad, killing at least 14 people and wounding 16. The attack followed mortar fire on a Sunni neighborhood across the Tigris River earlier in the day that killed seven people and wounded 25.

Hussein Asks Iraqi Factions To Reconcile (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 7 -- A subdued Saddam Hussein returned to his Kurdish genocide trial in Baghdad on Tuesday, two days after another court sentenced him to death for war crimes, and in an unusually conciliatory moment called for the people of war-torn Iraq to forgive one another.

Hussein, 69, was sentenced on Sunday to hang for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad, in the 1980s. The sentence, which sparked a long, vitriolic outburst from Hussein, is being appealed while the former dictator continues to stand trial in another case involving the deaths of as many as 100,000 Kurds, many in poison gas attacks, in the so-called Anfal campaign of 1987-88.

Hussein, in his trademark, ill-fitting charcoal gray suit and open-collared white shirt, took an active role in his trial Tuesday, minus the theatrical bluster and tirades that have marked many of his other court appearances.

After one witness testified that Hussein had said all Kurds were saboteurs, Hussein raised a finger to ask a question.

"Saddam Hussein has written more than 70 books, small ones, big ones," he said, referring to himself in the third person. "When did Saddam say that the Kurds, all of them, were saboteurs?"

That question prompted a five-minute back-and-forth between the judge and the witness about the veracity of the allegation. When attention finally returned to Hussein, he explained how Jesus and the prophet Muhammad believed in forgiveness.

"I call on all Iraqis -- Arabs and Kurds -- to forgive, reconcile and make up," he said.

Hussein also occasionally challenged a witness from a small village in Dahuk province, in the extreme north of Iraq on the border with Turkey, who described living in a cave during the Anfal campaign and surrendering to Iraqi soldiers after hearing that an amnesty had been declared. The soldiers separated the townspeople by age and gender, then led a group of 37 men into the woods and shot them repeatedly, he said.

"I was standing then. There were 16 soldiers facing us with two lieutenants," said Qahar Khalil Mohammed, a farmer who now is 61. "One of the lieutenants said, 'Sit down,' and immediately the other one said, 'Shoot.' The soldiers all fired on us, and we collapsed on the ground."

"When they finished the bullets in the Kalashnikovs, they reloaded with new bullets. This happened three times," Mohammed testified. "The officer asked an older soldier to administer the coup de grace to all the bodies," but when it was his turn, Mohammed indicated, the bullet only grazed his head. His father and two brothers lay dead nearby, he said.

Witnesses said 27 people died in the incident.

"These two officers [the lieutenants], what are their names?" Hussein asked. "When he says there are two officers, what do they look like? Does this bring us to the truth?"

The hearing began as a two-day curfew in Baghdad and other areas of Iraq was lifted and life returned to normal.

The rash of brutal killings continued in the capital, where security authorities said Tuesday they had found 23 bodies in seven locations in the previous 24 hours. The victims, including one woman, ranged from 20 to 30 years old, and all had been shot in the head or chest. Two were decapitated.

Separately, an attack at a coffee shop in the Shiite neighborhood of Greyat killed at least 14 people, according to news services. There were conflicting reports on whether the shop had been hit by mortar shells or by a suicide bomber.

The Associated Press reported that former Iraqi vice president Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, Hussein's former second-in-command who is now a fugitive with a $10 million bounty on his head, has ordered Sunni insurgents loyal to the former president to cease attacks, according to government and parliamentary officials who claimed knowledge of the developments.

The U.S. military said in a statement that an American soldier died late Monday of wounds he received when the vehicle in which he was riding was struck by a roadside bomb in northwest Baghdad. No further details were available. His death brought to 19 the number of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq in November.

A British soldier also was killed Monday by small-arms fire during an insurgent attack on a British army base in Basra, in southern Iraq, the British Defense Ministry said. His death brought to 121 the number of British soldiers killed in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion, second only to the number of U.S. fatalities, according to iCasualties.org, a Web site that tracks casualties in Iraq. According to a Pentagon account, the United States has lost 2,834 service members.

DOJ_NMG_0091812

Hussein Displays Courtesy After Death Sentence Fury (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 7 — Saddam Hussein returned to court on Tuesday, to the dock where he erupted in fury against the death sentence imposed on him 48 hours earlier. But this time, it was a different Saddam who showed up, a courteous arguer of legal points who seemed to have put his tempestuous performance on Sunday aside so as to concentrate on his continuing legal battles.

Mr. Hussein was back before the Iraqi High Tribunal, but in a different case, involving the so-called Anfal military campaign in the late 1980s in which, prosecutors contend, as many as 180,000 Kurdish civilians were killed. The Anfal case has been in progress since August, again with Mr. Hussein as the principal defendant, as he was in the narrower Dujail case that brought him and two associates verdicts of death by hanging.

The resumption of the Anfal case brought the 21st day of testimony by Iraqi Kurds who survived the chemical weapons attacks and mass graves that marked the campaign. Court officials have said they expect the case to last well into next year, possibly into the spring or summer. But the question now is whether Mr. Hussein will live to see its conclusion — or, as Iraqi officials say is now more likely, be taken to the gallows weeks or even months before the Anfal verdicts are delivered.

None of this seemed to greatly trouble Mr. Hussein as he rose from his seat on Tuesday to press for more detail from a Kurdish witness who testified that he survived a massacre by Mr. Hussein's troops in 1987. The witness, Qahar Khalil, now 61, said he was one of 37 men and boys who were lured from a hiding place in caves above their village by an Iraqi Army promise of amnesty, only to be rounded up, taken behind a nearby hill, lined up and gunned down. His younger brother was killed.

"There were 16 soldiers facing us, with two officers," Mr. Khalil said.

"One of the officers said, 'Sit down,' and immediately the other one said, 'Shoot.' The soldiers all fired on us, and we collapsed on the ground. When they had finished the bullets in their Kalashnikovs they reloaded, and they did this three times. One of the officers asked an older soldier to administer the coup de grâce to all the bodies." Gesturing to a scar on his forehead, he added, "This is my coup de grâce."

Mr. Hussein, who has often reminded the court that he studied law in Cairo during three years in exile in the early 1960s, raised a finger to catch the judge's eye, then rose in the dock. The court, he said, should ask Mr. Khalil to be more specific.

"He said there were two officers involved," Mr. Hussein said. "You should ask, 'What did they look like? What was their rank? What were their names?' The court should be able to find at least one of these officers. What we have here is a witness who takes us on a tour, but offers no details."

"Is this the way to get at the truth?" Mr. Hussein asked.

Then, turning to sit down, he nodded to the judge, Muhammad al-Uraibi.

"Thank you," he said.

As prosecution lawyers rose to counter Mr. Hussein's argument, the judge, seemingly keen to avoid the angry testing of wills that has marked many of Mr. Hussein's interventions in the trials, closed off the exchange.

"The defendant Saddam has raised a purely legal point," he said. "Under the law, the witness can say what he wants. But it is the court's responsibility to weigh the validity of witness testimony."

At another point, Mr. Hussein took exception to testimony by a second witness, Aba Bakr Ali Saeed, 52, who said he, too, had survived the mass killing described by Mr. Khalil, running away with two bullets in his legs. Asked by the defense counsel why his village had been attacked, Mr. Saeed blamed Mr. Hussein. "He said that all Kurds were saboteurs," he said.

Mr. Hussein, rising again, referred the court to "more than 70 books" issued during his rule containing his speeches and writings, and challenged the court to review them for anything demeaning to the Kurds. "When did Saddam say that all Kurds were saboteurs?" he asked. Mr. Saeed said Mr. Hussein had made the remark to a gathering of tribal sheiks, and that "everyone knows it."

Mr. Hussein then offered a brief discourse on tolerance and forgiveness, citing the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad and of Jesus. He went on to what sounded like an oblique appeal for an end to the country's current slide toward civil war.

"I call on all Iraqis, Arabs and Kurds, to practice tolerance and forgiveness, and to shake hands with each other," he said.

Mr. Hussein's shifting mood has been a feature of both trials. As he did on Sunday, he has dismissed them as show trials with an outcome — his execution — preordained by the Americans.

Often he has used outbursts from the dock to call on Sunni insurgents to continue their battle to drive out the Americans. But he has also shifted, sometimes within minutes, to his lawyerly mode, counseling the judges on points of law, pressing for more cross-examination of witnesses, and even, on rare occasions, advising his own defense team to calm down.

DOJ_NMG_0091813

But events outside the court appear to have moved sharply against his prospects of seeing the Anfal trial through. When plans for the trials were laid in 2004, American and Iraqi officials envisaged a series of trials at which the full range of brutalities committed during his 24 years in power would be laid out in court. The plan called for Mr. Hussein to appear as the principal defendant in at least three or four cases, along with a shifting cast of associates drawn from 80 other so-called high-value detainees held with him in American custody at the Camp Cropper military detention center near Baghdad airport.

What has changed the plan is the worsening war. Senior Iraqi officials, including the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, believe that Mr. Hussein, alive, remains a potent rallying point for Sunni insurgents fighting American troops and the American-backed, Shiite-led government. Senior American officials, too, say that using a series of trials to fix Mr. Hussein's personal responsibility for a wide range of atrocities is now a lower priority in face of the Sunni rebels' unrelenting fight to regain the power the Sunni minority lost with Mr. Hussein's ouster.

Beginning 30 days after Sunday's verdicts in the Dujail trial, a nine-judge appellate court will automatically review the death sentences passed against Mr. Hussein, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, a former head of the Mukhabarat intelligence agency, and Awad al-Bandar, the former head of Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court. The three were found guilty of crimes against humanity for the persecution of the townspeople of Dujail, north of Baghdad, after what was said to be an assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982. A total of 148 men and youths were executed, and hundreds of others banished for years to a remote desert camp in southern Iraq.

Iraqi court officials have said since Sunday's verdicts that they foresee few reasons for a protracted delay in the appeal court's review of the case, and that they expect a ruling upholding the death sentences within two or three months. That, they have said, could clear the way for Mr. Hussein's execution as early as March. Since the death penalty in Iraq was restored by Iraq's interim government in 2004, more than 30 men, many convicted of insurgent offenses, have been hanged, and more than 300 others are on death row, Iraqi officials say.

Saddam Calls For Reconciliation In Court (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin And Robert H. Reid

AP, November 8, 2006

A somber and subdued Saddam Hussein called on Iraqis to "forgive, reconcile and shake hands" as he returned to court Tuesday for his Kurdish genocide trial two days after being sentenced to death in a separate case.

Iran urged Iraq to disregard calls for clemency and hang the ousted president, saying Saddam's "very existence is anti-human."

The startling call from Saddam came after he rose during the afternoon session to question the testimony of the witnesses, who told of a mass killing of Iraqi Kurds in the 1987-88 Operation Anfal crackdown on Kurdish guerrillas.

Saddam then calmly spoke about how the Prophet Muhammad and Jesus Christ asked for forgiveness for those who had opposed them.

"I call on all Iraqis, Arabs and Kurds, to forgive, reconcile and shake hands," Saddam said before resuming his seat.

The former president's demeanor was far different from his combative performance Sunday, when another court convicted him in the deaths of about 150 Shiite Muslims following an assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail in 1982.

Saddam and two others were sentenced to death by hanging. Four co-defendants received lesser sentences and one was acquitted. Saddam thundered "Long live the people and death to their enemies" when the sentence was imposed.

On Tuesday, however, Saddam, dressed in a dark suit and white shirt, sat quietly along with the six other defendants in the Anfal case, calmly taking notes as four Kurdish witnesses gave their testimony.

Saddam's goal in making the statement was unclear.

However, the remarks followed at least two other public declarations by Saddam in recent weeks in which he urged national unity — perhaps to secure a more favorable place in history or to encourage contacts between the Americans and his supporters.

One statement, released last month by his lawyers, urged Iraqis to remember that their goal should be to free the country "from the forces of occupation and their followers" and not "settling scores."

In a statement Sunday, Saddam urged Iraqis not to "take revenge on the invading nations and their people" and to unite "in the face of sectarian strife."

A nine-judge appeals panel is expected to rule on Saddam's guilty verdict and death sentence in the Dujail case by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said. That could set in motion a possible execution by mid-February.

The death sentence has drawn criticism from European and human rights officials who oppose capital punishment — regardless of the crime.

DOJ_NMG_0091814

"Even a person like Saddam Hussein should not be sentenced to death," Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, said during a human rights forum in Vienna.

In Tehran, however, the Iranian government called for the death sentence to be carried out, saying that Saddam was a criminal who deserved to die.

"We hope the fair, correct and legal verdict against this criminal ... is enforced," government spokesman Gholam Hossein Elham said. "Saddam has both Shiite and Sunni blood on his hands. His very existence is anti-human."

Iran and Iraq waged a bitter eight-year war after Saddam invaded the country in 1980.

On Tuesday, the court heard testimony from survivors of an Aug. 28, 1988 massacre of more than 30 Kurdish men, who had surrendered after hearing that Saddam offered amnesty to Kurdish rebels.

Instead, the witnesses said they were herded together at the base of a hill, where Iraqi soldiers opened fire on them. Only a handful survived.

"When they fired in our direction, we all fell to the ground," Qahar Khalil Mohammed testified. "When I went back, I saw my father and two brothers had been killed, as well as 18 of my relatives."

Mohammed said an Iraqi medical officer used a broken bottle to clean his wound.

Witness Abdul-Karim Nayif said the men had been hiding in caves after an attack on their village near the Turkish border and some had considered suicide.

But they decided instead to surrender after Iraqi officers "swore on the Quran" that Saddam's offer of amnesty was genuine, Nayif said.

Another survivor, Abdul-Karim Nayif, submitted a video of a mass grave found near the site of the massacre after Kurds gained self-rule in 1991. The video showed numerous human remains.

Saddam and his cousin "Chemical Ali" al-Majid are charged with genocide in the Anfal case. The other defendants are accused of crimes against humanity and war crimes. All could be sentenced to death by hanging if convicted.

___

Salaheddin reported from Baghdad, and Reid from Amman, Jordan. Some material from a pool report was included.

Help Iraq Help Itself (NYT)

By Frederick D. Barton

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

Washington

IN recent days, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq has made public his disagreement with the dictates and tactics of the United States, including its proposed benchmarks for progress and the presence of military checkpoints around Sadr City.

American authorities view Mr. Maliki's resistance as worrisome. But it's just the opposite: his independence is our last best chance for a sustainable Iraq.

For the first time, a real politician appears to be fighting for his life. Whatever Mr. Maliki's limitations, we may be seeing the emergence of a leader who puts Iraqi concerns above America's blessing.

The table is now set for the prime minister to demand the phased withdrawal of United States forces from Iraq. In taking that single bold step, Mr. Maliki will do more to develop a political base than any recent Iraqi leader.

By delivering on a key Iraqi aspiration, Mr. Maliki will finally give his people a reason to believe in their government. Iraqi soldiers and police officers will not risk their lives for leaders perceived as Green Zone operatives.

Until recently, Mr. Maliki has run a government in name only. He could not fix a pothole, let alone deliver electricity, a functioning bureaucracy or a broader national strategy. His promises — including a new plan to make Baghdad safe — went unfulfilled. His only prospective allies were Shiite militias, which have their own narrow interests.

But he does have one friend who is eager to be responsive. As America moves away from its Iraq engagement, the United States government is in need of being saved from itself. The administration cannot find a way to leave because of its own early rhetoric and the advocacy of many Democrats for a timetable.

When Mr. Maliki demanded the removal of American checkpoints last week, they were taken down within four hours. When Mr. Maliki declined to sign on to an American timetable for stabilizing Iraq last week, he found himself talking as a peer with President Bush. Iraqis welcome a leader who takes responsibility and stands up to an unpopular foreign force.

The United States has suggested in the past that if the Iraqi government invited us to leave, we would oblige. We must prepare ourselves for this event. While being shown the door is never comfortable, the United States is ready to leave and the conditions are not likely to get better.

The next two years will not be easy, even following this course. Calling for the withdrawal of foreign troops is only a necessary first step to enable Mr. Maliki to deal with Iraq's enormous challenges. The most pressing are holding the country together, making people safe and distributing Iraq's oil wealth. Dealing equitably with these issues and delivering results is the best way to expand a political base.

DOJ_NMG_0091815

Insurgencies are defeated only when the politics are right. Mr. Maliki must share the authorship of a withdrawal plan with Iraq's major factions in order to take on the militias and foreign terrorists. Engaging the Sunni nationalists, whose stated opposition to foreign troops has been their central argument, is a start. With the future presence of American forces determined, their role during the coming months would be more likely to enjoy the support of rank-and-file citizens.

The oil deal must get beyond traditional divides. The most promising approach is a tripartite arrangement that splits oil revenues among the national and regional governments and provides a direct benefit to Iraq's 26 million people. If Mr. Maliki pursues this course, he may well become the leader that Iraq needs.

Mr. Maliki's new independence is America's best chance to salvage the muddle Iraq has become. Let's not get in his way.

Army Revamps How Information Is Deemed Classified (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

U.S. Army intelligence has developed a new blueprint for standardizing the way national security information is classified, recognizing that determining whether a particular document is "confidential" or "top secret" is ultimately up to the judgment of individuals, according to a memo distributed last month by Lt. Gen. John F. Kimmons, the Army's deputy chief of staff.

The memo states that presidential directives and Army regulations that provide the basis for classification of security information are "broad and not clearly defined," so that the responsible individual's "determination of security classification is purely subjective."

The comments offer a rare view of one service's methods for classifying information at a time of debate over government openness. In the past few years, the leaking of classified information has been the subject of congressional investigations, criminal indictments and Supreme Court decisions, but almost no attention has been focused on what information has become classified and how that system works.

"Over classification is costly, inefficient and can cause slow downs to development/operation," the Army memo says. "Under classification," it adds, "can cause compromise, inadvertent disclosures and confusion."

The memo notes that even when a document within the Army system is deemed unclassified, that "does not mean that it is automatically releaseable to the public." A category called "Controlled Unclassified Information" allows information to be protected from public view. This category includes the label "For Official Use Only," which can involve things such as "internal rules and practices of the agency," trade secrets, intra-agency memos that "are part of the decision-making process" and records that invade a person's privacy.

The memo also says a compilation of individually unclassified items can be considered classified "if the compiled information reveals an additional association or relationship" that otherwise would not be apparent.

But before even unclassified information can be released, according to the memo, "a competent authority, specifically the Public Affairs Officer, must review and determine that the information is releasable to the public."

The Army memorandum attempts to describe the harm to national security or to U.S. foreign relations that would result from unauthorized disclosure of various types of classified information. The label "confidential" is put on information that, if disclosed, would result in "damage" to national security; "secret" when disclosure would result in "serious damage"; or "top secret" when it would cause "exceptionally grave damage."

These categories do not include even higher levels of classification, such as "Sensitive Compartmented Information," which normally refers to intelligence gathered electronically that, if disclosed, could result in the loss of sensitive sources or methods of collection.

"Failure to classify correctly has consequences," said Steven Aftergood, who disclosed the Army memo on his Secrecy News Web site (http://www.fas.org/blog/secrecy). "But getting it right is easier said than done, because it involves the conscious exercise of informed judgment."

Many of the criteria for classification are obvious, such as if the information's loss would reveal military plans or open senior leadership to a terrorist attack. But others are much more ambiguous.

For example, the memo states that information would be "confidential" if its loss "could threaten the international position of the U.S.," an outcome it further defines as damaging "U.S. credibility with a foreign government."

Information would be "secret" if its disclosure "would weaken the international position of the U.S.," which is defined as causing a "negative impact to the international position of the U.S. and its ability to negotiate with foreign governments." Information would be considered "top secret" if disclosure would "significantly weaken" the U.S. position, meaning it would result in the "inability of the U.S. to successfully negotiate with a foreign government for a significant period of time."

DOJ_NMG_0091816

Another element in the Army memorandum is the suggestion that if a document contains information meeting two different categories of "confidential," it could be classified as "secret." And if it has two different "secret" pieces of information, it could be classified as "top secret."

The Army is seeking to set its classification standards at the same time that Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte has part of his staff working to establish common classification standards for the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community so they can share one another's secret information.

A spokesman for Negroponte's office declined to comment on the Army document.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Auditing Firms Urge New Ways To Detect Fraud Forensic Audit Designed To Root Out Wrongdoing Is Suggested In Policy Paper (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

The heads of the world's biggest accounting firms want investors and regulators to consider new ways of reporting financial information and clamping down on fraud, even as companies protest increased costs related to corporate overhauls.

In a paper to be released today at a public-policy conference in Paris, chief executives of the six biggest accounting firms suggest considering whether companies should be subject to forensic audits specifically designed to root out fraud every three or five years, whether stock exchanges should require companies to randomly undergo these tests, or if investors should choose the intensity of the audit they want for a company.

The heads of PricewaterhouseCoopers, Deloitte & Touche, Ernst & Young, KPMG, Grant Thornton and BDO Seidman say they hope their proposals will kick off a debate over what investors should expect from an audit in terms of fraud detection. The firms have long contended that while standard audits are designed to detect errors that could lead to fraud, the checks can't pick up all corporate wrongdoing.

"We need to get a good understanding of what the investing community wants the audit to do," said William G. Parrett, chief executive of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu, Deloitte's international organization. "Do they want the auditors to catch all frauds? We know the cost of that could be prohibitive. From a cost-benefit-analysis point, it's quite possible they would say we don't need to change what we're doing at all."

But many investors believe auditors' main job is to detect fraud and that the firms failed miserably by not catching the huge corporate scandals that rocked markets earlier this decade. And any discussion of additional audit requirements is sure to raise the ire of companies who claim that new internal-control rules in the U.S. are already an unnecessarily costly burden.

Some accounting observers suggest the big firms are trying to shift attention away from the fact that their current audits aren't stringent enough. Mandating forensic audits "would imply there is a high probability that if there's fraud they're not finding it," said Mary Ellen Oliverio, a former accounting professor at Pace University in New York who is writing a book about corporate auditing. It is an "unnecessary expense," she added, because a normal audit should "discover fraud. We've got to get the regular audit done properly."

The accounting firms' policy paper also calls for discussion of new financial-reporting models using technology to provide more up-to-date information that investors could tailor to their own needs, along with disclosures of nonfinancial aspects of a business that aren't included in current corporate reports.

Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox already is pushing use of technology to "tag" financial data so that investors can use it in new ways. The firms say this project, as well as other technological developments "are likely at some point to revolutionize the entire company reporting model -- what information is presented and how, and how it is audited."

To aid in this "revolution," the firms say regulators need to speed moves to align U.S. and international accounting standards and rules governing how audits are conducted.

While emphasizing measures to protect investors, the heads of the accounting firms also use the policy paper to press their argument that any changes to improve the functioning of global capital markets have to include moves to limit the liability audit firms face both from civil litigation and criminal prosecution. "Individual auditors who engage in wrongdoing must be punished but without threatening the financial viability of their firms," the policy paper argues.

Big Four Call For Financial Reports Shake-up (FT)

By Barney Jopson In London

DOJ_NMG_0091817

Financial Times, November 8, 2006

The world's biggest accounting firms will join forces on Wednesday to call for a radical overhaul of how companies report performance, declaring the system used to communicate with investors "broken".

They will propose changes that would result in the most significant shake-up of data flows that sustain markets since the US introduced accounting standards and independent auditing in the 1930s.

Heads of the "big four" accounting firms and two others plan to say the financial reporting model of the 20th century has become redundant.

PwC, Deloitte, KPMG and Ernst & Young will call for static quarterly financial statements to be replaced by real-time, internet-based reporting encompassing a wider range of performance measures.

With Grant Thornton and BDO, the firms are seeking to provoke regulators and policy-makers. There is rising anger over the cost and perceived irrelevance of much financial reporting. The proposed changes are likely to meet resistance from companies and scepticism from some market watchdogs.

The wave of corporate scandals that began with Enron's collapse in 2001 sparked a raft of regulatory changes. Most, including the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, attempted to shore up the reporting model rather than create a new one.

"We all believe the current model is broken," said Mike Rake, chairman of KPMG International, who will unveil a joint paper with his five counterparts in Paris on Wednesday.

"There are significant shortcomings to US GAAP and issues of concern with international financial reporting standards," he said. "We're not in a very happy situation."

Corporate reporting has been largely untouched by the internet and digitisation, both of which have revolutionised the way companies operate.

The paper says: "Current systems of reporting and auditing company information will need to change – toward the public release of more non-financial information customised to the user, and accessed far more frequently than is currently done."

The large discrepancy between the "book" and "market" values of many listed companies is clear evidence that the content of traditional financial statements is of limited use, the firms say.

Non-financial measures that would provide more valuable indications of a company's future prospects include customer satisfaction, product or service defects, employee turnover and patent awards, they say.

Mr Rake noted that quarterly reporting and the short-term focus on companies' ability to meet Wall Street earnings expectations had helped foster accounting scandals.

The firms have been working on their proposals for over a year. The end of the first year of Sarbanes-Oxley implementation in the US and of IFRS in Europe crystallised many problems in the minds of senior accountants.

"In the next five years you may see a lot of change in this area," said Mr Rake.

A Report By The World's Largest Auditors Urges Relaxed Standards For Liability (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

The heads of the six largest auditing firms in the world issued a call for relaxed liability standards for their companies yesterday, in what appears to be the start of a campaign to protect their franchises while reducing the risk that bad audits could bankrupt one or more of them.

In a report, the executives said that they supported efforts to standardize accounting and auditing standards around the world and that eventually, "a new business reporting model" should be developed that would provide better financial information more rapidly.

But while the report, entitled "Serving Global Capital Markets and the Global Economy," offered little detail in that area, it was most detailed in its warnings that auditor liability needed to be restricted and in mounting the arguments for that outcome.

It did not offer specific proposals on how liability could be restricted while continuing to protect investors if auditors failed to do a conscientious job. Instead, it pointed to a restriction on auditor liability as being essential to solve many problems of the industry, and suggested that if investors were worried about fraud, they should be willing to pay for more detailed and more expensive audits than those prepared now.

"Our firms are not and can never be the insurers of last resort for the capital markets," the report said. It cited an "expectations gap" between what investors wanted from an audit in detecting fraud "and what audit networks are actually capable of doing, at the prices that companies or investors are willing to pay for audits."

One idea the report raised, which could bring in more revenue with less risk for auditing firms, was to create a separate category of forensic audits, which would cost more than ordinary ones and be more likely to uncover fraud. It said companies might be required to have such an audit every five years, or to face such audits on a random basis. Or, it said, investors could choose whether they wanted their companies to face that additional cost.

DOJ_NMG_0091818

Since the collapse of Arthur Andersen in the wake of the Enron scandal, there has been worry over excessive concentration of business in the Big Four firms — PricewaterhouseCoopers, KPMG, Deloitte & Touche and Ernst & Young. The report, signed by the heads of those four firms as well as of the next two, much smaller firms — Grant Thornton and BDO International — suggested that more competition would appear if liability concerns were eased.

It argued that fear of lawsuits had led to detailed accounting rules in the United States that encouraged a "check the box" style of auditing and accounting that in some cases made fraud more likely and information less useful. It endorsed the idea of accounting rules that are more "standards based," with fewer details and more responsibility for auditors to interpret them.

The report acknowledged that the big firms had often sought detailed rules in the hope that would protect them from lawsuits, but said that had not worked.

While the largest firms in major countries bear the same or similar names, they are organized as partnerships in each country, reflecting differing regulations on what accountants and auditors can do. The firms asked for more consistent global rules and for ways to allow the heads of the international firms to enforce standards on all those in a network without making all the firms in the network liable for a firm's errors.

FBI Raids New York Brokerage Sky Capital (HC)

By Carol S. Remond, Dow Jones Newswires

Houston Chronicle, November 8, 2006

NEW YORK — Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided the Manhattan offices of brokerage firm Sky Capital LLC Monday.

A person answering the telephone at Sky Capital Tuesday said that Chief Executive Ross Mandell had no comment on the matter.

FBI special agents executed a search warrant at Sky and left with boxes of documents, according to a person familiar with the matter. The probe appears related to share offerings to foreign investors.

A spokeswoman for the District Court for the Southern District of New York declined to comment, citing a policy of not discussing the possibility of an investigation.

Sky Capital LLC is a subsidiary of London-based Sky Capital Holdings Ltd., which is also the parent company of Sky Capital UK Ltd., a British brokerage firm.

Sky Capital LLC continued to make a limited market in U.S. shares Tuesday. According to information on Nasdaq's Web site, the firm made a market in nine shares Monday.

Sky Capital Holdings reported on Sept. 29 a loss of $14 million in the year to March 31, compared with a loss of $12.1 million for the same period last year. Disappointing results have been a drag on the share price, with the company's shares dropping from almost a pound ($1.90) early this year to mere pence.

According to information posted on its Web site, Sky Capital Holdings was formed by Mandell in 2001.

Fraud Lands Man In Prison (DEN)

Detroit News, November 8, 2006

Northville lawyer also ordered to pay $8.5M in restitution for embezzling from friends, neighbors.

A federal judge on Wednesday sentenced a Northville lawyer who defrauded friends and neighbors of millions of dollars to five years and four months in federal prison.

U.S. District Judge Victoria A. Roberts rejected testimony from an expert witness who said Charles G. Mady was a pathological gambler who played the commodities market instead of the slot machines and was not fully responsible for his actions.

Roberts sentenced Mady, 36, at the top of the federal sentencing guidelines range for embezzlement, and ordered him to pay about $8.5 million in restitution to his victims.

"What you did to the victims in this case is just a horrific set of circumstances," Roberts told Mady.

"The court finds you to be totally unsympathetic."

The court heard from victims who said they trusted Mady and lost millions of dollars while he sent them statements showing their investments were increasing in value. Some even paid taxes on income they thought they had earned, while they were losing money.

The government alleged Mady converted more than $3 million of investors' money to his own uses, including buying racehorses and luxury cars.

DOJ_NMG_0091819

Mady, a Canadian citizen, is expected to be deported after he completes his sentence.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Supreme Court Asked To Apply Sentencing Rule Retroactively (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic, Usa Today

USA Today, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — A lawyer for a convicted rapist seeking to cut his client's prison time urged the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday to retroactively apply its 2004 decision that limited judges' discretion in sentencing.

A decision, which could affect thousands of criminal cases, might clarify complicated sentencing standards and affect when convicts are able to appeal their cases based on any favorable high court ruling that comes after their trial.

The 2004 ruling (Blakely v. Washington) said that judges cannot boost a defendant's sentence based on factors, such as cruelty, that were not determined by a jury. The court said the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial requires that any fact essential to a defendant's prison time be proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt. The decision has become part of a series of court cases bolstering the role of the jury.

Until the justices started down this path, trial judges had regularly enhanced a defendant's time behind bars based on weapons, drugs or other factors that the judge determined made the crime worse. The court's trend has spawned uncertainty in federal and state criminal systems, and a new generation of disputes is before the justices.

Tuesday's case tested whether the rule of Blakely should be applied retroactively to convicts who were sentenced before 2004 but whose appeals were not yet over.

The Justice Department urged the court not to apply the 2004 rule to past cases. It argues that the decision merely altered criminal procedure and did not rise to the level of a "watershed" rule affecting the fundamental fairness of a trial.

In Tuesday's dispute, Lonnie Lee Burton followed a 15-year-old boy home from school, forced his way into the house at gunpoint, raped the boy, then took $160. A jury found him guilty of rape, robbery and burglary. A judge sentenced him to 304 months for the rape, 153 months for the robbery and 105 months for the burglary — a total of nearly 47 years — and ordered the sentences to run consecutively, rather than the norm of concurrently, based on Burton's criminal record and other factors. Those factors were not put to a jury.

Stanford University law professor Jeffrey Fisher, representing Burton, said he should get the benefit of Blakely. He added that a defendant must not be "sentenced for a greater crime than the jury actually found him guilty of."

Washington Deputy Solicitor General William Collins argued that the 2004 case should not be applied retroactively and insisted that Burton had failed to meet state and federal requirements for even challenging his sentence at this point.

The justices focused on the intricacies of sentencing law, as well as on technical rules that could affect Burton's particular case.

Chief Justice John Roberts suggested that even if the Blakely rule rose to the level of a watershed, Burton might not be able to claim it in a last-ditch appeal of his case. Justices Anthony Kennedy and Stephen Breyer noted in their questions that the court has remained deeply divided over sentencing and that the dissenters in Blakely remain unhappy with the trend.

Supreme Court Debates Two Cases Involving Long Prison Terms (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court was asked Tuesday to lop 21 years off the 46-year sentence of a Washington state man for raping a teenager, in one of two cases the court dealt with involving long prison terms.

At issue is whether a 2004 ruling that limits a judge's discretion in sentencing should apply to older cases.

A Washington state judge sentenced Lonnie Lee Burton in 1998 for rape of a 15-year-old boy, robbery and burglary. Defendants convicted of multiple crimes ordinarily receive sentences that run concurrently, but the judge added together prison time Burton could have received for each crime to form the lengthy sentence.

Eighteen states joined Washington in asking the court to refrain from applying the ruling to older cases, saying that to do otherwise "would potentially open a staggering and immeasurable number of sentences" to challenges.

The 2004 decision in a case that also came from Washington held that a defendant's constitutional right to a jury trial forbids a judge from deciding facts that add to a prison sentence.

Burton's lawyer, Stanford University law professor Jeffrey Fisher, told justices that the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was wrong to conclude that the 2-year-old decision was not retroactive.

DOJ_NMG_0091820

Justices appeared more concerned Tuesday with procedural issues that could doom the case rather than the larger issue of retroactivity.

In Tuesday's other case, the court debated the scope of a powerful federal law enforcement tool that lengthens prison terms of repeat offenders who commit violent crimes.

The federal government argued that a Florida man's jail term should be increased from no more than six years under federal sentencing guidelines to a mandatory minimum of 15 years under the Armed Career Criminal Act.

The federal law calls for harsher penalties when a defendant has three prior violent felony convictions. Congress enacted the law during the crack cocaine epidemic of the 1980s as police struggled with high levels of gun violence.

But one of Alphonso James Jr.'s convictions was for attempted burglary, which his lawyer argued should not automatically be considered a violent crime. Craig Crawford, an assistant public defender in Orlando, Fla., asked justices to overrule the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on this issue.

The Supreme Court could broaden the law's impact by finding that all attempted burglaries meet the law's requirements.

To be included under the career criminal law, conduct must involve a "serious potential risk of physical injury to another person."

Justices asked attorneys on both sides at what point someone attempting to commit a burglary presents a serious potential risk of physically injuring someone else.

When a would-be burglar is climbing a ladder leaning up against a building? asked Justice David Souter. "That's a lot closer" than simply setting up the ladder, Crawford responded.

Is a hammer thrown through a window enough? asked Justice John Paul Stevens, describing the circumstances in James's attempted burglary.

"Congress wanted to treat the frustrated burglar the same" as the burglar who completed his crime, said Jonathan Marcus, an assistant in the Justice Department solicitor general's office.

Decisions in both cases are expected before July.

The cases are Burton v. Stewart, 05-9222, and James v. U.S., 05-9264.

Jurors Convict Man Who Robbed Palmer Gun Store (PAET)

By Russ Flanagan, The Express-times

Easton Express-Times (NJ/PA), November 8, 2006

A federal jury in Philadelphia on Tuesday convicted a man of robbery and related gun charges for sticking up a Palmer Township gun dealer in 2004, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Under federal gun laws, Frank Berryman of Philadelphia faces a maximum sentence of life in prison. He is scheduled to be sentenced in federal court in February.

"We sought the conviction and the jury returned a guilty verdict on all counts," Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Henson said after the verdict.

Records say Berryman left his home in the 900 block of Flanders Road on March 9 and traveled with three other men to John's Gun and Tackle Room at 2604 Freemansburg Ave. While Berryman, 27, was inside, one accomplice waited in the car, and two others waited outside the shop, authorities said.

Reporter Russ Flanagan can be reached at 610-258-7171 or by e-mail at rflanagan@express-times.com.

Hinds Co., FBI Looking For Suspected Copper Thieves The Clarion-Ledger (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, November 8, 2006

The FBI and Hinds County Sheriff's Department are asking for the public's assistance in locating five Jackson residents who are suspecting of stealing copper and other metals.

Authorities are looking for Larry McGee, 38, of 1409 W. Mayes Street; Shirley McGee, 42, of 1928 Corley Avenue; Herbert Smith Jr., 51, of 236 Hartfield Street; Casey Torry, 40, of 3152 Tudor Street or 3720 Fontaine; and Jerry Lee James, 46, of 940 Rose Street.

All five have outstanding warrants for receipt of stolen goods, according to the FBI. They are suspected of being in a scheme that involves stealing, receiving, selling and transporting metals across state lines.

A reward of $1,000 is being offered for information leading to the location and arrest of each individual, according to authorities.

Anyone with information is asked to contact the FBI at (601) 948-5000 or the Hinds County Sheriff's Department at (601) 974-2904.

DOJ_NMG_0091821

Grapes Of Rathke By JOHN H. FUND (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

The Democratic oak has grown, in part, from Acorn, a feisty, union-backed activist group. The organization says on its Web site that it "registered over 540,000 low-income and minority voters" and deployed over 4,000 get-out-the-vote workers for yesterday's elections. But after years of scandal involving its election efforts and misuse of government grants, Acorn is finally coming under scrutiny, with four of its Kansas City, Mo., workers under indictment for submitting false voter registrations. (As of this writing, all are at large.) Other states -- including Pennsylvania and Maryland -- are also conducting probes. Notes the U.S. attorney's office in Kansas City: "This national investigation is very much ongoing."

Founded by union organizer Wade Rathke in 1970, Acorn boasts an annual budget of some $40 million and operates everything from "social justice" radio stations to an affordable-housing arm. Still run after 36 years by Mr. Rathke as "chief organizer," it is best known for its campaigns against Wal-Mart, and for leading initiatives in six states to raise the minimum wage.

One of those states is Missouri. St. Louis election officials were so inundated with bogus Acorn-generated voter registrants that they mailed a letter to 5,000 registrants, requesting the recipients to contact them. Fewer than 40 responded. Mr. Rathke attacked the officials as "slop buckets" and claimed they had "broken the law in trying to discourage new voters illegally."

City officials scoff at that. They say it's up to Acorn to explain why over 1,000 addresses listed on its registrations don't exist. "We met twice with Acorn before their drive, but our requests completely fell by the wayside," says Democrat Matt Potter, the city's deputy elections director. His election clerks were already putting in 13-hour work days and "dumping this on them isn't fair." In the past, several Democrats, including Mayor Francis Slay, have complained about bloated voter rolls leading to stolen votes.

Acorn insists any problems stem from dishonest former employees. Mr. Rathke says he is actively cooperating with the probe in Kansas City, and has alerted prosecutors in other states about registration problems. That doesn't satisfy Melody Powell, the Republican chairwoman of the Kansas City Board of Elections, who says Acorn's claim that it brought the fraud to light is "seriously misleading." She says her staff first took the evidence to the FBI, and Acorn only then helped identify the perpetrators. According to Ms. Powell, 40% of the 35,000 registrations it submitted appear bogus. "It's a potential recipe for fraud," she says, noting that "anyone can find a voter card mailed to a false apartment building address lying around a lobby and use it to vote." Ms. Powell worries legitimate voters who were registered a second time by someone else under a false address will find it difficult to vote.

Mr. Rathke explains that Missouri's problems came about because his organizers were required to turn in all registrations within seven days of being collected "even if the name on them was Donald Duck," and that state law discouraged them from sending copies of the forms out of state to Acorn's Little Rock office, which would have done quality-control checks. Election officials say Acorn was responsible for policing its own work.

Current and former Acorn employees say the problems in Kansas City and St. Louis are no accident. "There's no quality control on purpose, no checks and balances," says Nate Toler, currently head organizer of an Acorn campaign against Wal-Mart in Merced, Calif. In 2004 he worked on an Acorn voter drive in Missouri, and says Acorn statements aren't to be taken at face value: "The internal motto is 'We don't care if it's a lie, just so long as it stirs up the conversation.'" Mr. Toler expects to be attacked as a disgruntled employee, and that "I may have my head chopped off for telling the truth." Indeed, he has this year filed an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission complaint alleging that Acorn has consistently promoted whites to management positions over equally qualified blacks. But his allegations are backed by three former Acorn employees who have filed similar EEOC complaints.

One of them, Sashanti Bryant of Detroit, Mich., was a community organizer for Acorn. She told me it has a problem paying employees on time and has almost no minorities in its upper echelons. Loretta Barton, until June of this year a lead Acorn organizer from Dayton, Ohio, and another EEOC complainant, told me that "all Acorn wanted from registration drives was results." Ms. Barton alleges that when she and her co-workers asked about forming a union they were slapped down: "We were told if you get a union, you won't have a job." There is some history here: In 2003, the National Labor Relations Board ordered Acorn to rehire and pay restitution to three employees it had illegally fired for trying to organize a union.

In response, Mr. Rathke says he is neutral on internal union-organizing efforts and that "when you're dealing with thousands of employees a year you'll have some who complain." He also said the four complaints lodged with the EEOC had all been dismissed. When told that wasn't the case, he said "there may be some loose ends to be tied up . . . I'm not going to impugn any of the people involved."

Still, Acorn is vulnerable to charges it doesn't practice what it preaches. Its manual for minimum-wage campaigns says it intends "to push for as high a wage as possible." But it doesn't pay those wages. In 2004 Acorn won a $9.50 an hour minimum wage in Santa Fe, N.M., for example, but pays its organizers $25,000 a year for a required 54-hour week -- $8.90 an hour. This year Acorn had workers in Missouri sign contracts saying they would be "working up to 80 hours over seven days of work." Mr. Rathke says "We pay as much as we can. If people can get more elsewhere, we wish them well."

DOJ_NMG_0091822

In 1995 Acorn unsuccessfully sued California to be exempt from the minimum wage, claiming that "the more that Acorn must pay each individual outreach worker . . . the fewer outreach workers it will be able to hire." Mr. Rathke acknowledges higher wages can cost some jobs but that the raises for other workers are worth it. * * *

Last year, Acorn helped convince the House to create an "affordable housing trust fund," allocating up to 5% of the profits generated by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to groups such as Acorn that build affordable housing. The Senate failed to act on the bill, but it will surely be reintroduced.

But previous federal grants to Acorn have been highly controversial. In 1994 the Acorn Housing Corporation was given a $1.1 million grant by AmeriCorps, the federal volunteer agency. An inspector-general found the nonprofit had improperly used AmeriCorps recruits for political purposes; the grant was terminated. A guaranteed stream of federal cash to a group that so often fails audits would invite trouble. Today, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley will send a letter to the IRS asking the agency to investigate Acorn and allied groups for possibly misusing their tax status for political purposes.

On his blog Mr. Rathke dismisses criticism as "major league political harassment . . . crazy words." Lashing out at critics, says Mr. Toler, is "just Wade being Wade, engaging in the politics of distraction." Another former Acorn employee says the group has become a "cult" under Mr. Rathke, and must increasingly take bigger risks in order to grow. What risks it might take in pursuit of its agenda can only be surmised -- though some clues may emerge from the ongoing federal investigations of Acorn's electoral activities.

Mr. Fund is a columnist for OpinionJournal.com1.

Ex-educator Gets 10 Years For Soliciting Sex (POUGHJ)

By Larry Fisher-Hertz, Poughkeepsie Journal

Poughkeepsie Journal, November 8, 2006

Town man targeted teens online

WHITE PLAINS — A former New York City school administrator from the Town of Poughkeepsie faced family members in a federal courtroom Monday and apologized for trying to solicit young girls over the Internet.

"I have robbed you of the life you expected to have with me," 49-year-old Steven M. Rubinstein told his wife, Meryl, before he was sentenced in federal court. "Please try to find some way to forgive me."

U.S. District Court Judge Colleen McMahon then sentenced Rubinstein to 10 years in prison.

"You have committed an offense I can only describe as vile," McMahon told Rubinstein, of Tree Top Lane, during an hourlong proceeding in the federal courthouse.

Rubinstein, who worked in the New York City school system for 20 years, was an assistant principal at Murry Bergtraum High School in Manhattan. He was arrested by FBI agents last spring following an eight-month sting operation targeting would-be sexual predators. A search of Rubinstein's computers re-vealed images of child pornography.

Federal investigators said Rubinstein had sexually explicit conversations with two undercover agents who were posing as 13-year-old girls.

The conversations oc-curred between June of last year and March 6, when investigators seized computers from his Poughkeepsie home and his office at the high school in Lower Manhattan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Dunne characterized transcripts of conversations Rubinstein had with the undercover agents as "explicit in the extreme," containing "page after page in which he boasted about having sex with a 15-year-old and a 17-year-old girl."

Dunne said federal investigators had never determined whether Rubinstein's claims were true, and following his arrest he denied ever having sex with young girls.

Dunne noted there was evidence Rubinstein had used a computer at his school office to engage in some of the chats.

"This was extreme conduct indeed, Judge," Dunne said.

Wearing khaki pants, a yellow dress shirt and an olive sport jacket, Rubinstein cried as he spoke to his wife, his mother and four other members of his family in the courtroom.

"I don't know what to say to you other than I am so sorry for what I have done," he said. "Mom, I have become an embarrassment to you."

Rubinstein told McMahon he had accepted "full responsibility" for his crimes.

"I make no excuses," he said. "I did it, I admit it, and I want to get help to understand why I did it."

DOJ_NMG_0091823

As she imposed the sentence, McMahon said she would recommend Rubinstein be sent to the Devins Medical Center in Massachusetts, a secure federal facility that specializes in the treatment of sex offenders.

McMahon said she believed Rubinstein deserved to be confined for a lengthy period of time in part because of his position as an assistant principal.

"This defendant is every parent's nightmare," she said, "an individual in a responsible position in an educational establishment who worked on a daily basis with young people."

Rubinstein was fired shortly before he entered guilty pleas April 10 to one count each of enticement of a minor to engage in sexual conduct and distribution of child pornography.

McMahon sentenced Rubinstein to 10 years in prison on each of the two counts. The sentences will run concurrently.

The judge also fined Rubinstein $1,000 and ordered him to undergo five years of supervision by federal parole authorities after he is released from prison.

Court Clears 6 Of Criminal Charges In Crash Of French Jetliner In 1992 (NYT)

By Nicola Clark And Don Phillips

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

PARIS, Nov. 7 — A French court on Tuesday cleared five former aviation officials and an ex-Airbus executive of all criminal charges linked to the crash of a passenger jet in the mountains near the German border almost 15 years ago.

The six men went on trial in the northeastern city of Colmar in May on charges of involuntary manslaughter in the 1992 crash of an A320 owned by Air Inter, a now-defunct unit of Air France, in which 87 people died. The defendants faced up to two years in prison.

The verdict on Tuesday was greeted by the aviation industry as a victory in its effort to decriminalize air crashes.

The trial gained a high profile partly because the industry decided to push back against legal systems around the world that had increasingly sought to assign criminal responsibility in crashes.

The defendants were Bernard Ziegler, 73, who was technical director of Airbus at the time; Pierre-Henri Gourgeon, 60, then the head of the French civil aviation agency, DGAC, and now chief financial officer of Air France-KLM; Claude Frantzen, 69, head of training at DGAC; two former Air Inter officials; and Eric Lammari, 50, an air traffic controller.

The court found Airbus and Air France liable for the pain and suffering of the victims' families. The amount of damages was not specified in the ruling. Air France has already paid $27 million in compensation to the victims' families.

Twelve years ago, French air safety investigators found that the crash of the twin-engine Airbus A320 had probably been caused by human error. Their report concluded that the pilots had probably misprogrammed the plane's flight computer to descend at a rapid rate, and that it then slammed into the 2,500-foot-high Mont Ste.-Odile near Strasbourg.

Airbus ultimately made changes to the A320's cockpit display panels based on recommendations of the accident investigators.

Texas Inmates Protest Conditions With Hunger Strikes (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 7 — Likening themselves to prisoners at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo Bay, a dozen inmates on death row in Texas have staged hunger strikes over the last month to protest what they call abusive conditions, including 23 hours a day of isolation in their cells.

The Texas Department of Criminal Justice said that the first inmates began refusing food Oct. 8 and that two were still on hunger strikes in the Polunsky prison unit in Livingston, about 45 miles east of the execution unit in Huntsville. The Polunsky Unit houses death-row inmates until their executions. As of Tuesday, one inmate had missed 35 consecutive meals and one 17 meals, but no one has yet been force-fed, said a department spokeswoman, Michelle Lyons.

Two other prisoners who had not eaten since Oct. 8 began taking food Oct. 27 and Nov. 4, Ms. Lyons said, and others abandoned their protests after a short time.

But Vickie McCuistion, program coordinator of the Texas Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, said some inmates had been reported as eating when they were still refusing food. Ms. Lyons said that a prisoner needed to miss nine meals to be considered on hunger strike and that some who had refused meals had eaten snacks at visiting sessions.

"Either conditions will improve, or we will starve to death," vowed one of the first hunger strikers, Steven Woods, in an Internet posting put up by groups opposed to the death penalty. Since death row was moved from an older and more open facility in 2000, he said, "We lost all our group recreation, art programs, and supplies" in addition to "work programs, televisions and religious services."

DOJ_NMG_0091824

Because the inmates are not allowed to have contact visits, "the only physical contact we'll get until they kill us is when the C.O.'s hold our restrained arms while escorting us," he wrote, referring to corrections officers.

The protests are the latest disruptions at the nation's busiest execution complex, where 23 inmates have been put to death by lethal injection so far this year and another is scheduled to die Wednesday. Although California leads the nation in prisoners on death row, Texas executes them far more frequently, with 378 put to death since capital punishment was reintroduced in 1982. Virginia is second with 97.

Prison officials say the harsher conditions on death row came in response to a notorious escape in 1998 and a move to the more secure Polunsky Unit. Ms. Lyons said Mr. Woods had refused meals the longest but began eating again on Saturday.

Mr. Woods, 26, was convicted with a co-defendant of killing a man and woman in a robbery north of Dallas in 2001.

The hunger strikes in the Polunsky Unit were already under way when Michael D. Johnson, a 29-year-old convicted killer protesting his innocence, used a razor blade to slash a vein and an artery on Oct. 20, committing suicide in his cell hours before his scheduled execution for the murder of a convenience store clerk. He used his blood to scrawl a message on the wall: "I didn't shoot him."

John Moriarty, the inspector general for the prison system, said an inquiry was continuing into how Mr. Johnson had secreted the blade and used it in the 15 minutes between checks by officers on "death watch."

The longest-striking inmate still refusing food, Ms. Lyons said, is William M. Mason, 52, who was convicted of murdering his wife and dumping her body in the San Jacinto River after he complained that she had played the radio too loud. After refusing 35 meals over 17 days, Ms. Lyons said, Mr. Mason has lost 20 pounds and now weighs 239.

Also on a hunger strike, Ms. Lyons said, was Larry Estrada, 27, who was convicted with a co-defendant of killing a Houston convenience store clerk and shooting another during a robbery in 1997. Mr. Estrada has refused 17 meals over a week, she said. But she said neither inmate was at the point of needing to be force-fed, a determination made by doctors from the University of Texas Medical Branch.

Mary Felts, a civil lawyer in Austin who helps the inmates with wills and other personal legal services, said she found many of the complaints valid. "Sensory deprivation is the worst kind of abuse," Ms. Felts said. "If I were the warden I'd want the men to have TVs; the women have TVs. It would cut down on mischief."

Ms. Lyons, the prisons spokeswoman, said that while television sets could alleviate the monotony of solitary confinement, there was no place to hang the sets outside the cells where the men could see them. The old Ellis Unit, where death row was housed from 1965 to 1999, had a wall opposite the cells where the sets could be installed.

"It's not something we've made a priority," she added. "We have not sought funding, and not many taxpayers would approve." Prison activists say the state has rejected offers of donated sets.

Ms. Lyons also said the inmates "have not made any formal request" to have grievances heard, "so there's no formal response."

Most of what officials know about the complaints, she said, "we've gleaned from the antideath-penalty postings."

CIVIL LAW:

Dana Seeks Court OK For New Bonus Plan (DOW)

By Marc Hopkins, Dow Jones Newswires

Dow Jones, November 8, 2006

Dana Seeks Court OK for Scaled-Down Executive Bonus Plan

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Dana Corp. is pitching a toned-down version of an executive bonus plan that it hopes won't strike out with Judge Burton Lifland a second time.

As part of an effort to entice senior managers to stay, Dana wants to pay Chief Executive Michael J. Burns up to $4.5 million during 2007 and up to $2.25 million in 2008, the company said in court papers Monday.

The payments are tied to reaching various benchmarks for earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation, amortization and restructuring costs.

The plan is a step down from a previous proposal that entitled Burns to $9.1 million over the next few years, including a $6 million bonus once the auto-parts supplier emerged from bankruptcy protection.

Dana, of Toledo, Ohio, makes axles, frames and other large components for cars and commercial trucks and is highly dependent on General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co.

The company is one of at least a half-dozen large U.S. auto-parts companies that have fallen into bankruptcy amid production cutbacks by the country's biggest auto makers.

DOJ_NMG_0091825

The company said that under the new plan, five other top managers would share a pool of up to $3.18 million in 2007 and would be entitled to a pool of at least $1.59 million the year after. The company didn't disclose the benchmarks that would trigger payments.

About 40 percent of Burns' pension benefits will be classified as an allowed unsecured claim under the company's plan of reorganization. Additionally, court papers said if Burns is terminated after his contract is accepted by the company, he will waive claims valued at up to $9 million.

Under Burns' contract with Dana before its bankruptcy filing, he was entitled to additional retirement benefits to replace benefits from his prior employer that he gave up upon joining Dana, court papers said.

Dana said it started retirement benefits for Burns in 2004 with an account balance of $5.9 million. After the company's bankruptcy filing in March, Burns was eligible for a general unsecured claim for his retirement benefits.

As in other requests stressing the importance of the bonus payments, Dana said Burns and the other executives have extensive experience and contacts in the automotive sector and other industries.

"If any of the senior executives were terminated, it is highly likely that they would quickly find another position with the automotive industry, potentially to the direct competitive detriment of Dana," the company said.

But many parties initially objected to giving top managers bonuses, including the Justice Department representative, who called the plan "extravagant" at a time when the auto-parts supplier is considering cuts to employee health benefits.

And former employees like Robert E. Snyder of Fort Myers, Fla., still aren't happy with the plan. The Dana retiree with 39 years of service wrote a letter to Lifland asking him to strike down the proposal again.

"It sounds and appears to me that Mr. Burns is out for himself and to heck with the rest of the company, workers, retirees and creditors," Snyder wrote. "Mr Burns has not been with Dana very long, so I question why he should be entitled to any outrageous bonus."

Judge Lifland, of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, is scheduled to consider Dana's request at a Nov. 21 hearing.

Lifland agreed to let Dana take another swing at the plan after the company asked him to explain why the original bonus plan violated provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay.

At the time, Dana's bonus request was widely viewed as a litmus test for the 503(c) section of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, enacted a year ago.

U.S. Trustee Diana G. Adams said Dana crossed the line in making the request because the Bankruptcy Code doesn't allow the court to offer advice on how to frame legal arguments.

"Under the guise of requesting 'clarification' of the court's ruling on numerous grounds, the debtors are now seeking a 'second bite at the apple' by re-arguing the compensation motion that was already denied by the court," Adams said. "The debtor should not rely on the court to structure a remuneration program for executives that is statutorily permissible."

Lifland instead gave Dana more time to craft a legal strategy that would get the bonus plan approved.

Abortion Foes Face Pair Of Big Tests (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Within 24 hours, the antiabortion movement's two central strategies are receiving high-profile tests -- one in the marble chamber of the U.S. Supreme Court, the other in far-flung polling stations across South Dakota.

Today, the Supreme Court will hear a Bush administration appeal to reinstate the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, a 2003 law struck down by lower courts because it included no exception for the woman's health. The partial-birth ban fits with a national strategy to impose greater restrictions on the procedure while deferring a direct challenge to Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that first located a right to abortion within the Constitution's privacy provisions.

The strategy recognizes that a majority of the current court has accepted Roe's fundamental holding that a woman has at least some discretion over whether to bring a pregnancy to term. But since the justices have left unclear the precise limits of that discretion, leading abortion foes have taken an incremental approach. That follows the model used by civil rights lawyers decades ago to chip away at state-imposed segregation case by case, rather than mount a frontal assault headlong into existing precedent.

In South Dakota, the Republican-controlled Legislature didn't want to quibble over which abortion restrictions might square with Roe. In February, it passed a ban on all abortions except those necessary to save the woman's life -- a clear violation of federal precedent -- hoping to spark a test case that could lead the Supreme Court to reverse Roe.

DOJ_NMG_0091826

The plan hit an obstacle when some residents, including some abortion critics who felt the law went too far by leaving no exception for rape or incest, qualified a referendum to let voters ratify or repeal the ban, and they voted to repeal it on yesterday's ballot, according to the Associated Press.

The ban's defeat could sap momentum from the antiabortion movement, undercutting the argument that the Supreme Court has imposed abortion rights on states dead set against it. "People in South Dakota don't like government telling them what to do," says Jan Nicolay, a retiree from Chester, S.D., and co-chairwoman of the campaign against the ban.

Even if South Dakotans had ratified the ban, some national antiabortion activists considered it a fool's errand. When the Supreme Court previously has upheld abortion restrictions, it has never rejected Roe's basic holding, and lower courts are bound to follow. Of the court's current justices, only Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas have indicated they would reverse Roe outright.

The case being heard today reaches a court likely to be more receptive to abortion restrictions than in the past. In a 2000 case, Stenberg v. Carhart, the justices voted 5 to 4 to strike down a Nebraska law banning "partial birth" abortions, which the state defined as partially delivering from the uterus "a living unborn child before killing the unborn child and completing the delivery."

The majority found the law violated precedent forbidding regulations that place an "undue burden" on women seeking abortions. The court ruled that Nebraska had defined the prohibited procedure too vaguely and failed to allow its use when the woman's health was in jeopardy. Three federal circuit courts cited Stenberg to invalidate the similar 2003 law signed by President Bush.

But two Bush appointees have since joined the Supreme Court, with one succeeding a member of the Stenberg majority, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Both Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito bring records suggesting deep skepticism, if not outright hostility, to precedent on abortion rights.

Abortion foes feel confident that the federal partial-birth ban will pass muster with the required five justices. The question is whether the court will rule narrowly to find the federal law comports with Stenberg -- or, as they hope, will use the opportunity to overrule the 2000 case and significantly expand legislative authority to restrict abortion.

The Bush administration contends that the 2003 law was carefully drafted to avoid the flaws the court found in Nebraska's ban. Congress defined the prohibited procedure in more detail and, after holding hearings, declared that "partial-birth abortion is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother." Although lower courts found that such an assertion wasn't adequately supported by medical evidence, the Justice Department argues that the court should defer to the congressional finding.

The procedure critics call partial-birth abortion generally is used later in pregnancy and is a small fraction of abortions performed. But both sides agree that if the federal law survives, more abortion restrictions are in the offing.

"I'm looking to see what kind of relaxed standard the court may come up with," says Clarke Forsythe, an attorney with the advocacy group Americans United for Life, which filed a friend-of-court brief supporting the government. "It all comes down to how you define 'undue burden.' If Justice [Ruth Bader] Ginsburg defines it, virtually anything is an undue burden. If you look at Justice [Anthony] Kennedy's position, most things you might do are not an undue burden."

Both justices have voted to affirm Roe's central holding, but were on opposite sides in the Stenberg case. Justice Ginsburg joined Justices Stevens, O'Connor, David Souter and Stephen Breyer in the majority. Justice Kennedy dissented, as did Justices Scalia, Thomas and the late chief justice, William Rehnquist.

Mr. Forsythe predicts that a relaxation of the Stenberg standard could lead some states, and perhaps Congress, to impose additional regulations to discourage abortions, such as requiring doctors to tell patients about their "medically documented risk to women" or that they cause "fetal pain."

Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, expects that a government victory would prompt antiabortion lawmakers to go further and ban other specific procedures by declaring they are never medically necessary.

"Throughout the 30-plus years of abortion jurisprudence, there has been a very clear standard that abortion restrictions not endanger a woman's health," as determined in consultation with her doctor, says Ms. Northup. Her group represents Dr. LeRoy Carhart, a Nebraska physician who successfully challenged his state's ban and prevailed in lower courts over the federal effort. "The question is whether this new Roberts court is going to follow this longstanding precedent."

Roberts Court Faces First Abortion Cases (CSM)

By Warren Richey
The Christian Science Monitor, November 8, 2006
WASHINGTON

DOJ_NMG_0091827

In their confirmation hearings last year, John Roberts and Samuel Alito sidestepped pointed questions about whether they would overturn abortion precedents. Now, a year later, the country is about to get some answers.

Wednesday, the US Supreme Court takes up two cases challenging the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

The cases offer a first look at how the high court under Chief Justice Roberts will approach the divisive issue of abortion. While the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act poses no direct threat to major abortion precedents like Planned Parenthood v. Casey and Roe v. Wade, activists on both sides of the debate are watching closely to see if the two federal ban cases - and new justices on the court - trigger a turning point in abortion jurisprudence permitting more rigorous regulations at the state and federal level.

At issue in Gonzales v. Carhart and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood is whether Congress acted within its authority when it mandated a national ban of so-called partial-birth abortions without including an exception to protect a woman's health.

Protection of a woman's health has been a paramount concern of the high court since Roe v. Wade. But the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act introduces a second concern - as the law puts it: "protecting the life of the partially-born child."

Supporters say the law is necessary to foster respect for human life by outlawing what they call a gruesome abortion procedure that approaches infanticide. Opponents see the federal ban as part of an agenda to gut and eventually overturn abortion precedents all the way back to Roe v. Wade.

That's why, during their confirmation hearings, Judges Roberts and Alito were asked early and often about abortion and the legal concept of enforcing existing precedents known as stare decisis.

"I do think it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee in September 2005. But he added, "The principles of stare decisis [also] recognize that there are situations when that's the price that has to be paid."

His cautious answers extolling the virtues of both upholding and overturning precedents thus set the stage for what could become a dramatic moment of truth at the high court in the two cases to be argued Wednesday.

"No law has ever been upheld where it is understood that part and parcel of the regulation is a requirement that a woman absorb an increased risk to her health," says Roger Evans, legal director of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, which is challenging the law.

US Solicitor General Paul Clement says the law does not impose an undue burden on a woman's access to abortion. "The act simply eliminates a disfavored and rarely used late-term abortion procedure," he says in his brief to the court. "No precedent of this court requires the judicial invalidation of that legislative measure."

With the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, there is much speculation about how the new lineup of justices will rule on the issue. The last time the court considered a similar case, in 2000, it split 5-to-4. Justice O'Connor cast the deciding vote to strike down a similar partial-birth abortion ban enacted in Nebraska. Now, O'Connor has been replaced by Justice Alito. Many analysts say that Alito and Roberts will align with conservatives Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

On the other side, the liberal wing of Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer is expected to hold firm. That would place Justice Anthony Kennedy in position to cast the deciding vote. Approving ban doesn't end abortion

But a vote by Justice Kennedy to uphold the statute wouldn't signal the potential demise of Roe, analysts say.

"There is a tremendous amount of space and a tremendous amount of time in years between the upholding of this statute [if the court votes to uphold it] and any direct threat to Roe," says David Garrow, a US legal historian who teaches at Britain's Cambridge University.

Although he might join the court's conservative wing to uphold the statute, Kennedy nonetheless remains a centrist who voted with Justices O'Connor and Souter to affirm the central holding of Roe in the 1992 Casey decision. Rather than enabling an all-out conservative assault on liberal abortion precedents, Kennedy is more likely to use his swing-vote power to moderate the more aggressive preferences of his conservative colleagues, some analysts say.

At issue in the two cases now before the court is to what extent states and the federal government can pass laws restricting abortions without including a health exception.

When Congress passed its partial-birth abortion statute in October 2003, lawmakers announced that they intentionally did not include a health exception in the statute because "a partial-birth abortion is never necessary to preserve the health of a woman."

That conclusion directly conflicts with the holding of the five-justice majority in the 2000 Nebraska case. Lawmakers said they reached a different conclusion based on evidence presented at various trials and at congressional hearings.

The law was immediately challenged in three federal courts. All three struck it down as unconstitutional, in part because it lacked a health exception as required in the high court's 2000 Nebraska decision. Abortion providers and other medical experts testified at the trials and disputed the congressional finding that the procedure was never necessary to preserve a woman's health. Rare procedure, sometimes safest

DOJ_NMG_0091828

So-called partial-birth abortion is not a common procedure, but in certain instances, medical authorities say, it can be the safest option for women in their second trimester of pregnancy. The procedure involves widening the cervix, using forceps to extract the fetus, and then killing the fetus once it is partially removed from the woman.

The Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act does not use medical terms to identify the outlawed procedure. It subjects doctors to two years in prison and imposes fines if during the course of performing an abortion either the head or the lower half of the fetus's body to the navel is outside the mother at the time the doctor kills the fetus.

Under the terms of the law, a doctor would avoid liability by killing the fetus prior to extracting it, rather than extracting it first.

Abortion supporters say the new law, if upheld, would force doctors to alter their abortion procedures to comply with a congressional mandate rather than having the flexibility to follow their professional judgment about the best treatment option.

"When a woman's health is at stake, women would like their physicians to make appropriate medical decisions - not their representatives in Congress," says Vicki Saporta of the National Abortion Federation.

In addition, the law places doctors in the difficult position of potentially having to consider their own legal liability rather than focusing exclusively on their patients' well-being, abortion-rights activists say. This could deter some doctors from performing second trimester abortions, they add.

Abortion opponents say that the law reflects the legal reality that the process of birth converts a fetus into a person with rights independent of the rights of the mother. The partial-birth abortion law draws a bright line to prevent a procedure that comes dangerously close to infanticide, they say.

In their written briefs to the high court, both sides are directing the thrust of their arguments at Kennedy. Kennedy upholds states' rights

In the 2000 Nebraska case, Kennedy didn't just issue a dissent. He launched an impassioned 25-page attack on the majority's position. He accused his fellow justices of betraying his understanding of the 1992 landmark Casey decision.

"When the court reaffirmed the essential holding of Roe, a central premise was that the states retain a critical and legitimate role in legislating on the subject of abortion," Kennedy wrote in his Nebraska dissent. He said the state's partial-birth abortion law was "well within the state's competence to enact."

Solicitor General Clement echoes that argument in his brief saying that Congress shares the same legislative power as the states to enact a ban. He says that Congress's legislative finding that partial-birth abortion is never medically necessary is entitled to deference by the courts.

Lawyers challenging the law are also reaching out to Kennedy in a different way. They are appealing to the Justice Kennedy who has taken a firm stance against Congress encroaching into what Kennedy views as the domain of the Supreme Court to identify and enforce the boundaries of constitutional rights.

In the partial-birth abortion law, the lawyers say, Congress is attempting to redefine abortion rights in open defiance of Supreme Court rulings protecting those rights.

"Congress has not merely promulgated a measure that poses a significant threat to women's health. Of equal concern, Congress has issued a rebuke to this court, challenging its pre-eminence as the branch of government whose duty it is to say what the law is," writes Priscilla Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights in her brief. Key abortion cases

Roe v. Wade (1973) - The Supreme Court's 7-to-2 ruling established that a woman has a constitutional right to choose to end her pregnancy.

Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992) - The high court's 5-to-4 decision reaffirmed the central holding of Roe v. Wade, while allowing that states may regulate abortion procedures as long as they don't put an undue burden in the path of a woman seeking an abortion.

Stenberg v. Carhart (2000) - In a 5-to-4 vote, the high court struck down a Nebraska statute that banned so-called partial-birth abortions. The court said the state law did not include an exception to protect the health of a woman and thus created an undue burden on the right to an abortion.

All Eyes On Kennedy In Court Debate On Abortion (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

As the Supreme Court prepares for today's oral arguments on the federal "partial birth" abortion ban, both sides are focusing on the same question: "What will Kennedy do?"

DOJ_NMG_0091829

Four liberal justices are considered certain votes against the law, legal analysts said, and four conservatives are expected to uphold it. The pivotal figure in the biggest Supreme Court abortion battle in half a decade is Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the 70-year-old centrist with an 18-year record of eclecticism on abortion and other social issues.

Abortion rights advocates believe that, despite his past support of a state ban on the late-term procedure that opponents call "partial birth," he may now assume the moderating "swing vote" role that retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor formerly played. Kennedy's performance may not only determine the fate of this federal abortion law but also foreshadow the overall balance of power on a court that is still defining itself after the addition of two conservatives picked by President Bush.

"If he is the fifth vote, which is the conventional wisdom, we have to come up with something that explains why this case isn't like Stenberg v. Carhart ," the 2000 case striking down a state ban, in which Kennedy dissented, said Stanford University law professor Pamela S. Karlan, who co-wrote a friend-of-the-court brief for California doctors opposing the ban.

Supporters of the ban are attempting to convince Kennedy of the opposite. "If you look at all the briefs, they are all written to Justice Kennedy," said Benjamin W. Bull, chief counsel of the Alliance Defense Fund, an antiabortion legal organization.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement quotes Kennedy's Stenberg dissent 22 times in his briefs defending the federal law, which was adopted by a wide margin in Congress and signed by Bush in 2003.

Bush's conservative appointees, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., have thin track records on abortion, and some court-watchers say they may not be sure to vote to support the ban.

As chief justice, Roberts might have institutional concerns if the court appears to abandon a major abortion ruling that has been on the books for only six years.

"Roberts might be convinced by stare decisis," the legal principle that favors sticking with established precedent, Karlan said.

Liberal Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer were in the majority in Stenberg and are unlikely to switch.

Conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are firm opponents of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 case that legalized abortion nationwide.

But Kennedy has been known to change his position on big issues.

Last year, Kennedy wrote the majority opinion in a 5 to 4 ruling that banned the death penalty for juvenile offenders. He had voted to uphold it 16 years earlier.

In a major 1992 abortion case, Planned Parenthood v. Casey , Kennedy voted at the justices' conference to uphold Pennsylvania's strict abortion regulations but later switched and cast a fifth vote to reaffirm Roe v. Wade , according to internal court documents in the late Justice Harry A. Blackmun's papers at the Library of Congress.

This time, though, opponents of the ban must overcome not only Kennedy's vote in Stenberg v. Carhart but also the emotional dissenting opinion that accompanied it, in which he blasted "a procedure many decent and civilized people find so abhorrent as to be among the most serious of crimes against human life."

The procedure, known medically as "intact dilation and extraction," or "D & X," usually occurs in the second trimester of pregnancy. A doctor partially delivers a fetus, then suctions out its brain and collapses its skull to permit the head to exit.

The Guttmacher Institute, a reproductive-health organization affiliated with Planned Parenthood, has called the procedure rare and said only 2,200 were performed in 2000. Abortion rights advocates say the procedure is necessary in a relatively few cases when a fetus has a fatal birth defect such as anencephaly.

But abortion opponents say that estimate is too low and that the operation is tantamount to infanticide. In 1997, Nebraska, like many other states, outlawed it except when necessary to save a mother's life.

But the Supreme Court, by a vote of 5 to 4, struck down Nebraska's law, because it lacked an exception to preserve a mother's health. The court also ruled it was so vaguely worded that it might also criminalize other second-trimester abortion procedures.

In his dissent, Kennedy argued that the court had violated his understanding of the compromise forged in the Casey ruling: that the core right established in Roe would remain but states would have meaningful power to regulate abortion.

Like Nebraska's, the federal ban lacks a health exception. The Republican-controlled House and Senate instead issued "findings," based on congressional testimony, that the procedure is never necessary to protect a woman's health. Supporters of the law say the Supreme Court must defer to those findings.

Abortion rights advocates say the findings are wrong because "D & X" sometimes poses less risk of infection or surgical mishap than a common alternative, "dilation and evacuation," in which the fetus is pulled apart before being removed from the uterus.

So far all federal lower courts to rule on the law have said its lack of a health exception violates Stenberg . As a result, the ban has never been in effect.

DOJ_NMG_0091830

At the Supreme Court, abortion rights advocates hope Kennedy also feels bound by Stenberg , even though he opposed it at the time. They also believe Kennedy could be persuaded by new information about the need for a health exception that the court did not have before it ruled in 2000.

"This will appeal to Justice Kennedy's sense of wanting to look at the medical evidence," said Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, which represents Leroy Carhart, the Nebraska physician who also challenged that state's law six years ago.

The California Medical Association is trying another tack -- appealing to Kennedy's belief in states' rights.

The federal ban invokes Congress's authority to regulate interstate commerce. But the CMA's friend-of-the-court brief argues that Congress's commerce authority cannot trump the states' traditional regulation of medical practice -- a tradition Kennedy cited earlier this year in striking down a Justice Department effort to prevent Oregon doctors from prescribing lethal doses under that state's assisted-suicide law.

The CMA brief quotes passages from Kennedy's opinion noting that "regulation of health and safety is 'primarily, and historically, a matter of local concern,' " particularly when it comes to "the practice of medicine."

"If it weren't abortion, his opinion in the Oregon case would apply," said Karlan, who co-wrote the brief. "The hard thing in partial-birth abortion is that he has a visceral feeling and has already expressed distaste for the procedure."

Abortion Rights Groups Choose Insiders To Argue High Court Cases (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 8, 2006

When a high-stakes Supreme Court argument looms, litigants often turn to the heavy-hitting veterans of high court advocacy. Not so for the abortion rights groups who will be fighting the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 before the Court on Thursday.

When the pair of cases on the issue is called, staff attorneys Eve Gartner of Planned Parenthood and Priscilla Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights will rise to the occasion. It's Gartner's first high court argument and Smith's second, but their bosses are confident about sending them into the fray.

"I didn't think about it for more than five seconds," says Planned Parenthood's Roger Evans, who adds that Gartner is the first staff lawyer to argue before the high court for the organization, which has been party to many of the major abortion cases in history. "She knows the issues better than anyone walking," says Evans, noting that Gartner has handled the case from the beginning.

Same story from Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, who says Smith was the only lawyer considered. Smith represented Nebraska physician LeRoy Carhart, who sued the state for prohibiting him from performing certain types of abortions, all the way through district court and the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "The facts really matter in this case," says Northup.

Smith won her first high court case in 2001: Ferguson v. City of Charleston strengthened privacy rights for pregnant women. Smith has "a cool head and a warm heart," says Northup. Smith is a Yale Law School grad; Gartner's from Columbia. They sat in on oral arguments recently, along with Kathryn Kolbert, who argued and won Planned Parenthood v. Casey in 1992.

Cambridge University professor David Garrow, a leading chronicler of the Court's abortion jurisprudence, thinks going in house was the right move. "Lawyers who've dealt with these issues for years have a mastery of abortion-specific issues and facts that no big-foot Supreme Court specialist could hope to equal."

Defending the law for the Bush administration in both cases will be a veteran: Solicitor General Paul Clement, who has argued 34 cases before the Court. He's had extra time to prepare; he did not argue any cases in October. One sign of the high interest in the case: The Court has authorized same-day release of argument audiotapes to the media.

Keep ‘partial-birth' Ban (USAT)

By Jay Sekulow

USA Today, November 8, 2006

.

There is no reason to keep partial-birth abortion legal. It's a gruesome, barbaric procedure that occurs partly outside the mother's body, typically by inserting scissors into the back of the baby's head. As several of the justices hearing the cases today have acknowledged, it's hard not to label this procedure “infanticide.”

In 2000, the Supreme Court voted 5-4 to strike down Nebraska's ban on partial-birth abortion. Now — with two new justices — the court is considering whether the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 is constitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0091831

Before passing the measure with wide bipartisan support, Congress spent more than eight years deliberating this issue and reached substantial factual findings. Congress held extensive hearings that included the presentation of medical testimony that graphically depicted the procedure's horror and highlighted that there is never a medical need for this procedure.

The Supreme Court must permit Congress to ban this nightmarish practice. Partial-birth abortion represents the bridge between abortion and infanticide. The government has a vital interest in preventing the spread of abortion into infanticide.

We view the challengers' argument as a claim that partial-birth abortion might in some cases be marginally safer for some women when compared with other abortion procedures. Such strained hypothetical scenarios do not justify knocking down the wall between abortion and infanticide. As Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote in dissent in the Nebraska case in 2000, such an argument "views the procedures from the perspective of the abortionist, rather than from the perspective of a society shocked when confronted with a new method of ending human life."

The Supreme Court has an important opportunity to do what it failed to do six years ago: allow an end to this horrific procedure. The truth is that the federal ban on partial-birth abortion is a valid — indeed essential — barrier against infanticide.

Jay Sekulow is chief counsel of the American Center for Law and Justice, which filed a brief with the Supreme Court on behalf of members of Congress who support the ban.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Investigating Va. Voter Calls (SLOT)

By Zinie Chen Sampson

AP, November 8, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. - The FBI said Tuesday that it is looking into complaints that callers tried to intimidate or confuse Virginia voters in the hard-fought race between GOP Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger Jim Webb.

State Board of Elections Secretary Jean Jensen said her office had forwarded several reports to the FBI of voters receiving phone calls intended to discourage them from voting or directing them to the wrong polling place.

"If something is going on that worries and alarms voters enough that I'm contacted to look into it, I have a responsibility to do that," Jensen said.

The FBI is checking the reports, agent Stephen Kodak Jr. said.

Voters in several cities and counties across the state reported getting deceptive telephone calls in the days before the election informing them falsely that their voting places had changed, Jensen said.

According to a sworn statement filed with the Board of Elections, a man said he got a phone message from the "Virginia Elections Commission" telling him that he was registered to vote in New York and would be "charged criminally" if he voted in Virginia.

Another man said in an affidavit that he got a call from a woman claiming to be helping Webb. He said the woman gave him an incorrect polling place address after he told her he planned to vote for Webb.

Chris LaCivita, a consultant to the Allen campaign, said the calls did not originate with the GOP. "And it's sure as heck not coming from the Allen campaign," LaCivita said.

The Webb campaign said the calls were intended to confuse and discourage Virginians from voting.

"We've seen this tactic before and it is about time the Republicans learned that it will not work," said Jay B. Myerson, general counsel of the Virginia Democratic Party.

In the 2002 midterm elections in New Hampshire, Democratic get-out-the-vote phone banks and a ride-to-the-polls line run by firefighters were swamped by hang-up calls. James Tobin, a former top GOP official, was convicted in December of telephone harassment for his role in the effort.

New Mexico Democrats have filed court complaints similar to those in Virginia, accusing GOP callers of providing voters with incorrect information on polling locations in Albuquerque. A judge Monday refused to prohibit Republicans from calling voters.

In Ohio, a prosecutor also warned voters to be wary of fraudulent calls claiming that their voting precincts had been changed.

Bitter Webb-Allen Contest Goes Down To The Wire (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091832

RICHMOND, Va. — Democrat Jim Webb held a razor-thin lead over Republican Sen. George Allen early Wednesday, raising the likelihood that their bitter fight for Allen's seat would lead to a recount that could last into December.

Allen, a folksy senator with presidential ambitions, seemed to be on his way to an easy re-election just a few months ago — before Democrats began portraying him as a racist and criticizing him for supporting President Bush's war in Iraq.

Allen piled up big voting margins in conservative, rural counties across Virginia, but as election night wore on, the incumbent's support throughout the countryside was offset by Webb's strong showing in urban areas.

Webb, a low-key former secretary of the Navy who criticized Bush and Allen over the war, did particularly well in Northern Virginia's suburbs of Washington, D.C., in Richmond and in the Tidewater area, which is home to several military bases.

As it became clear that the outcome would be in doubt well into Wednesday and beyond, both sides reflected a mix of anxiety and confidence.

Allen noted that a few thousand votes were still to be tallied, and told cheering supporters here that "I know the counting will continue" and that "accuracy in elections will prevail."

At a hotel ballroom in northern Virginia, Democrats expressed growing confidence that Allen's seat — key to Democrats' efforts to take over the Senate — might become theirs.

Webb told more than 600 supporters that "it's going to take awhile, but some point very soon, I think we're going to be on top."

On TV, news commentators began talking recount.

In Virginia, the presumed loser can request a recount if the margin between the candidates is less than 1%, and late Tuesday it was nearly certain that would be the case — raising the possibility that it could be December before a winner is finally declared.

The State Board of Elections plans to meet late this month to certify a winner; after that the apparent losing candidate will have 10 days to ask for a recount.

The close finish capped a campaign that wound down in the same spirit in which it was waged for months: with rancor and accusations of wrongdoing, this time over whether voters were getting last-minute calls aimed at keeping them from the polls.

The FBI was investigating complaints from voters in several counties who reported receiving phone calls falsely telling them that their polling places had changed.

Allen, an affable and popular former governor often compared to Ronald Reagan in temperament and style, saw a healthy lead begin to evaporate in August when he called a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian heritage "macaca," a slur referring to a type of monkey. Allen said he made up the word on the spot and didn't know it was a slur.

The story prompted other reports that Allen, who once displayed a noose and hung Confederate flags in his home and office, had used racial slurs against blacks as a young man. He denied it.

In turn, Republicans denounced Webb as a near-pornographic writer for some steamy scenes in his best-selling war novels.

Webb also came under fire for comments he made about women in 1979. A former Reagan administration appointee, Webb wrote a magazine article in which he complained about women being admitted to the U.S. Naval Academy.

Allen used the article in TV ads in which women expressed anger over what Webb had said. Allen's campaign also referred to Webb as a "Hollywood novelist" and ran TV ads denouncing him for refusing to "be ashamed" of his novels.

The fact that late polls showed Allen and Webb neck-and-neck in a state that is home to the Pentagon and several big military bases was heartening to Democrats.

Although Allen has long held the support of the state's military, exit polls showed Webb, a onetime Republican who switched parties because of his opposition to the war, doing well around the bases.

As results came in, jittery Allen supporters filed into a hotel ballroom here.

When Fox News announced that the state's voters had approve a gay-marriage ban amendment, there was only subdued applause, a reflection of the anxiety in the room.

An Enormous Sigh Of Relief From Md. Election Officials (WP)

By Christian Davenport And Cameron W. Barr, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

This time, the machines worked.

For the most part, anyway.

Despite scattered problems across Maryland, voting went off relatively well yesterday, as embattled state election officials avoided a reprise of the troubled September primary.

DOJ_NMG_0091833

Local election boards were almost gleeful that the electronic voting apparatus -- and the legions of election judges who operate it -- were able to bear the weight of a general election in which a high-profile U.S. Senate and governor's race brought out voters in droves.

In the District, where voter turnout was light, few problems were reported. And in Virginia, the FBI was investigating allegations of voter intimidation in several jurisdictions.

In the weeks before yesterday's elections, several top Maryland lawmakers said their confidence in the state's voting system had been badly shaken by human and technical mishaps in the Sept. 12 primary. And some, including Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), urged voters to stay away from the electronic machines and vote by paper absentee ballot instead.

By yesterday afternoon, however, Linda H. Lamone, administrator of the Maryland State Board of Elections, declared, "We're in good shape." And she said the reports of problems were "minuscule when you look at the whole enterprise."

"In many jurisdictions, we had a wake-up call on primary day, and I think everybody benefited from that," she said. "As a result, we got more training for our election judges so they could handle the equipment on Election Day."

Linda Schade, a spokeswoman for the election watchdog group TrueVoteMD, reported about 75 incidents of delays, check-in problems and technical issues, such as frozen screens and malfunctioning voting cards. But she had not heard of any broad failures such as the ones during the September primary.

During the primary, the electronic poll books, used to check in voters, repeatedly crashed -- a problem that officials said they had since resolved. Election judges in several jurisdictions showed up late or not at all. And in Montgomery, officials forgot to deliver the plastic automated cards needed to operate the electronic voting machines.

Since then, election officials wanted "to regain our good reputation in the election world, and I think we've proved that we did," said county election spokeswoman Marjorie Roher.

In Virginia, with the tight race between Sen. George Allen (R) and Democratic challenger James Webb, a handful of voters in at least eight parts of the state, including Arlington and Fairfax counties, complained of attempts to mislead them into not voting or going to the wrong polling place, said Jean Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections. Most of the voters received phone calls incorrectly telling them their polling places had changed.

The matter was referred to the FBI, which said it was investigating. An Arlington man, Timothy Daly, said in an affidavit that someone purporting to be from the "Virginia Elections Commission" left him a phone message Sunday saying he would be criminally charged if he voted in Virginia because he is registered in New York. In fact, Daly is registered in Arlington.

A computer glitch that cut off candidates' last names on the final summary page of ballots in Alexandria, Falls Church and Charlottesville did not cause major problems at the polls, officials said. Candidates names were visible in full on the page where voters made their selections.

But that didn't satisfy everyone. "It's inexcusable," said Falls Church resident Michael Slonim, 47, after casting his ballot. "It's criminal."

In Maryland, yesterday's election was "perfect" compared with the primary, said Bernice Gordon, an election judge at a Chevy Chase precinct. "This is a good system -- when it works," she said.

But there were scattered reports of problems.

Electronic voting machines at some precincts -- including polling places in Friendship Heights and Chevy Chase -- had to be taken off-line because they malfunctioned.

Some voters complained of "vote inversion," where a vote in favor of one candidate somehow was switched to another before the ballot was cast. Other voters said that they requested absentee ballots but said they didn't receive them on time and thus couldn't vote. And long lines -- particularly in Prince George's County -- lasting up to an hour or longer drove some voters away from the polls.

About a dozen Montgomery polling places had an early-morning scare when election judges realized that power cords for the poll books were missing. But the books were able to run on backup battery power, and election officials were able to deliver the cords within 90 minutes, Roher said.

Some voters complained that the touch-screen machines didn't record their votes correctly. Rytis Grybauskas, 49, a systems analyst for the Department of Labor from Carroll County, said he put his finger "squarely" on the box for the congressional candidate he wished to vote for. "But the candidate above got the 'X,' " he said.

He was able to correct the mistake, but it happened again when he tried to cast his vote for state delegate.

"It was very unsettling," he said.

Concerns about the electronic voting equipment drove a record number of voters to cast absentee ballots. But election officials underestimated the number of absentee ballots that would be needed, so some voters who requested the ballots did not receive them.

DOJ_NMG_0091834

Elizabeth Crowley of College Park said a ballot requested by her husband, David, on Oct. 24 arrived Monday -- too late, she said, because he had left for a temporary Air Force deployment three days before.

"I just think it's deplorable," Crowley said. "You'd think that after the botched presidential election [of 2000] we'd have this figured out by now."

FBI Launches Probe Of Virginia Pre-election Calls (CNN)

CNN.com, November 8, 2006

RICHMOND, Virginia (CNN) -- The FBI is taking a preliminary look at allegations that some voters in eight Virginia counties received deceptive phone calls before Election Day, law enforcement sources said.

State election officials expressed concern about the calls Monday but said they were hesitant to launch an immediate investigation for fear of politicizing the vote.

The Virginia State Board of Elections notified the U.S. Justice Department and state attorney general's office on Monday, said James Alcorn, the board's policy adviser.

He said neither state nor federal officials were likely to "get involved" until after the election. The immediate response to the allegations was voter education, he said.

Alcorn said the state board had received a "handful" of calls and complaints about alleged deceptive phone calls made to potential voters. Jean Jensen, secretary of the board, said it had received two notarized complaints, one from a voter in Arlington and the second from Northampton County.

The affidavit from Timothy Daly of Arlington, provided by the Board of Elections, said he got a message on his answering service Sunday in which the caller claimed to be from the Virginia elections commission.

The caller said that it had been determined Daly was registered to vote in New York and would not be allowed to cast a vote Tuesday in Virginia. If he did, he would be criminally charged, the caller reportedly said.

Jay Meyerson, an attorney advising Virginia Democrats, said late Tuesday it was determined Daly had been the victim of a hoax. The Democrats notified the FBI agent in charge of the investigation, Meyerson said.

In another affidavit, Lawrence Baumann stated that he was contacted Friday by a woman who said she worked for the campaign of Democrat Jim Webb, who is running for the Senate against Republican Sen. George Allen.

The woman told Baumann that his polling place had changed to West Reed Street. Baumann told her there was no such street in his city, and "that if she was supposed to be helping Webb, she needed to give correct information."

The woman didn't give the correct precinct or offer to get back to him with that information, Baumann stated. She said she was calling from California.

The Webb campaign said it does not make calls of that nature. Jensen, the election board secretary, said that any such communication would come in writing from election officials.

"Voters should not be intimidated or deceived by phone messages purporting to be from election officials," Jensen said. "Any communication from federal, state or local election officials will always be in written form clearly identifying the official source."

By Tuesday, reports had come from voters or elections board officials in eight counties about similar calls, the State Board of Elections said.

CNN's Kelli Arena and Ronni Berke contributed to this report

Voter Intimidation, Dirty Tricks Alleged (BSUN/AP)

By Deborah Hastings, The Associated Press

The Baltimore Sun, November 8, 2006

Problems reported with new electronic voting machines in some states

Election Day was tainted by complaints of dirty tricks that led to FBI investigations in at least two states, with some voters reporting intimidating phone calls, misleading sample ballots and even an armed man outside a polling place.

Nonetheless, poll watchers said voting across American went relatively well, despite machine malfunctions and long waits in some states.

"For 7,800 jurisdictions in this country, it looked like things came out pretty cotton-pickin' well," said Doug Lewis, executive director of Election Center, an nonpartisan organization of state election officials. "There were some problems, in some states, but overall it looks like all the predictions of disaster turned out wrong."

As polls closed nationwide, one of the worst waits appeared to be in Denver, where hundreds waited long past sunset at beseiged polling centers. They continued to wait, 90 minutes after the 7 p.m. close of voting. It was a miserable end to a day fraught with new voting machine problems and the longest statewide ballot in decades.

DOJ_NMG_0091835

"This is positively ridiculous," said Jack McCroskey, who leaned on a cane while waiting to vote. "At 82, I don't deserve to have to stand out here."

Voter intimidation accusations prompted others to claim that some voters were bullied from getting a chance to vote.

In Virginia, the FBI was looking at complaints of an apparently orchestrated series of phone calls in the hard-fought U.S. Senate race between Republican George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb. Some voters reported they got calls telling them to stay home on Election Day, or face criminal charges.

The liberal voter group MoveOn.org offered a $250,000 reward for information leading to a conviction for voter interference, which is a federal crime.

In Indiana, the FBI was investigating allegations that a Democratic volunteer at a polling site in the college town of Bloomington was found with absentee ballots after counting had begun.

Other states reported similar problems.

In Arizona, three men, one of them armed, stopped Hispanic voters and questioned them outside a Tucson polling place, according to voting monitors for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which photographed the incidents and reported them to the FBI.

In Maryland, sample ballots suggesting Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Senate candidate Michael S. Steele were Democrats were handed out by people bused in from out of state. Democrats outnumber Republicans in Maryland by nearly 2-to-1.

An Ehrlich spokeswoman said the fliers were meant to show the candidates had the support of some state Democrats. They were paid for by the campaigns of Ehrlich, Steele and the GOP. Some of the fliers include pictures of Ehrlich with Democrat Kweisi Mfume, a former NAACP president.

More than 80 percent of the nation's voters were expected to cast some type of electronic ballot today, which was the deadline for major reforms mandated by the federal Help America Vote Act, passed by Congress to prevent a rerun of the 2000 election debacle.

In some states, the effort to improve the integrity of the election system got off to a shaky start. Long lines formed, prompting appeals to judges to keep the polls open longer.

Kevin Caffrey, a 43-year-old school teacher from Denver and a registered Republican, was furious after he was forced to stand in line for more than an hour.

"Every individual who put me in line, I'm voting against them. I've been waiting in line like an animal. This is a nightmare," he said.

Some politicians, and their offspring, also were turned from the polls.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton told reporters at a campaign stop near her home in Chappaqua that her daughter, Chelsea, had been turned away at a Manhattan polling site because her name did not appear in a book of registered voters. She was offered an affidavit vote, similar to provisional ballots used in other states.

In South Carolina, Gov. Mark Sanford was sent away away because he didn't have a voter registration card. He went back with the right identification.

Computer glitches and poll workers' unfamiliarity with the new equipment were also blamed for long lines in states including Ohio, Tennessee, South Carolina and Illinois.

U.S. District Court Judge Dan A. Polster in Ohio ordered polls stay open until 9 p.m., 90 minutes after closing time, after the Ohio Democratic Party sued Cuyahoga County because of crowded precincts.

Cuyahoga County, home to Cleveland, suffered 14-hour voting lines in 2004. Today, problems with ballot-reading machines caused delays of more than an hour. For the first time, all 88 Ohio counties used electronic voting -- either touch-screens or paper ballots that are electronically scanned.

Machine Problems, Ballot Probe Mar Voting In Indiana Counties (FWNS)

By Cliff Brunt

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, November 8, 2006

Problems with electronic voting overshadowed concerns over Indiana's new voter ID law in its first general election test.

Neither, however, turned into the disastrous Election Day some critics had predicted.

"It has not been a perfect election, but I believe it has been a fair election that will produce accurate results," Secretary of State Todd Rokita said Tuesday.

Democrats who have challenged the voter ID law in court argued it would deter participation by certain groups, including the poor and elderly, but few problems were reported.

DOJ_NMG_0091836

Instead, many of the election problems stemmed from new voting machines Indiana counties were required to use under the Help America Vote Act, which was passed after the 2000 presidential race.

In Monroe County, however, state police, election officials and the FBI looked into allegations that a Democratic volunteer was found with unprocessed absentee ballots in her possession after the county began tallying absentee votes.

The county is the largest in the 9th Congressional District, where Democrat Baron Hill regained the seat he lost to Rep. Mike Sodrel in 2004.

Both campaigns expressed concern that improper activity had occurred.

"It would be really unfortunate that anybody from any party would expose themselves to possible violations of the law to win elections. That's not how you conduct an election," Sodrel said, hours before conceding defeat in the hotly contested race.

About 20 ballots were in question, Jack Schmit, a Republican member of the county election board, told The Herald-Times of Bloomington.

County Clerk Jim Fielder told The Associated Press late Tuesday that the incident had been blown out of proportion. He said election officials had not discovered any irregularities in the precincts that they had counted.

In Delaware County, blue start cards that activate the push-button machines were programmed incorrectly in 75 Delaware County precincts by MicroVote General Corp., the company that installed software in 47 Indiana counties, County Clerk Karen Wenger said.

The problems were fixed by late morning, but a court order extended voting to 8:40 p.m. local time.

In northern Indiana's LaPorte County, two polling places stayed open late because of difficulties getting machines to operate properly.

In Marion County, Indiana's largest, electronic optical-scan machines that read paper ballots did not work correctly for early voting in more than 100 precincts. Some workers had trouble connecting optical-scan machines to new touch-screen models, which handicapped voters use, said Marion County Clerk Doris Anne Sadler.

Despite the glitches, officials were pleased with the turnout, which Rokita had predicted would exceed the 38 percent in the 2002 midterm election.

Officials in northern Indiana's St. Joseph County said more than 8,500 people cast absentee ballots, nearly a 55 percent increase over 2002, county officials said.

"Everyone is saddened by what they've seen over the past few years in regards to this country," said Democrat Joe Donnelly, who unseated Rep. Chris Chocola. "Everyone loves this country so much they are flocking to the polls to vote for change and for a new direction."

Cheating To Avoid A Beating? (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - The FBI yesterday was investigating reports of Election Day dirty tricks amid allegations of padlocked offices, cut phone lines, threats of arrest, "robo-calls" and hacked Web sites around the country.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said there was no indication of widespread fraud, but FBI officials confirmed agents were probing several incidents.

"We'll look into these matters to see if there are any potential violations," one FBI official said.

Both Republicans and Democrats flung allegations, denials and counteraccusations.

"Why do we need Jimmy Carter observing overseas elections when there's so much work for him here at home?" said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond political analyst.

There were also reports of problems with electronic voting systems and scanners that record paper ballots in several states, including Colorado, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Utah.

Voters complained of long lines in several states. In North Carolina, about 100 voters were left waiting at a church because the poll worker who had the key showed up nearly an hour late.

South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford was turned away from the polls because he had forgotten to bring his voter identification card. He had to go home and get it before poll workers would let him cast a ballot.

But some of the glitches reported around the country seemed far from accidental.

In New Jersey, GOP Senate contender Tom Kean Jr.'s campaign office was allegedly chained shut with padlocks and keys broken off in locks.

In upstate New York, Democrat Dan Maffei, who is challenging Republican Rep. Jim Walsh, said a GOP operative claiming to be a Maffei staffer shooed away voters at a polling site.

DOJ_NMG_0091837

Voters also reported getting slammed with automated "robo-calls" that began, "I'm calling with information about Dan Maffei." The calls were not made by his campaign, but were intended to get voters annoyed with Maffei.

In Virginia, Democratic Senate hopeful Jim Webb's campaign released a taped message left for an Arlington County Democrat by the nonexistent "Virginia Elections Commission." The caller said the resident was registered to vote in another state and could be jailed if he tried to cast a ballot in Virginia.

Efforts also were made to steer voters to the wrong polling site.

"A call was made to voters saying, 'This is your new voting location,' and it was not the person's voting location," election official Valarie Jones said.

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), Webb's opponent, reported phone lines at his office went dead for the second day.

In Michigan, GOP officials said Mike Bouchard's Senate campaign Web site was attacked.

In Kentucky, a poll worker was arrested after allegedly choking a voter after arguing over a ballot issue.

Voting monitors in Arizona said three men, one of them armed, stopped Hispanic voters and questioned them outside a Tucson polling place.

News Wire Services

Glitches Made Voting Tough For Some (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Alan Gomez

USA Today, November 8, 2006

Voters in many states endured long lines, complex rules, balky machines and confused poll workers Tuesday — but most election experts called it progress.

Problems at polling places were widespread, forcing eight states to extend voting hours. None of the problems, however, rose to the level that plagued the 2000 presidential election in Florida. Primary election meltdowns in Illinois, Ohio, Maryland and elsewhere also were not repeated.

“It looks like it actually went better than everybody expected,” said Doug Lewis of the Election Center, which represents state and local elections officials. “My God, it's a big country, and you'd expect some glitches.”

The worst problems were caused by computers, such as Denver's adventure with a digital voter verification system. Others were caused by fast-changing laws and court decisions that had voters and poll workers confused about what identification was required to vote. Still others were caused by a good thing: heavy turnout.

“We had several people say it's like the longest airport security line they've ever been in,” said Julie Bowen of Denver, where voters waited two to three hours to vote. The upside? A chance “to meet lots of new neighbors.”

Even elected officials had trouble negotiating the voting process. Missouri Secretary of State Robin Carnahan was asked for identification that wasn't required. South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford was turned away because he didn't have his voter registration card. Ohio Rep. Steve Chabot had to go home for better ID; fellow Rep. Jean Schmidt had trouble with her optical-scan voting machine.

Exit polls showed 88% of voters were confident the votes in their states would be counted accurately. Still, Chellie Pingree of Common Cause, which ran a hotline for aggrieved voters, said, “Many of our calls are from people who just don't trust their vote anymore.”

In Denver, 55 centralized vote centers that replaced 400 neighborhood precincts caused traffic jams, made worse by the slow operation of the county's digital database and ballots crowded with initiatives. Even Democratic gubernatorial candidate Bill Ritter waited nearly two hours to vote.

In Delaware and Marion counties in Indiana, computer errors caused problems in nearly 200 precincts. A court order extended voting for nearly three hours in Delaware County to make up for late starts.

In Cuyahoga County, Ohio, which includes Cleveland, a federal judge ordered polls kept open an extra 90 minutes because of long lines and late openings caused by machine problems. The county was the scene of the worst voting problems during this year's primaries and had taken extensive steps to improve training for poll workers. County elections chief Michael Vu said some machines didn't work, and some technicians didn't show up or couldn't fix them.

Those and other problems were not unexpected in a system that has changed dramatically since Florida's adventure with “hanging chads on punch cards in 2000. About 30% of the nation was working with new equipment this year under deadlines imposed by the Help America Vote Act of 2002. Many experts viewed it as a test run for the 2008 presidential election and deemed it a success.

DOJ_NMG_0091838

"We said there were going to be a few glitches, and there are," said Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, which was created after the 2000 voting debacle. "We're using technology. We're using electronics. At times, machines do break. But there's backups — paper backups, provisional voting."

Tova Wang, an elections expert at the Century Foundation, a non-partisan think tank, said, "There's no national meltdown. There's the kind of isolated problems that do disenfranchise people. None of this should come as a shock to anyone."

The FBI was called into Virginia to investigate possible voting irregularities after it received a call from state Elections Board Secretary Jean Jensen on Monday night. Federal investigators were reviewing reports that some voters received telephone calls directing them to the wrong polling places or discouraging them from voting, FBI spokesman Stephen Kodak said.

Problems crossed state lines:

·Some touch-screen machines didn't start. Others recorded votes incorrectly. "It's like a car or any other machines," said Tuscarawas County, Ohio, deputy elections director Sarah Kneuss. "Sometimes some … don't work."

·Voters were turned away for lack of proper identification, even where strict laws requiring photo ID had been struck down by courts. The problem was reported in Arizona, Georgia, Missouri and other states with laws blocked by judges.

·Polling places ran out of paper ballots. In Jefferson County, Mo., voter Scott Brotherton said he had to wait an hour for more ballots. "I've counted 20 people walk away," he said.

Voting hours were extended because of delayed openings, long lines or machine malfunctions in parts of seven states: Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania and South Carolina. Voting at one site in Madison, Wis., was extended because of delays caused by a bomb threat.

There were other reports of suspected dirty tricks. In Arizona, three men, one of them armed, questioned Hispanic voters outside a Tucson polling place. In New Jersey, vandals attacked Republican Senate candidate Thomas Kean's headquarters.

In Maryland, Republicans paid for sample ballots meant to link GOP candidates for governor and Senate to the state's dominant Democratic Party.

"Things appear to have gone much more smoothly than a lot of people feared," said Dan Tokaji, an Ohio State law professor. "It certainly could have been a lot worse."

Minor Glitches Beset Some Polling Locations Worker Miscues, Long Lines And New Machines Abound; Voter Suppression Is Alleged By JUNE KRONHOLZ, CHRISTOPHER CONKEY And YOCHI J. DREAZEN (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

It was messy: There were complaints of computer glitches, long lines, problematic voter rolls, poll-worker errors and even missing extension cords.

But fears that new voting equipment and high turnout might lead to a massive breakdown of the election system seemed, at least initially, to go unrealized.

In DeKalb County, Ga., Latitia Naghise, a human-resources technician, said she attempted to vote for Mark Taylor, the Democratic candidate for governor, but her touch-screen voting machine twice tried to record her as voting for Republican Sonny Perdue.

A polling place in Will County, Ill., south of Chicago, was ordered by a court to stay open when the election judge didn't show up with the ballots. "I still haven't heard from him," said clerk Nancy Schultz Voots, who said she collected the ballots from his daughter hours later.

In Cleveland, a federal judge extended voting hours at 16 polling places because machine problems prevented polls from opening on time. Polls in seven other states were kept open late, generally because of voting-machine problems.

Heavy demand for absentee ballots apparently overwhelmed clerks. Voters complained they hadn't received their ballots, prompting an initially unsuccessful legal attempt by some voters in Anne Arundel County, Md., to extend the deadline. Both parties -- and even Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich -- had advised residents to vote absentee out of wariness of new electronic machines.

Republicans complained about voting irregularities and campaign vandalism in more than a dozen states throughout the day, an apparent effort to counterbalance election-problem complaints from Democrats. Missouri Republicans alleged that liberal-activist groups were buying votes in Kansas City by offering free lunches to voters and then driving them to the polls.

In a radio interview, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said Democrats are "always crying wolf when in fact, if you look historically, they have been the ones that very often have been responsible for the irregularity."

Democrats were concerned about what they regarded as misleading sample ballots being distributed in Maryland that allegedly represented top Republican candidates as Democrats, and suggested they had been endorsed by African-American leaders. In Virginia, the party said the Federal Bureau of Investigation was investigating allegations of voter suppression from automatic calls warning voters to stay away from the polls. Stacie Paxton, Democratic National Committee press secretary, charged that "Republicans have a history of using voter suppression and intimidation tactics and this election is no different."

DOJ_NMG_0091839

In other places, high turnout created its own problems. Election officials raced across St. Louis to deliver additional voting machines, as lines grew long and tempers ran short.

"We've never had this kind of turnout -- ever," Matt Potter, deputy director of the St. Louis Board of Election Supervisors, told a restive crowd of about 100 would-be voters as he helped install two new touch screens along with the four in use at the West Pine apartment complex.

Many of the problems seemed to result from new equipment, identification requirements and voter-registration lists required by the Help America Vote Act. That 2002 law made billions of dollars available to assist states in replacing their punch-card and lever voting machines and assemble statewide voter databases by this year.

Many states were late meeting the deadlines, and about 55 million voters were using new voting equipment this year. In many states, voter databases -- which tell poll workers who is eligible to vote and where -- haven't been cleaned of misspelled names and other simple errors that could keep voters from being able to cast ballots.

Liberal activists have worried that transition problems could cause elderly and minority voters to give up in the face of long waits. "I said, 'Stick around, they might get something going,' " said Fred Neal, a retired auto worker who was monitoring voting in an East Cleveland, Ohio, polling place for a clean-election advocacy group. Mr. Neal said only four of a dozen or more voting machines were working early in the day, and voters were beginning to leave.

The Election Protection Coalition, a group of mostly liberal-activist organizations, said it had received 17,000 calls to its complaint line by 6 p.m., with more complaints from Ohio than any other state. Most calls were informational, including questions about the location of polling stations.

Public interest focused on the voting machines, and calls to Election Protection and other hotlines pointed to programming glitches and training problems. There were numerous examples of vote "jumping" -- when a vote cast one way on a touch screen registers the other way on a machine's summary page.

Carol Marchant, a Fairfax, Va., lawyer, said her vote jumped on the state's gay-marriage amendment, although she was able to correct her choice. "I voted 'No,' it came up 'Yes.' Somehow it switched," she said. Bridget Williams, a DeKalb County, Ga., communications worker, said her Democratic votes jumped to the Republicans in races for governor, secretary of agriculture and state supreme court.

Republicans had the same complaint. Mark Sheridan, a lawyer for the Republican committee in New Jersey, said some voters complained that machines had been "preset" with votes for Sen. Robert Menendez, the Democrat, and wouldn't register votes for Tom Kean Jr., the Republican. In Ohio, Republicans complained that Democratic poll watchers were trying to help or talk with voters as they cast their ballots.

There were numerous reports of machines that wouldn't work, and poll workers who didn't know how to fix them.

A Broward County, Fla., polling place opened three hours late because a poll worker inserted the ballots for one precinct into the machines of another.

"Everything they were doing, they were doing incorrectly." said Mary Cooney, spokesperson for Broward County's election supervisor.

In Clinton, Md., Rene Ballard, a government worker, said long lines formed at her polling place at a Moose Lodge because only four of 16 touch screens were working. "A lot of people were leaving -- they had to get to work," she said.

The Board of Elections in Baltimore County, Md., said "six or seven" precincts were short on extension cords used to plug in touch-screen machines. Deputy Director Katie Brown said the machines could have run on backup batteries, but some voters complained they were taken out of service until cords were delivered.

Elections officials characterized machine snafus as rare and manageable, but some advocates and voters said poll-worker mistakes painted a more troubling picture. "It all sounds innocuous, but the sum total is enormous," said Pamela Haengel, head of the Voting Integrity Alliance of Tampa Bay, Fla., a nonpartisan-activist group.

--Gary Fields and John D. McKinnon contributed to this article.

Write to June Kronholz at june.kronholz@wsj.com15, Christopher Conkey at christopher.conkey@wsj.com16 and Yochi J. Dreazen at yochi.dreazen@wsj.com17

Number Of Civil Rights Voting Complaints 'low' (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, CNN Washington Bureau
CNN.com, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091840

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- As polls began to close in the East, Justice Department officials said voter complaints to federal officials had been "low" on Tuesday.

Fewer than 200 calls were received by the Civil Rights Division hotline in Washington, down from about 1,200 complaints received during the 2004 elections.

"Nearly all of the civil rights and access problems dealt with minority language voting issues," said one Justice Department official familiar with federal election monitoring. The official was unaware of any cases in which voters were denied the right to vote based on race or ethnicity.

A second Justice Department official described the number of voting access issues as "low to normal."

"Every election there are always going to be problems, and there were some this time, but there was nothing really out of the ordinary," the official said.

The officials asked not to be identified because the Justice Department does not comment officially on election-related issues.

Justice officials also described criminal fraud issues as relatively low. The officials confirmed there had been scattered complaints relating to alleged intentional acts directed at voters. Although they provided no specific numbers, they said the scope of such allegations were not out of the ordinary for recent election cycles.

"It will take a day to sort out exactly what complaints were received," one of the officials said. Justice Department officials would not comment on any specific problems that arose Tuesday.

The FBI confirmed agents had conducted a preliminary inquiry into allegations of possibly fraudulent telephone calls to several dozen voters allegedly aimed voter suppression. (Full story)

NAACP Alleges Voting Irregularities (WXYZ)

WXYZ-TV, ABC 7, Detroit, November 8, 2006

With just a few hours before the polls close there are allegations of voting irregularities. Tuesday afternoon, the NAACP called for an emergency news conference in Detroit.

The NAACP said they received approximately 74 complaints on their voter hotline by voters who believe they were registered, but were turned away at the polls because their names did not appear on the registration list.

Rev. Wendell Anthony, Detroit NAACP, said "The constitution guarantees every American the right to vote and when you’re one of the 74 and your vote is not counted, you have a problem. We in the NAACP have a responsibility; we have a duty to make certain that every vote counts. That’s why we have monitors out, that’s why we have challengers out. We have 108 lawyers out in every precinct in this city. That’s why we cannot sit by and wait for a barrage of complaints to come in."

The NAACP has also accused two people of posing as election officials in polling places.

Rev. Anthony said the election is too critical for voters to be turned away. The NAACP has filed complaints with the U.S. Justice Department.

House Democrats Seek Probe Of Republican Campaigning (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, November 8, 2006

Nov. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Two Democratic U.S. lawmakers accused Republicans of ``possibly illegal'' campaign tactics, claiming they arranged automated, late-night telephone calls to spark voter anger against Democrats running in today's election.

The so-called robo-calls may have violated federal and state laws, Representatives John Conyers and John Dingell, both of Michigan, said in a letter that urged the Justice Department, the Federal Election Commission and the Federal Communications Commission to investigate.

The often-repeated calls were designed to ``generate anger'' at Democratic candidates by leading voters to believe Democrats made them, the lawmakers said yesterday in the letter. With control of Congress on the line in today's voting, both parties are watching the other's last-minute campaign tactics.

``In fact, the calls are being funded'' by the National Republican Congressional Committee, ``which has reportedly provided $600,000 to fund this deception,'' Conyers and Dingell wrote.

NRCC spokesman Ed Patru said the group wasn't associated with any illegal calls. There are ``hundreds of groups'' from various political parties that could make such calls, he said.

All NRCC-sponsored calls ``are in adherence with all the laws pertaining to political calls,'' Patru said. ``All of our calls have NRCC disclaimers, and they're made between the hours of 9 a.m. and 8 p.m.''

Justice, OPM Send Observers To Polling Places (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, November 8, 2006

The Justice Department has sent more that 500 federal observers and more than 350 other employees to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states to monitor today's midterm elections. The record-breaking effort partially reflects voters' concerns about the balloting process, namely the accuracy and functioning of electronic voting machines.

The number of federal workers dispersed for the election is more than double the total sent on Election Day 2002, the previous record for observers at a midterm election, according to a Nov. 6 Justice statement.

Since passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Justice has regularly sent observers and monitors around the country to protect election-related civil rights, the statement reads. This summer, President Bush signed the reauthorized Voting Rights Act, which protects Americans' rights to participate in the electoral process without discrimination.

Under the law, Justice is authorized to ask the Office of Personnel Management to send federal observers to areas that have been certified for coverage by a federal court or the attorney general.

Included among the 69 jurisdictions in 22 states where OPM observers and/or Justice employees are monitoring polling places today are: Chambers, Lee and Tuscaloosa counties in Alabama; Broward, Duval, Hillsborough, Osceola and Palm Beach countries in Florida; Chicago and Cook County, Ill.; Boston and Springfield, Mass.; Bergen, Essex, Hudson, Middlesex and Salem counties in New Jersey; Kings, Queens, Richmond and Westchester counties in New York; and Cuyahoga County, Ohio.

News reports today state that the FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in the Virginia Senate race between Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb.

State election officials alerted Justice Nov. 6 to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters that attempted to misdirect or confuse them about Election Day. They said the FBI is investigating.

DOD re-signs Stanley contract

The $63 million prime contract calls for the systems integrator to continue providing end-to-end IT and information assurance support for the Joint Strike Fighter Program Office.

CDW-G adds 5 companies to small-business consortium

The company selected five new members for the Small Business Partner Consortium through a competitive process after it solicited small businesses to partner on federal business opportunities.

Record Number Of Feds Monitor Elections (FEDTIMES)

Federal Times, November 8, 2006

The Justice Department deployed an unprecedented number of federal employees to monitor today's midterm election. More than 500 observers assigned by the Office of Personnel Management and more than 350 Justice employees were sent to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states.

The figures more than double the total sent on election day in 2002, which was the previous record for a midterm election, according to a department news release.

Under the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which President Bush reauthorized this summer, Justice can ask OPM to send federal observers to areas that have been certified for coverage by a federal court or the attorney general.

The observers and monitors will watch and record activities during voting hours at select polling locations. Justice's Civil Rights Division is coordinating the federal activities and contact with local election officials. In addition, the department has deployed observers and monitors who speak Spanish, Arabic, and a variety of Asian and Native American languages.

The OPM observers and Justice employees will monitor whether certain counties and localities are complying with federal voting laws by, for example, determining whether any voters are challenged improperly on the basis of their race, color or membership in a language minority group; whether polling places are complying with the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act; whether voters who are blind, have disabilities, or are unable to read or write are allowed assistance by a person of their choice; and whether all eligible voters are allowed to cast a ballot, or at least a provisional ballot.

Justice, OPM Dispatch Hundreds Of Poll Watchers (GOVEXEC)

By Tom Shoop

Government Executive, November 8, 2006

The Justice Department and the Office of Personnel Management have dispatched more than 850 people to monitor Tuesday's voting -- a record number for a midterm election.

Under the 1965 Voting Rights Act, Justice is authorized to ask OPM to send observers to specific locations that have been certified by a federal court or the attorney general after allegations of civil rights violations surfaced. Justice officials announced

DOJ_NMG_0091842

Monday that they had requested 500 such observers, and that more than 350 of the department's own employees also would serve as monitors.

The observers have been sent to 69 locations in 22 states. Before 1976, monitors concentrated their efforts in just five states: Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina. Now observers are dispatched to polling places ranging from Kings County, N.Y., to Orange County, Calif.

OPM has a pool of 900 intermittent employees who are called into service as monitors on an as-needed basis, according to Nancy Randa, OPM's deputy associate director for human resources products and services, who testified on the agency's role before a House subcommittee in November 2005. The pool includes federal retirees, students, private sector workers and full-time employees of other federal agencies.

The observers "serve as neutral monitors, who do not intervene if there are violations," Randa testified. "They only watch, listen and record events that occur at particular polling sites on election days." They participate in one-day classroom training sessions prior to serving, and attend pre-briefing sessions the day before elections.

Between 1966 and this year, OPM sent a total of more than 26,000 observers to election sites.

Ban On Same-Sex Unions Added To Va. Constitution (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

A constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and civil unions in Virginia passed easily yesterday, adding the state to more than 20 others that have prohibited the practice.

The measure was strongly backed in all parts of the state except for Northern Virginia, where a majority of voters appeared to agree with the argument that the amendment would affect all unmarried couples, not just gay ones.

Amendment supporters in Virginia said the early returns demonstrated that their message of protecting traditional marriage had resonated with voters, despite efforts of opponents to characterize the amendment as writing discrimination into the state Bill of Rights.

"Despite an incredibly difficult political environment, a closer-than-anticipated Senate race, a well-funded opposition and a media that ignored the real question on the ballot, the measure passed," said Victoria Cobb, executive director of the Family Foundation, which helped organize support for the amendment. "All that matters tonight is that marriage is protected in the commonwealth. We can say once and for all that Virginians have rejected redefining marriage."

Voters who backed the amendment said they saw the measure as an opportunity to enshrine their belief in traditional marriage in the state's fundamental document. Several also said that they had no animosity toward gay people but that marriage was an institution that should be reserved for heterosexual couples.

"I'm not an ultraconservative when it comes to homosexuals. I have some wonderful friends who are homosexual, but I think marriage is between a man and a woman," said Ann Potocnak, 37, of Prince William County.

Opponents suggested that the effort to explain their position -- that the amendment would harm a broad swath of Virginians -- would have benefited from more time and advertising.

"Obviously, we're disappointed," said Claire Guthrie Gasta?aga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, the group leading the opposition. "Even though we reached out as much as we could, the bottom line is that we ran out of time and money that we needed to convert as many voters as we needed. I remain convinced that an informed voter was a no voter."

Virginia was one of eight states to have constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage on ballots yesterday, and voters in South Carolina and Tennessee approved them. Early returns showed support for the proposals in Idaho, Wisconsin and Colorado. Opponents in Arizona were hopeful that that state would be the first in the country to defeat a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

Two other Virginia constitutional amendments -- one that would allow churches to incorporate and another that would give the General Assembly authority to allow local governments to offer tax breaks to certain homeowners -- also gained voter approval by wide margins.

Even though same-sex marriages and civil unions are illegal in Virginia, supporters said the amendment was necessary to protect against judges who might rule that the current statute is unconstitutional, as happened in Massachusetts in 2003. They also pointed to a decision late last month by the New Jersey Supreme Court requiring that state to provide gay couples with the same rights as heterosexual ones as reason to back the proposal.

Opponents of the measure, who raised more than $1 million during the race, focused their campaign on the second and third lines of the ballot question, which read in part that Virginia would not create a legal status for unmarried couples that sought to "approximate . . . the effects of marriage."

DOJ_NMG_0091843

They said that the wording was too broad and that once Virginians understood that the amendment would also ban civil unions and domestic partnerships, they would vote against it. They were backed by a slew of legal experts and Democratic state politicians, including Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, who campaigned against the measure throughout the fall. Kaine also raised concerns about the amendment's effect on the state's business climate.

Supporters rejected the argument that the measure would affect all couples, citing a legal brief prepared by Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) that argued that the rights of unwed couples to enter into contracts would not be threatened by the amendment because such rights flow from common law, not solely from marriage.

Voters who supported the amendment appeared to be unconcerned about -- or unaware of -- the opponents' argument. In many cases, supporters said that their belief in traditional marriage overrode any concerns about potential impacts.

"I feel [same-sex couples] should have rights as far as benefits are concerned, but I feel marriage should be between a man and a woman," said Chris Murray, 36, a mortgage broker from Fairfax County. He said he realized that there was a chance the amendment would lead to the loss of legal rights for same-sex couples, but "you can't vote 'maybe' or 'kind of,' " he said.

Those who voted against the ballot question said they believed that the amendment was unnecessary, with several calling it a cynical distraction from real issues affecting residents.

"It's already there. Why go on and drag this out, just because some religious groups want to exclude certain things from certain people that have different lifestyles?" asked Frans Hagen, 72, a retired restaurant executive from Annandale who runs an education foundation.

Macon Council Votes To Pursue City-county Consolidation (MACT)

By Travis Fain

The Macon Telegraph, November 8, 2006

Macon-Bibb County consolidation took a small step forward, the City Council approved a new method for collecting garbage fees and city officials increased the 911 surcharge for cellular telephones today.

During today's Macon City Council meeting, the council voted 9-6 to push toward unification of the Bibb County and city governments and ask the Middle Georgia Regional Development Center to draw new voting district lines.

"This is the time for consolidating our governments," said Councilwoman Filomena Mullis, who sponsored the resolution.

"From what I'm hearing in the community, a vote would not pass," countered Councilwoman Elaine Lucas.

There are several more steps before consolidation could become a reality. The Bibb County Commission also is expected to take up the issue before the RDC draws new voting districts for a proposed nine-member, countywide governing body. Then the commission and council would vote again on those districts, and the state Legislature would need to approve them. The U.S. Justice Department would have to sign off on the districts before a countywide referendum would be held. Similar consolidation efforts have been rejected in Bibb County.

Though Tuesday's vote was a first step of sorts, it generated more debate than any of the other 34 items on the council's agenda. In the end, council members Mullis, Rick Hutto, Mike Cranford, Ed DeFore, Anita Ponder, Willette Hill-Chambliss, Miriam Paris, Nancy White and Cole Thomason voted for the measure. Council members Lucas, Brenda Youmas, Alveno Ross, Henry Ficklin, Charles Jones and James Timley voted against it.

Tiny Austin Water District Challenging Voting Rights Act (AAS)

By Marty Toohey, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin (TX) American-Statesman, November 8, 2006

MUD claims provisions may be unconstitutional

Four years ago, a water utility in Northwest Austin wanted to move its polling place out of a garage but was required to ask the federal government for permission and wound up paying $1,250 in legal fees.

Now, in response, the Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1 has filed a lawsuit against the Department of Justice that could wind up eliminating portions of the Voting Rights Act.

The lawsuit, filed Aug. 4, challenges the federal government's authority to require certain areas with a history of discrimination at the polls, including Texas, to get "preclearance" before changing aspects of how they conduct their elections.

The lawsuit says that the district should be released from the requirement because it has no history of racial discrimination and that if not exempted on those grounds, it should be released because the requirement is unconstitutional.

The lawsuit has the support of people who say the provision is a holdover from a bygone era and does not protect the rights of minority voters.

Edward Blum, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and critic of the Voting Rights Act, wrote a paper in July that predicted legal challenges would soon overturn preclearance.

DOJ_NMG_0091844

Blum, who earned a bachelor's degree from the University of Texas, concluded his paper by writing, "It simply isn't 1965 anymore in the Deep South. But it may take the Supreme Court to tell that to Congress."

The lawsuit has alarmed civil-rights and minority-rights groups, who say all portions of the Voting Rights Act are still necessary. The act was passed in 1965 but was re-authorized by Congress this summer, an action that advocacy groups point to as proof of its relevancy.

"This is not really about this little MUD," said Rolando Rios, a San Antonio attorney who often represents the League of United Latin American Citizens, which is considering intervening in the lawsuit. "It's about the rights of minority voters."

The case is now before a U.S. District Court in Washington, although many expect it to go to the Supreme Court.

'This little MUD'

Northwest Austin MUD No. 1 was established in 1987 to provide water and sewer to the Canyon Creek neighborhood in far Northwest Austin. It serves about 1,300 homes, as well as a few office buildings and apartment complexes, charging 30 cents per $100 of assessed property value.

Four years ago, the district wanted to move its polling place from a garage to a nearby school in the hopes of boosting voter turnout. But it had to pay Austin attorney Greg Coleman $1,250 to handle an application to the Justice Department, which did not reply for two months.

In most cases, permission simply requires a letter. The Justice Department has the authority to turn down a request. Coleman said it's an unnecessary process that takes time and money and targets states for long-past transgressions.

Coleman, who does occasional work for the MUD, suggested that the MUD challenge the requirement for authorization and volunteered to work the case pro bono.

"The Supreme Court has always recognized (authorization) as a burden on local sovereignties," said Coleman, a former law clerk for U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. Coleman said civil-rights groups are acting hypocritically by opposing the MUD after they argued that the Voting Rights Act should be renewed because it includes a "bailout clause" from government authorization for governments that can prove they do not have a history of discrimination.

"The district fully supports all voting rights for everybody," Coleman said. "It has never discriminated against anyone."

Other players

On Monday, the American Civil Liberties Union filed paperwork to intervene in the lawsuit, which would allow it to submit arguments to the court and possibly give testimony.

Lisa Graybill, the legal director for the ACLU's Texas affiliate, said the organization would probably not get involved if the case concerned only the MUD. She said the ACLU is worried about a constitutional precedent that could lead to overturning of the rule requiring authorization. She said that if that happened, the Justice Department would lose valuable oversight in areas where discrimination could still happen.

Preclearance "doesn't mean they can't change how they do their elections; it just means they have to ask the Justice Department for permission," Graybill said. "We don't consider that burdensome."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund also have filed to intervene in the case, representing an African American and Hispanic couple, respectively.

The groups expect the lawsuit to take more than two years to resolve.

Rios, the lawyer representing the Latin American League, said it is considering joining the fray in part because it does not trust the Justice Department to properly argue the case. As an example, he pointed to a congressional redistricting plan in Texas that the Justice Department had blessed. The Supreme Court recently overturned part of that map on the grounds that it was unfair to minority voters.

"Needless to say," Rios said, "we are somewhat reticent about having (Attorney General) Alberto Gonzales represent the rights of minorities."

On Oct. 16, the Department of Justice filed a blanket denial of the charges brought in the lawsuit. The Justice Department's press office did not respond to interview requests.

mtoohey@statesman.com; 445-3673

Vouchers In Black And White (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

One frequent, and nasty, argument against school vouchers is that they will end up resegregating public schools. It's all the nastier because the truth is the opposite, as some new evidence shows.

The liberal Urban League has charged that school vouchers -- which go mostly to minority families -- would "subsidize segregation." And the theme has been picked up by no less than Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who according to Newsday explained her opposition to school choice this way to liberal activists in the Bronx earlier this year: "First family that comes and says 'I want to send my daughter to St. Peter's Roman Catholic School,' and you say, 'Great, wonderful school, here's your voucher.' Next parent that comes and says, 'I want to send my child to the school of the Church of the White Supremacist . . .'"

DOJ_NMG_0091845

Yes, she really said that. We doubt many inner-city black and Latino families that benefit from vouchers are demanding that their kids attend white supremacy schools, even if there were such schools. Come to think of it, what specific schools is Mrs. Clinton referring to? She and her husband of course sent their daughter to one of Washington, D.C.'s most elite, and mostly white, private schools.

She can't mean the schools in Milwaukee and Cleveland, where a new study by Greg Foster of the Milton and Rose Friedman Foundation finds that vouchers have allowed students to move to more racially integrated private schools. The Friedman Foundation favors school choice, but its data here seem unassailable and the Foundation is challenging anyone to refute it. The study finds that in 2003 private voucher schools in Milwaukee were 13% more racially diverse, and the Cleveland voucher schools 18% more diverse, than their public school counterparts.

America's inner-city public schools remain highly segregated primarily because the neighborhoods and school districts are themselves divided by race or ethnicity. The public urban schools, Mr. Foster finds, tend to "reproduce the segregation that arises from housing patterns." Vouchers increase racial mixing in schools, the study concludes, because "they break down geographic barriers, drawing together students across neighborhood boundaries in a way the government school monopoly cannot match even when it tries to do so."

In the 50 years since Brown v. Board of Education, educators have thought that if they could integrate the schools, even using such detested strategies as forced busing, school quality would improve. It hasn't. School vouchers give inner-city and other kids a chance to escape failing public schools, and it's a nice bonus to know that this choice will produce classrooms that, to borrow a famous phrase, look like America.

ANTITRUST:

Private Equity Deals Face Wider Probe (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera, Brooke Masters And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, November 8, 2006

The US antitrust authorities are seeking comprehensive information on all “club deals” involving five of the world’s largest private equity firms since 2003 – a sign that the informal probe into alleged collusion in the buyout industry is broader than expected.

News of the details of the investigation, which began in September with a letter from the Department of Justice to the buyout funds, will quash widespread speculation the government is focusing only on a handful of recent high-profile deals such as last year’s $15bn takeover of Hertz rent-a-car business.

People who have seen the letter, sent to Carlyle Group, Clayton Dubilier & Rice, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Merrill Lynch and Silver Lake Partners, said it requested a list of all the documents related to consortium deals since January 2003. The authorities are also believed to be seeking e-mail communications.

E-mails have proven useful to investigators in recent financial probes because they can provide real-time evidence of a person’s intent to commit a crime - a crucial element in prosecutors’ decision on whether to bring charges against individuals.

Contrary to previous speculation, which focused only on successful deals, the letter is believed to be asking for information on all bids by groups of buyout funds for US companies, even when the consortium ended up on the losing side.

The investigation has shaken a buyout sector that had been revelling in the ability to raise unprecedented amounts of capital from investors and exploit favourable conditions in the debt and equity markets to clinch ever-larger deals.

However, the breadth of the request suggests that the authorities may take a long time to narrow the focus of the probe. Often government investigators will come back with a grand jury subpoena seeking more detailed information if they believe they are on the track of something specific, lawyers familiar with the process said. But they cautioned that not every investigation ever reaches that stage.

“Club deals”, which see rival buyout funds team up to mount multi-billion dollars bids, have fuelled the private-equity-led takeover boom of the past few years.

The five buyout funds touched by the informal probe clinched more than 20 club deals worth over $100bn in 2005-2006 alone, according to figures from Dealogic.

The private equity groups have not spoken publicly about the informal probe and neither has the DoJ’s Manhattan antitrust office, which is leading the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0091846

However, some antitrust experts say that it could be difficult for the antitrust authorities to prove that buyout funds colluded to keep takeover prices lower or to refrain from bidding against rival consortia.

Some lawyers argue that “club deals” could be seen as pro-competitive as they enable private equity groups to buy companies they could not buy on their own.

Others point out that the large buyout funds compete fiercely for companies and they often team up with different partners on different bids.The US antitrust authorities are seeking comprehensive information on all “club deals” involving five of the world’s largest private equity firms since 2003 – a sign that the informal probe into alleged collusion in the buyout industry is broader than expected.

News of the details of the investigation, which began in September with a letter from the Department of Justice to the buyout funds, will quash widespread speculation the government is focusing only on a handful of recent high-profile deals such as last year’s $15bn takeover of Hertz rent-a-car business.

EU Clears Philips To Buy Intermagnetics (AP-YBIZ)

AP, November 8, 2006

EU Clears Philips to Buy Medical Systems Supplier Intermagnetics

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- EU regulators gave Royal Philips Electronics NV the go-ahead Tuesday for its euro1 billion (US$1.26 billion) purchase of a major supplier, U.S. magnet maker Intermagnetics General Corp., that will boost its medical equipment unit.

The European Commission said an investigation found the tie-up would not damage competition in Europe, after examining whether the new company would be able to control the supply of radio-frequency coils to Philips' rivals that also make magnetic resonance imaging, or MRI, systems.

"The market investigation has shown that these risks are minimal, mainly due to economic incentives and the presence of several other suppliers of coils for MRI systems," regulators said.

They found that MRI system manufacturers could also make coils themselves if they had to, so Philips would not be in a position to cause antitrust problems.

Philips, the second largest maker of medical equipment globally after General Electric Co., said in June it expects the acquisition will win customers in the short run, and improve the company's supply chain and development of new products in the long run.

Philips offered US$27.50 (euro21.87) per share for Intermagnetics in a bid unanimously supported by the company's boards.

Latham, New York-based Intermagnetics also makes superconducting magnets for MRI systems. It had sales of US$304 million (euro242 million) in the last year ended in February.

In 2005, Philips bought U.S.-based medical company Stentor Inc. for US$280 million to strengthen its position in the fast-growing market for clinical information technology. It also bought Lifeline Systems Inc. of the U.S. for US$750 million to strengthen its consumer health business.

Intermagnetics employs 1,150 people. Chief Executive Glenn Epstein will remain and lead the companies' merged MRI businesses with Latham as the new headquarters.

World Cup Won't Get Visa's Help In MasterCard Sponsorship Suit (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Visa International will have to stay on the sidelines during a legal tussle over its sponsorship of the World Cup soccer tournament.

A U.S. appeals court has denied an attempt by the payments network to join litigation between rival MasterCard Inc. and the Federation Internationale de Football Association about the way the sponsorship was awarded last spring. The decision, handed down late Monday, upholds a September decision by the U.S. District Court in New York, which is handling the case.

MasterCard has sued the soccer association, known as FIFA, for awarding the coveted eight-year sponsorship to Visa. MasterCard, which has sponsored the tournament and other World Cup events for the past 16 years, contends that it had right of first refusal for a new pact.

Although it wasn't named in the MasterCard case, Visa sought to join the litigation, because it will be affected by the outcome.

"While it is true that our request to join the suit has been denied, we are confident that our contract rights will be honored, and look forward to activating this sponsorship in January 2007," Visa said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0091847

MasterCard is seeking a preliminary injunction to stop the Visa sponsorship from moving forward.

"We maintain our belief that we have a strong legal basis to compel FIFA to grant MasterCard the right to be an official sponsor of the next two FIFA World Cup tournaments," said Noah Hanft, MasterCard's general counsel, in a statement.

ENVIRONMENT:

'We Dodged A Bullet' In This Hurricane Season (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, November 8, 2006

The quietest hurricane year in a decade officially ends in three weeks, but meteorologists and disaster managers on the Gulf and Florida coasts agree that the season is already over.

"We dodged a bullet this year," says meteorologist Gerry Bell of the National Weather Service's Climate Prediction Center. "If there was ever a time that we needed a break, we got one."

After nine Atlantic storms that mostly stayed out to sea, there hasn't been another since Hurricane Isaac in late September.

The month of November, last of the season's six months, is also its lightest, averaging less than one storm every two years since the 1850s. Forecasters see little likelihood of another storm this year.

Bell and other scientists credit two factors for the mild season. They say a shift in atmospheric pressure over the Atlantic steered most storms away from land. Only Tropical Storms Alberto and Ernesto hit the U.S. mainland. A third, Tropical Storm Beryl, barely brushed Nantucket Island, Mass.

Scientists also say the arrival of a new El Niño climate pattern has knocked down systems in the Atlantic and Caribbean with shearing winds before they could form into storms or hurricanes.

The El Niño weather phenomenon occurs when water temperatures in the eastern Pacific rise. The result: close to an average number of storms, but with far less effect than usual on the USA.

In Louisiana, where complete recovery from hurricanes Katrina and Rita is years away, "the longer the hurricanes miss us, the better off we'll be," says Mark Smith of the state emergency preparedness office. "No one has ever been as prepared for the worst as we were this year. Thank God we didn't have to touch on that."

In Florida, "it's given most communities a chance to really focus on getting caught up from the last two seasons," says Craig Fugate, head of state emergency management.

Eight hurricanes struck the Sunshine State in 2004 and 2005. Last week, the state wrapped up its temporary housing program for 17,000 families displaced in the 2004 season. All but 60 are in permanent dwellings.

Meteorologists caution those in hurricane zones not to let down their guard.

"Anybody foolhardy enough to think this is the end of it has got to be nuts," says Stephen Leatherman of the International Hurricane Research Center at Florida International University in Miami. "The high cycle of Atlantic hurricane activity is probably going to go for another 20 years."

After last year's record 28 hurricanes and tropical storms, the weather service and other forecasters had predicted another big season this year: up to 17 tropical storms, nine or 10 of them hurricanes and four to six major ones.

Forest Fire Strategy: Just Let It Go (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, November 8, 2006

Officials limit damage from tomorrow's blazes by not fighting today's

In the worst year for wildfires in nearly half a century, it may seem odd to celebrate how well some of them burned. But the Payette National Forest in central Idaho is doing just that.

"It was a real long season, but we got some nice fire effects," says Sam Hescock, a fire management officer on the 2.3-million-acre forest where more than 150 fires this summer and fall burned about 70,000 acres. "We're pretty happy with what we got."

DOJ_NMG_0091848

Hescock's satisfaction reflects a shift in how the federal government approaches fire management. That shift began in earnest a decade ago and is gaining momentum. Land managers at the U.S. Forest Service and other agencies are becoming more comfortable co-existing with fire rather than reflexively trying to stomp it out with all the men and materiel at their command.

Their reasoning is that fire is a natural part of the landscape that clears out underbrush and small trees and creates forest openings in a mosaic pattern. Such conditions help keep small fires from growing into the kind of large, catastrophic blazes that have become increasingly common in recent years. They now say that decades of aggressively fighting fires was a mistake because it allowed forests to become overcrowded and ripe for fires nearly impossible to control.

"The mentality is changing," says Greg Aplet, a Denver-based fire scientist with The Wilderness Society, a national environmental group. As fires have burned more acres in recent years and the cost of fighting them has soared, "the obvious answer is not to fight fires we don't need to fight," Aplet says. Almost 9.5 million acres have burned so far in 2006.

The shift in thinking was formalized in a 1995 statement of federal fire policy, and strengthened in a 2001 revision. The policy recognizes that fire is "an essential ecological process," and that decades of trying to keep fires from burning have led, ironically, to "larger and more severe" conflagrations because of the buildup of underbrush and other fuel.

"The task before us — reintroducing fire — is both urgent and enormous," the 1995 policy concludes.

The Forest Service, National Park Service and Bureau of Land Management now routinely have detailed fire management plans that show where fires don't have to be fought. The transition has been easiest in unpopulated blocks of land, but increasingly land managers are learning to regulate fires near communities.

Nationally, the goal over the next few years is "to increase our use of wildland fire," says Tom Harbour, director of fire and aviation management for the U.S. Forest Service.

With a little bit of luck from the weather, Payette officials this summer allowed 21 of the fires to burn more than 16,000 acres of forest without trying to put them out. Six occurred outside wilderness areas. Idaho statewide had more than 39,000 acres of fires that were managed but not suppressed, or about a quarter of the national total of 165,000 acres.

Even on Payette fires that were largely allowed to burn this summer, crews of trained firefighters frequently intervened, building fire lines, guarding perimeters and helping "steer" the fires away from homes, roads, ranches and other areas that need protection.

Some of the fires burned for weeks while being watched by special teams trained to manage blazes near homes and ranches. Partly because forested areas near communities had been thinned previously by intentionally set fires and by cutting small trees, those blazes never threatened homes.

For instance, the tiny village of Yellow Pine, population 36, was surrounded by fire for much of the summer. Several years of brush-cutting and intentionally set fires thinned the forest and helped keep the flames at bay.

The intentional use of fire for forest benefits can be dangerous. In 2000, a fire intentionally set by federal officials to thin New Mexico forests escaped and destroyed 235 homes in Los Alamos. A 2003 fire that officials let burn in Colorado's San Juan National Forest drew sharp criticism from then-senator Ben Nighthorse Campbell. "This is not the time to 'monitor potentially dangerous fires,' " Campbell wrote the chief of the Forest Service. "It is the time to put them out."

Prior to this summer, Payette officials had considerable experience managing fires in the 800,000 acres of their forest that lie within the Frank Church River of No Return Wilderness. This year they expanded their methods outside of wilderness areas and close to communities. "They learned in the wilderness how to have 10,000-acre fires and not freak out about it," says John McCarthy, an Idaho-based representative of The Wilderness Society.

"The biggest change is the change in mind-set," says Ken Kerr, a senior officer with a Colorado-based wildland fire use team that spent weeks on the Payette this summer monitoring fires with sophisticated computer programs and using crews on the ground to direct them away from homes and ranches. "You have to fight smarter, not harder."

This year's success in the Payette will multiply in the years to come because the 2006 fires thinned forests and created openings that will help "reduce the size of fires in the future," Payette forest supervisor Suzanne Rainville says.

Hescock, the fire management officer, sees less arduous fire seasons ahead. "My next four years are going to be real easy," he says.

Boaters Beware: Things Are Jumping On Missouri River High-Flying Carp Pose Threat To Fishermen, U.S. Says; Solution: Eat Them (WSJ)

By JOHN J. FIALKA

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

COLUMBIA, Mo. -- Fishermen used to joke that when the fish are biting on the Missouri River, "they're practically jumping into the boat."

DOJ_NMG_0091849

To Duane Chapman, this isn't funny any more. Almost every time he goes out in his 22-foot skiff, fish jump in or over his boat. He has been repeatedly battered by 20-pound flying fish, which he compares to slimy bowling balls. Not long ago, an incoming fish slammed into the boat's throttle, sending the skiff roaring into a mud bank.

These fish -- called Asian silver carp -- were imported to the U.S. in the 1960s. Now, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is taking aim at the species. It's proposing a ban on the importation and interstate transportation of the fish, saying, "Silver carp have leaped into moving boats injuring people and damaging equipment."

Mr. Chapman and other fish biologists, however, say more needs to be done. They believe only one biological mechanism can get rid of the carp: the American stomach. But convincing U.S. diners to eat these fish may be a challenge.

The skittish, torpedo-shaped carp reproduce faster than native fish and beat them out for food. They also have a peculiar habit: Upon hearing the rumble of a motorboat, or any other noise they deem strange, they leap as high as eight feet in the air, arcing into and around boats like silvery missiles.

Mr. Chapman, a 41-year-old fish biologist for the U.S. Geological Survey who studies the silver carp as part of his job, has a love-hate relationship with the fish. He admires their toughness and ability to survive. They're so good at finding food that they grow bigger than most of their predators. And they're hard to catch. "They're much more net-savvy than native fish," he says, and not interested in bait put on hooks.

Watch amateur video of Asian silver carp launching out of a tributary of the Missouri River near Easley, Mo. John Fialka reports2 on how the U.S. government is taking aim at the fish.

But the biologist also sees them as a dangerous nuisance, a view shared by most boaters, fishermen, water-skiers, conservationists -- and their representatives in Congress. "If I could snap my fingers and kill every one in the U.S., I would do it in a second," Mr. Chapman says.

The native habitat for the Asian silver carp is the Yangtze River in China. The fish were brought to the U.S. to help clean up algae and other microscopic wastes at fish farms and municipal waste-treatment plants. Some escaped into the Mississippi River and migrated to the Missouri and the Ohio rivers. Now, they inhabit the waters of 15 states, and experts worry the Great Lakes will be next.

Depending on how it's cooked, Asian silver carp can taste like fried chicken. Ning Wang, another U.S. Geological Survey biologist here, grew up in Wuhan, China, eating the delicate fish, which he says is so prized that the Yangtze is nearly fished out. "Chinese love it," he says. "They eat the whole fish, from the head to the tail."

After listening to Mr. Wang and visiting China to study how the Chinese raise and catch silver carp in fish farms, Mr. Chapman began teaching some of the techniques to the Boy Scout troop he leads. In June, he and the scouts strung a net across the entrance to a nearby backwater of the Missouri. Then, he revved up his boat and zipped around the water. Fleeing the noise, the fish soared over the net -- and landed in a second boat waiting to catch them.

"We fried them up and ate them," says Mr. Chapman of the 42 fish they caught. "I had catfish, too, but my scouts prefer the Asian carp."

Landing the fish on U.S. dinner tables will be difficult. Other species of carp have swum in U.S. rivers since the early 1800s, but most fish eaters shun them. The silver carp is even less appealing; it has a peculiar network of needlelike bones running through its flesh that many find repellent.

"To tell you the truth, they're pretty good, but I personally don't like to clean the nasty things," says Betty DeFord, an avid fisherman and the owner of a tavern in Bath, Ill. Silver carp first began jumping into her boat on the Illinois River four years ago. She thought it was funny until one day when she and her husband ran into a school of them. "We had these fish flying out of the water so fast and so viciously," she recalls. "One slammed into my lap. Another nearly knocked me out of the boat. Then another knocked me back into it. When it was over, we had 32 fish in the boat. We were slimed from head to toe. It was really scary."

Mrs. DeFord's revenge: She organized the "Redneck Rodeo," a fishing tournament on a backwater of the Illinois River near her tavern. Fishermen wearing protective gear ranging from garbage bags to football helmets compete in small boats, using hand-held nets. The crew that snatches the most fish out of the air in three hours wins $300. In September, at the third annual rodeo, 78 boats caught 1,840 of the fish.

Mrs. DeFord says that a man from Springfield, Ill., holding his dip net and peering into the water got smacked in the face by a carp and went to the local hospital with a broken nose and blackened eyes. "But then he came back, finished the tournament and vowed he would be back next year," she says.

At the end of the day, the contestants went back to her tavern to drink beer and dine on catfish and other native fish. The silver carp, she says, were carted off to the dump or ground up for fertilizer.

The fish's unsavory reputation as a food may be undeserved. In a recent taste test conducted by the University of Arkansas, consumers rated canned silver carp equal to or better than canned tuna fish and salmon. Carole Engle, a university fish researcher who canned the carp, told tasters only that they were nibbling on "a new freshwater fish." Identifying it as silver carp, she worried, would skew her study. "This fish has been demonized," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0091850

James Sneed, a retired computer engineer from Hollywood, S.C., thinks there is money to be made in silver carp. He is lining up investors and scouting sites for a processing facility that would turn the carp into surimi, a popular fish puree flavored to taste like crab or lobster meat. "We want to harvest in the tens of millions of pounds per year," he says. "That's the only way you can really knock these populations down."

Clean And Sober (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Election season has a way of overshadowing other important news. And so it was with last week's oral arguments in Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy, which is shaping up to be one of the more important environmental law cases the U.S. Supreme Court has heard.

Among the potential stakes: $100 billion (yes, billion) or more in redundant pollution controls at refineries and power plants around the country; the future of the market-based approach to environmental regulation; and, broadly, whether there are any limits on what federal agencies like the EPA can do with the powers delegated to them by Congress.

The central issue is a set of rules dating back to the 1970s Clean Air Act known as New Source Review (NSR). The idea was that new pollution sources such as power plants would be required to install the "best available" pollution-control technologies such as scrubbers. But existing plants, which were (and are) subject to emissions caps in any case, would not be required to make the upgrade unless their original design was changed. Among those who attest to this understanding of NSR is former Carter Energy Secretary James Schlesinger. So too did about 20 years of EPA practice and guidance to state regulators.

But in the 1990s, the EPA reversed course and sued utilities around the country claiming that maintenance such as replacing a turbine blade or a boiler tube were "major modifications," thereby triggering the "best available" requirement. Not only did this appear to be a retroactive rewrite of the rules, but the U.S. was already moving away (after the 1990 Clean Air Act revisions) from a command-and-control approach to environmental regulation and toward a system allowing industry to figure out how best to achieve overall emissions limits.

After 2000, the Bush Administration moved to re-embrace the "cap and trade" approach to pollution control and restored the pre-Clinton interpretation of NSR. But it declined to drop the Clinton-era lawsuits, fearing a backlash from environmentalists. The result is what District Judge Virginia Hopkins described (in a case involving Alabama Power) as "the anomaly of utilities, like APC, being prosecuted for conduct that, if engaged in now, would not be prosecuted."

In another ruling involving the Tennessee Valley Authority, Judge Hopkins wrote scathingly that "under the 1999 enforcement theory, EPA deliberately failed to enforce the Act for almost two decades, with all the state environmental agencies and national environmental groups standing idly by while the industry spent billions on 'life extension' projects that EPA and the state attorneys general now say were modifications that required permitting."

The issues in Duke are pretty much the same as in these other cases. Environmentalists and the EPA argue that failing to enforce NSR would amount to a "license to pollute" because utilities needing maintenance generally increase output (and emissions) after it is done. This argument apparently swayed the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, which recently ruled against Cinergy Corp. in another NSR case.

But it is important to remember that all utilities are subject to overall pollution caps. And as the Fourth Circuit recognized in Duke, Congress did not intend to subject existing pollution to NSR, only to curb future emissions. This was one of the fundamental compromises of the original Clean Air Act and not contradicted by the fiercely debated 1990 amendments. If the government wants pollution levels still lower than emissions caps alone now achieve, the proper remedy is to set lower targets, not for EPA to come up with novel theories on which to sue.

It's not just industry that's worried about the EPA's clean air tactics, by the way. So too are America's labor unions, which wrote to Congress under the banner of Unions for Jobs and the Environment that "by reducing the useful economic life of boilers or by inaccurately setting baselines, the existing NSR confusion undermines the competitiveness of American job sites. The result is that some of the almost 20 million manufacturing jobs at stake in heavy industry are placed at risk."

If the Supreme Court ends up siding with Duke Energy, don't be surprised to see headlines accusing it of making common cause with polluters. But the truth is this would be a victory for the rule of law. It would also help the country get on with a market-based approach to pollution control, which almost all honest observers acknowledge is more efficient anyway.

DOJ_NMG_0091851

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

South Dakotans Reject Tough Abortion Ban (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

South Dakotans rejected a toughest-in-the-nation law that would have banned virtually all abortions, even in cases of rape and incest -- defeating one of the most high-profile state measures facing voters Tuesday.

The outcome was a blow to conservatives, who also had cause for worry in Arizona. An amendment to ban gay marriage was trailing there with returns nearly complete; it would be the first defeat for such a measure after prevailing in more than two dozen states in recent years.

Five states approved increases in their minimum wage, while Arizona passed four measures targeting illegal immigrants, including one making English the state's official language. In Michigan, voters took a swipe at affirmative action, deciding that race and gender should not be factors in deciding who gets into public universities or who gets hired for government work.

In Missouri, returns were too close to call on a proposed amendment allowing stem cell research. It had been a factor in the crucial Senate race there, with incumbent Republican Jim Talent opposing the measure and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill supporting it.

Nationwide, a total of 205 measures were on the ballots in 37 states, but none had riveted political activists across the country like the South Dakota abortion measure. Passed overwhelmingly by the legislature earlier this year, it would have allowed abortion only to save a pregnant woman's life.

Lawmakers had hoped the ban would be challenged in court, provoking litigation that might eventually lead to a U.S. Supreme Court reversal of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion.

Jan Nicolay, a leader of the state's anti-ban campaign, said voters viewed the measure as too intrusive.

"We believe South Dakotans can make these decisions themselves," she said. "They don't have to have somebody telling them what that decision needs to be."

Eight states had ban-gay-marriage amendments on their ballots: Idaho, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin approved them, while results were pending in Arizona, Colorado and South Dakota. Similar amendments have passed previously in all 20 states to consider them.

Colorado voters had an extra option -- a measure that would grant domestic-partnership rights to same-sex couples.

Conservatives had hoped the same-sex marriage bans might increase turnout for Republicans. Democrats looked for a boost from low-income voters turning out on behalf of measures to raise the state minimum wage in six states. The wage hike passed in Arizona, Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Nevada; results were pending in Colorado.

In Missouri, a proposed amendment allowing stem cell research was a factor in the crucial Senate race there; incumbent Republican Jim Talent opposed the measure, while Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill supported it.

In Ohio and Arizona, anti-smoking activists won showdowns with R.J. Reynolds Tobacco. Voters in each state approved a tough ban on smoking in public places and rejected rival, Reynolds-backed measures that would have exempted bars.

Nevada and Colorado voters rejected measures that would have legalized possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by anyone 21 and older. A winning measure in Rhode Island will restore voting rights to felons on probation and parole.

Elsewhere, land use was a hot issue, part of a backlash against a 2005 Supreme Court ruling allowing the city of New London, Conn., to buy up homes to make way for a private commercial development.

Seven states approved eminent-domain measures barring the government from taking private property for a private use. Arizona's winning measure went a step further, requiring state and local authorities to compensate property owners if land-use regulations lowered the value of their property.

South Dakota voters defeated a measure that would have made their state the first to strip immunity from judges, exposing them to the possibility of lawsuits. In Maine, Nebraska and Oregon, voters defeated measures that would cap increases in state spending.

Arizona voters were deciding on the most ballot measures -- 19 -- including four that were approved out of frustration over the influx of illegal immigrants. One measure makes English the state's official language; another expands the list of government benefits denied to illegal immigrants.

Voters weren't keen about another, more quirky Arizona measure: They defeated a proposal that would have awarded $1 million to a randomly selected voter in each general election.

Pennsylvania voters gave the state the go-ahead to borrow $20 million so that nearly 33,000 veterans in the state who participated in the Persian Gulf War could collect one-time payments up to $525.

DOJ_NMG_0091852

Gay Marriage Ban Backed In Colorado, Gay Benefits Failing (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DENVER (AP) — A proposal to outlaw gay marriage in Colorado appeared headed for victory Tuesday while a separate measure to give same-sex couples some of the same benefits as married spouses was failing.

With 44% of the projected vote counted, the gay marriage ban Amendment 43 had 57% support to 43% against it, or 545,018 votes to 409,932. Referendum I, the domestic partnerships proposal, was losing 55% to 45%, or 505,858 votes to 418,752.

Colorado was one of eight states where voters were deciding whether to amend their state constitutions to ban gay marriage. Twenty states have already done so and five more joined them on Tuesday.

Jon Paul, director of the pro-43 group Coloradans for Marriage, said he knew it would be a tight race in part because of the money poured into the race by Colorado-based software millionaire Tim Gill.

"We knew we were in for a fight from the beginning. But we also knew that Coloradans believed marriage was between one man and won woman. We just had to make sure that people got to vote for it," Paul said.

Facing the second-longest ballot in Colorado history, voters also overwhelmingly rejected a proposal to legalize the possession of up to an ounce of marijuana, a proposal which Denver voters approved last year. Amendment 44 lost with 62% voting against it.

They also approved a ban on all gifts over $50 to any lawmaker or government employee. Experts at the National Conference of State Legislatures said Amendment 41 gives Colorado one of the toughest government ethics laws in the nation.

The other high-profile issues on the 14-item state ballot included:

· Amendment 42, which would raise Colorado's minimum wage from $5.15 to $6.85 per hour, adjusted annually for inflation.

· Amendment 40, which would limit judges on the Colorado Court of Appeals and the Colorado Supreme Court to three, four-year terms.

The dominant issue for many was gay marriage.

Business owner John Lindsey, 48, of Glenwood Springs voted for Amendment 43 and against Referendum I.

"I'm not anti-gay, so to speak, but there are a lot of ramifications that go around that," said Lindsey, a married Republican who described himself as a traditionalist.

Among other things, Referendum I would allow the couples to adopt children and require alimony and child support if they separate. It would also ensure that their partners can make medical decisions for them and the right to inherit property even without a will.

Referendum I says domestic partnerships are not marriages, though opponents said it delivered the same benefits enjoyed by spouses.

Supporters of Amendment 43 hoped a recent court decision in New Jersey ordering lawmakers to endorse gay marriage or civil unions would boost turnout here. Yet Colorado was rocked last week by the resignation of evangelical leader Ted Haggard — a prominent backer of the amendment — amid allegations that he paid for gay sex.

Joshua Tafoya, 22, a literature major at Mesa State College in Grand Junction, voted against the marriage amendment and yes on Referendum I. He said whatever goes on in someone's bedroom isn't his business or the government's.

"Personally if it were me, and I was on my deathbed, I would want to give what I want to who I want without the state intervening," said Tafoya, a single Democrat.

Gill contributed some $3 million in backing Referendum I and fighting Amendment 43. On the other side was Focus on the Family, the Colorado Springs-based evangelical Christian organization and its public policy arm contributed at least $874,000.

State law already defines marriage as being between one man and one woman, but Amendment 43 supporters said that could be overturned by a judge and the better move was a constitutional amendment.

Nevada Voters Raise Minimum Wage, Curb Eminent Domain (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - Constitutional amendments raising Nevada's minimum wage to $1 above the federal standard and curbing the power of government to seize private property were approved by voters Tuesday.

Question 6, the minimum wage law, was given final approval after it was overwhelming embraced by voters in 2004. Question 2, setting new restrictions on eminent domain, must be approved against in 2008 to take effect.

Nevadans appeared to favor the more restrictive of competing measures to limit exposure to secondhand and seemed poised to reject legalization of small amounts of marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0091853

Questions 4 and 5 both sought to restrict smoking in public places, but to varying degrees. In early tallies, Question 4 was narrowly failing, while Question 5, which imposes tougher limits on secondhand smoke, was passing.

Question 7 to legalize adult possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale was failing, 58 percent to 42 percent, in early returns.

Question 1, requiring lawmakers fund education before other state budgets, was favored in early returns, 52 percent to 48 percent.

Three other proposed constitutional amendments were passed by the 2003 and 2005 legislatures and put to voters Tuesday for final approval.

Question 11, allowing lawmakers to be paid for each day they are in session instead of the current 60-day limit, was rejected. Question 10 authorizing lawmakers to call themselves into special session was failing in early returns, as was Question 9 to reduce the size of the Board of Regents from 13 members to nine, with six of those being appointed by the governor.

Question 8 to amend the state's sales tax to exempt farm machinery while expanding exemptions for the trade-in value of used vehicles also was approved by an overwhelming margin.

44: Legalization Bid Falls Flat (DENP)

Denver Post, November 8, 2006

Most Colorado voters just said no Tuesday to legalizing small amounts of marijuana for recreational use.

Under Amendment 44, adults ages 21 and over would have been allowed to possess and use up to an ounce of marijuana without facing a $100 fine.

Safer Alternative for Enjoyable Recreation, or SAFER, launched the campaign to legalize pot after a successful initiative in Denver last year.

Although the Denver measure made pot technically legal in the city, Denver police are using state law to continue to fine people $100 who are caught with marijuana.

The only Coloradans currently allowed to possess up to an ounce of marijuana are people who need it for medicinal purposes, under a state law

Mason Tvert, SAFER's campaign director, argued through the election season that marijuana is a safer alternative to alcohol.

On Tuesday, he said he knew it would be a tough battle to change "75 years of marijuana prohibition overnight.

"It's quite clear that a number of people in Colorado are in agreement that marijuana prohibition is not working," Tvert said. "We think this is the first step in a 5- to 10-year process."

SAFER dropped $60,000 into the campaign, and Tvert sees the money as well spent because Coloradans began to have a conversation about whether marijuana should be legalized.

"It's not a issue that is going away," he said. "There is a big effort to change these laws."

Opponents to Amendment 44 were pleased Tuesday that the initiative failed, saying legalization would increase teen drug use.

"I think the people of Colorado have spoken," said Beverly Kinard, founder of Guarding Our Children Against Marijuana. "They care about Colorado, they care about the families of Colorado and they are taking a stand against the drug movement."

Kinard said if another effort is made to legalize any drugs in Colorado, her group will continue to fight it.

"They are constantly battering us with these messages about these drugs," she said. "We are sending a message back to the movement: 'We don't want you here and we don't want you damaging our state'."

Marijuana Amendment Goes Up In Smoke (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, November 7, 2006

Colorado voters snuffed out a ballot measure seeking to legalize possession of up to an ounce of marijuana for those 21 and older, according to a projection by the Rocky Mountain News.

Amendment 44 would have made Colorado the first state to legalize marijuana use for recreational purposes. Previously, several states - including Colorado - passed medical marijuana initiatives that allowed for the distribution of the drug for those battling illness.

Colorado was one of two states considering a recreational use provision regarding pot this election. The other state was Nevada.

But many voters stood in the way.

Barbara Reed, a 65-year-old retiree who lives in Denver, voted against the amendment, saying "we have enough that's legal. I've known people who have used drugs, and it started with marijuana."

DOJ_NMG_0091854

Even if it had passed, Amendment 44 wouldn't technically have made pot smoking legal in Colorado. It is still a violation of federal drug laws - though federal drug enforcement officials have said publicly they will not actively seek to arrest, try and convict users in possession of an ounce or less.

Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Amendment 44, said he believed the success of Denver's passage of an initiative seeking to legalize pot possession last year signaled the mood of citizens of the state. But voters didn't back the statewide initiative.

"I wish I knew (why it failed). I think years of marijuana prohibition happened and people have heard half-truths about it all their lives," Tvert said. "Now we're seeing in several counties a majority of people who want to change marijuana laws."

"Our goal is about changing people, not laws."

He said he sees legalization happening in "five to 10 years perhaps." He said he's not sure what his next step is, but he did say, "I do live in Colorado and I'd like ot see the laws change where I live."

"Why shouldn't adults over the age of 21 be able to make a safer choice by choosing to smoke marijuana instead of consuming alcohol?" he asked.

"That's all we're trying to accomplish - to give adults the right to make a safer choice."

Some voters supported the move.

"It should be a non-issue," said Quentin Schermerhorn, 23, a Democrat who voted at the Colorado Convention Center. "Any war on drugs should be done on other substances instead of marijuana."

The campaign has been opposed largely by Save Our Society from Drugs. Its Colorado-based spokesman, Robert McGuire, said the Amendment 44 campaign is simply trying to use Colorado as the first step toward legalizing all drugs nationally.

He said he thought that voters would "see through" the pro-pot agenda and would defeat the statewide ballot measure.

"People are smart enough to understand what's at stake here," he said. "People don't want their children growing up in a society that says drug use is OK."

Federal drug enforcement officials said they feared drug traffickers would begin shipping more pot to Colorado because it would have been viewed as "a drug tourist spot." But Tvert argued that the current fines - a misdemeanor offense and a $100 ticket - show that the government doesn't really consider possession of an ounce of marijuana a serious problem anyway.

"If they did, they wouldn't have such light penalties," he said.

Tvert's campaign strategy relied heavily on penetrating markets not normally targeted in politics. Advertising on alternative radio stations, using text messaging and pushing a massive voter registration drive on the three largest college campuses appeared to make a difference.

But he admitted registering the youth wasn't enough. They actually would have to show up and vote - not something that can always be relied upon. And some of those they registered at Colorado State University said they wouldn't support the measure.

Most students opposed to the ballot measure suggested that pot was so readily available anyway that they simply didn't see a need to legalize it. But student supporters said they felt it was a waste of resources to continue to try to prosecute those in possession of less than an ounce.

Even some Republican activists joined the pro-44 campaign, saying it is a question of personal freedom and the government should stay out of it.

Among Republicans to support the measure were activist Jessica Cory and talk show host Mike Rosen.

Attorney General John Suthers said the passage of an initiative in Denver last year was misleading in projecting statewide support for legalizing pot.

"This time around, we were able to educate the voters on what it meant and I don't think people were ready to embrace the legalization of marijuana," Suthers said.

Pro-pot Proposal Takes A Big Hit (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, November 8, 2006

By about a 2-1 ratio, voters snuffed out a measure that would have allowed adults 21 and over to possess up to an ounce of marijuana.

With 701 precincts reporting, it appeared to be doomed to defeat, especially since it was barely getting a split vote in traditionally liberal Boulder County.

That was the news Robert McGuire, spokesman for the Colorado Chapter of Save Our Society from Drugs, had been waiting to hear.

DOJ_NMG_0091855

"We're pretty happy with the way things turned out," he said. "Our goal was to beat it badly enough so we don't see it again on the ballot.

Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Amendment 44, said he "wasn't disappointed by the results" and conceded defeat early in the evening.

"We had a yearlong conversation about marijuana," he said. "We still believe there are a larger number of people in favor of changing the laws."

"We think the writing is on the wall," he added.

If the initiative passed, it would have made Colorado the first state to legalize marijuana use for recreational purposes. Previously, several states - including Colorado - passed medical marijuana initiatives that allowed for the distribution of the drug for those battling illness.

Colorado was one of two states considering a recreational use provision on pot this election. The other state was Nevada.

Even if it had passed, Amendment 44 wouldn't have technically made pot smoking legal in Colorado. It is still a violation of federal drug laws - though federal drug enforcement officials said publicly they will not actively seek to arrest, try and convict users in possession of an ounce or less.

Some supporters of the amendment thought the success of Denver's passage of an initiative seeking to legalize pot possession last year signaled the mood of citizens of the state. Tvert led that successful campaign.

The campaign had been opposed largely by Save Our Society from Drugs - a Florida-based group that made several sojourns to the state to drum up opposition against the measure.

Through McGuire, they successfully brought the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy to campaign against it as well as employing the help of Colorado Attorney General John Suthers.

Suthers said he was pleased to see the amendment go down to defeat and said voters never bought the argument made by Tvert that marijuana was safer than alcohol.

"Usually when this issue comes up, the debate centers on Libertarian values," he said. "This was a different approach and one that didn't work."

The opponents of the amendment also believed, along with federal drug enforcement officials, that passage would bring more drug traffickers to Colorado because it would be seen as "a drug tourist spot."

But Tvert argued that the current fines - a misdemeanor offense and a $100 ticket - show that the government doesn't really consider possession of an ounce of marijuana a serious problem anyway.

"If they did, they wouldn't have such light penalties," he said.

Voters from both parties were unimpressed with the campaign's strategy to declare the war on drugs as failed.

Jared Klarquist, 24, and a registered Democrat, couldn't bring himself to cast a ballot for it.

"I think pot is bad, it's a real de-motivator," he said. "As poorly as the war on drugs is going, I don't feel legalizing it is the way to make things better."

Amendment 44

Would have legalized the adult possession of an ounce or less or marijuana

· Winners: John Suthers. He became the face of the anti-44 movement and used his clout to push against legalization. The campaign group, Florida-based Save Our Society from Drugs, received $37,000 in contributions - the largest from Denver resident Kevin Kaufman who gave $20,000.

· Losers: Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Amendment 44. He was able to spearhead legalization in Denver last year but couldn't muster enough support statewide. The campaign was mostly funded by the SAFER Voter Education Fund, which poured more than $148,000 into the losing effort.

· What's next? It's possible Tvert could try again, but for now, pot is still illegal.

A-44 Shot Down (CD)

Colorado Daily, November 8, 2006

Colorado State Amendment 44, which proposed to change the Colorado Statutes, not the Constitution, to legalize the possession of up to one ounce of marijuana for adults 21 years of age or older, was failing as of press time Tuesday night.

According to the Rocky Mountain News Web site, 61.9 percent of Colorado voters shot down the amendment with 38.1 percent who voted for the amendment with 1,338 of 3,161 precincts reported.

While individuals who grow, transfer, possess, sell or consume marijuana violate federal, state and in some cases local laws, A-44 addressed state law for possession only.

“I am very proud of the citizens of Colorado for taking a stand against the illegal drug movement. We as a community have taken a stance and I am just so very pleased that people put forth the effort to vote and show they really care,” said Beverly

Kinard on Tuesday. She is the CEO and founder of Guarding Our Children Against Marijuana (GOCAM), the leading group of opponents of A-44..

Kinard said by voting down A-44, the parents and citizens of Colorado were protecting children and not providing benefits for drug dealers, which Kinard said of the amendment. If the amendment had passed, Colorado would have "become a haven for drug users and that families would have turned their back on Colorado because they would not have wanted to bring their children here on vacation," Kinard said.

The proponents for A-44, Denver-based Safer Alternative for Enjoyable Recreation (SAFER), a non-profit organization led by Mason Tvert, supported Amendment 44 by saying that marijuana is a safer alternative to alcohol. SAFER's campaign says marijuana is far less addictive, less harmful than alcohol and other narcotics. SAFER also points to studies that have shown that while alcohol contributes to violence and aggressive behavior, they say marijuana does not.

SAFER also attributes marijuana to be a safer alternative to alcohol as there are numerous overdose deaths each year while there has not been a marijuana overdose death in recorded history. This point, however, is not correct, according to GOCAM.

Kinard has argued that there have been many incidents of drug overdose deaths in which marijuana was the only drug in the body. Kinard also said recent research that shown marijuana use is linked with cardiovascular strokes, bladder cancer and schizophrenia strengthens her argument that marijuana is in fact a dangerous drug.

Tvert, however, said he was not disappointed by Tuesday nights' election results.

"We said from the very beginning that we are not out to necessarily change the law but to change the people because we know that once people learn that marijuana is less harmful than alcohol, they will certainly come around and we will see a much greater number in the future," Tvert said Tuesday night. "This is probably one of the first steps in a much greater movement in Colorado towards achieving some sanity in our marijuana laws."

Tvert said SAFER will continue to work to change marijuana laws nationwide and here in Colorado with the principle that "it's time that the government stops punishing adults who make the rational, safer choice to use marijuana instead of alcohol," he said.

Governor's Race Leads Colorado Tip From Red To Blue (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

DENVER -- This once reliably red state was teetering on the brink of going blue last night, starting with the governor's race.

With 4 percent of the vote counted, Democrat Bill Ritter was the projected winner over Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez in the contest to succeed Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who is leaving office after serving the maximum two terms.

Mr. Ritter, a former Denver district attorney, emphasized his moderate stances, including his personal opposition to abortion and pride as a hunter and gun owner, in an effort to lure independent voters.

His popularity was expected to buoy the rest of the Democratic ticket, which has also benefited this year from the deep pockets of liberal Colorado multimillionaires Pat Stryker and Tim Gill.

"It's very likely Colorado is going to be solidly blue state after tonight," Denver pollster Floyd Ciruli said. "It looks like a complete flip from four years ago. Democrats will probably hold the governor's office, both houses of the legislature and most of the congressional seats for the first time since the early 1960s."

Republicans now hold a 4-3 advantage in the state's House districts, but that was expected to change last night as the party's candidates struggled to stop Democrats from flipping three Republican seats. Only one Republican, Rep. Tom Tancredo, was considered safe.

In the normally Republican-friendly 4th District, incumbent Republican Rep. Marilyn Musgrave was running in a statistical tie with Democratic state Rep. Angie Paccione with 4 percent of the vote counted.

Miss Paccione criticized the Republican incumbent for her close relationship with President Bush and emphasis on social issues such as traditional marriage. Mrs. Musgrave ran ads saying her Democratic challenger had declared bankruptcy rather than pay off her student loans.

In Colorado Springs, home of the staunchly conservative 5th District, former Republican state Sen. Doug Lamborn was leading Democrat Jay Fawcett -- by 55 percent to 45 percent -- with 4 percent of the vote counted.

The outgoing incumbent, Republican Rep. Joel Hefley, threw the race into turmoil in August when he refused to support Mr. Lamborn, the winner of a tight six-candidate primary, saying he had run a "sleazy and dishonest" campaign.

In the race to succeed Mr. Beauprez in the 7th District, Democrat Ed Perlmutter, the former state senator, was ahead -- 56 percent to 42 percent with 4 percent of the vote counted -- in his battle with Republican Rick O'Donnell, Mr. Owens' former policy adviser.

DOJ_NMG_0091857

The suburban Denver district is known as one of the most evenly divided in the nation. Mr. Beauprez won the seat in 2002 by just 126 votes, earning him the nickname "Landslide Bob."

But Mr. Perlmutter, benefiting from his greater name recognition from his legislative career, led his Republican opponent from the start. Democrats also hit hard with ads on some of Mr. O'Donnell's early policy pronouncements, such as a 2004 article in which he suggested that 17-year-old boys forgo their senior years in high school to patrol the Mexican border.

Early returns showed the state's three Democratic congressional incumbents -- Reps. Diana DeGette, John Salazar and Mark Udall -- were coasting to victory.

Meanwhile, on the state's crowded initiative ballot, Amendment 44, which would legalize possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana for people 21 and older, was behind 53 percent to 47 percent. Two years ago, Denver voters approved an identical measure, paving the way for the statewide campaign.

Democrats were expected to hold both houses of the state legislature. The party captured the state House and Senate, formerly held by Republicans, in 2004, touching off the state's Democratic surge.

Mesa County Kids Voting Tabs Differ From Polls On Many Issues (GJDS)

Grand Junction (CO) Daily Sentinel, November 8, 2006

Students throughout School District 51 participating in Kids Voting Mesa County displayed a contrary streak to voters statewide and, in some cases, adult voters in Mesa County.

If the elections were up to them, a Republican would still be governor. GOP gubernatorial candidate Bob Beauprez, according to unofficial Kids Voting results, tallied 2,442 votes while Democratic candidate Bill Ritter collected 2,086. Official statewide election results saw the former Denver district attorney defeat the outgoing 7th District Republican congressman in a virtual landslide.

Mesa County students also differed from their parents by electing Bob Caskey to the District 55 seat in the Colorado House of Representatives. Caskey, a retired Division of Wildlife regional administrator, collected 1,836 votes to incumbent Democrat Bernie Buescher's 1,595. In official Mesa County polling results, incumbent Democrat Bernie Buescher was elected to his second term.

The one race in which the youth vote closely reflected that of their elders was for the District 7 Senate race between first-term Rep. Josh Penry and Dana Barker, a Battlement Mesa Democrat and retired U.S. Postal Service financial analyst. Penry, a Grand Junction High School graduate and former small college All-American quarterback at Mesa State College, collected a strong 68 percent of the Kids Voting vote.

Interviewed early in the evening amid what was largely a celebration atmosphere of the GOP faithful gathered at the downtown Blue Moon restaurant, Penry said, "These elections are about the kids ... I am happy to have their support."

Referendum I, the ballot question providing for domestic partner benefits for gay couples, and Amendment 43, defining marriage in Colorado as between a man and a woman, passed by slim margins with student voters.

"Amendment 43 and Referendum I are important issues to teens. They will affect us all later," said Kevin Hurd, a Grand Junction High School senior.

Hurd cast his ballot in Kids Voting but believes that more emphasis should be taken by schools in teaching kids about the various ballot issues and candidates.

"(Kids Voting) causes the children to become aware of issues," Hurd said. "I hope that improves."

Amendment 44, legalizing an ounce of marijuana, was also a hot topic among teens this fall.

"If there were stronger (governmental) holds on marijuana, it wouldn't be under the table as much," Marie De Puey, a senior at Grand Junction High School said. Despite its high profile among youth voters, Amendment 44 failed at the Kids Voting booth, with 2,121 against it while 1,566 students voted in support of it.

Emily Orbanek is a Grand Junction High School senior.

Voters Say No To Legalizing Marijuana (KMGH)

KMGH-TV, November 7, 2006

After 32 percent of precincts reporting, early results show that voters are against legalizing marijuana possession, with 62 percent voting no and 38 percent voting yes.

The measure would make possession of one ounce of marijuana legal in Colorado for those 21 or older.

Members of the group Safer Alternative For Enjoyable Recreation collected enough signatures to get the measure placed on the ballot.

DOJ_NMG_0091858

SAFER helped get a similar measure on last fall's ballot that made the same amount of marijuana legal in Denver. Initiative 100 was approved by a majority of Denver voters and made the city the first in the country to vote to remove all penalties for private adult marijuana possession.

However, state authorities had said Denver's Initiative 100 was virtually meaningless because of state and federal laws that make even small amounts of marijuana illegal.

Voters Reject Marijuana Measure (LVJR)

Las Vegas Journal Review, November 8, 2006

Nevada voters were just saying no to legalizing marijuana, welcoming a hike in the state's minimum wage and keeping alive eminent domain reform, among other decisions on ballot initiatives on Tuesday's ballot.

With at least 1,620 of 1,913 precincts statewide reporting, Question 7, which would have allowed Nevada residents 21 years of age or older to possess an ounce of marijuana or less, was being rejected by 56 percent of voters. Only 44 percent were in support.

Las Vegas police Lt. Stan Olsen, who oversees legislative affairs for the department and who worked against Question 7, said the measure, the latest in a string of failed efforts to legalize the drug here, was pushed by outsiders rather than Nevadans.

"They were trying to use us as a social experiment, as lab rats. Voters are engaged. They're bright. This was a bad bill of goods, and they knew it," Olsen said. "The voters didn't want it. The community didn't want it. There's nothing good that can come out of legalizing marijuana."

Despite the apparent loss, backers of the measure were heartened by the turnout in favor of the measure.

"This will be the all-time biggest vote for ending marijuana prohibition in the history of this country," said Neal Levine, Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana campaign manager. "This is an enormous amount of progress. Unfortunately, we fell a little bit short."

Levine said his group would continue its efforts to win over Silver State voters and "it is a 100 percent certainty this will be back on the ballot" in 2008 or 2010.

Outside a Henderson polling place, Jim Taylor, a 50-year-old Henderson Republican, said he was strongly against Question 7. "They want to legalize marijuana, but I think that's not a solution, it actually makes more of a problem," he said.

But 25-year-old Larry McKenzie, a Henderson voter who described himself as independent, said he wanted the measure to pass.

"They waste so much time arresting people who smoke weed when they could invest that cop time and jail space in worse crimes," McKenzie said. "I have friends who are potheads. They're not going to change, and they're not hurting anybody. My friends are very harmless."

Voters were backing Question 6, which would raise the minimum wage by $1 an hour, to $6.15, on Jan. 1. Those in favor of passage led those against, 69 percent to 31 percent.

Question 6 also would automatically tie future increases to changes in the consumer price index.

"People know you can't live off of the minimum wage, much less eat off the minimum wage," said Danny Thompson, executive secretary-treasurer of the Nevada AFL-CIO labor union, which supported the measure. "That's reflected in the (voting) numbers."

Thompson believes the increase is modest, and "is not going to destroy any businesses. It's not going to drive people out of Nevada."

Even though voters were supporting Question 2 by a 62 percent to 38 percent margin, the measure restricting how and when local and state governments can forcibly seize private land using eminent domain won't become law anytime soon.

The measure -- also known as the People's Initiative to Stop the Taking of Our Land, or PISTOL -- is a proposed constitutional amendment and, as such, must pass voter muster again in 2008 before it can take effect.

"The people know we need to have some kind of harness put on government to make sure there are not these technical ways to use eminent domain and take people's property," said Don Chairez, a PISTOL backer. "The people really feel we can't trust the politicians" to fix the problem.

Nonetheless, Clark County Commissioner Bruce Woodbury, who headed the PISTOL opposition and also chairs the Regional Transportation Commission, is urging the 2007 Legislature to enact its own eminent domain restrictions prior to the 2008 vote, in hopes of nixing the need for PISTOL.

Both Woodbury and Chairez said they are amenable to discussions on how to rewrite law to match PISTOL's intent while addressing governmental concerns that PISTOL would cripple public works projects. That doesn't mean Chairez is willing to sacrifice PISTOL, though.

"The bottom line is, we need PISTOL as a safety valve," Chairez said.

DOJ_NMG_0091859

In other ballot questions Tuesday, voters were in support of Question 1, which would require the Legislature to fund public education before other state programs. The measure, which would go into effect in time for the 2007 Legislature, led with 55 percent of the vote, with 45 percent against.

Question 8, which would end sales taxes on the value of a trade-in when buying a vehicle at an auto dealership, was winning by a wide margin, 69 percent to 31 percent. It would also exempt farm equipment from sales tax.

Question 11, which would lift pay limits on legislators, was opposed by 70 percent of voters. Only 30 percent supported the idea of paying legislators for up to 120 days worked, rather than capping pay at the regular session's 60-day limit.

Voters were tightly split on Question 10, which would allow the Legislature to call itself into special session. It was being rejected by 52 percent of voters, with 48 percent behind it. Currently, only the governor can call a special session.

Question 9, which would shrink the size of the state's Board of Regents that oversees state colleges and allow the governor to appoint some of its members, also was closely contested, with 51 percent against and 49 percent in favor.

Big Wins For Gibbons, Ensign, And Heller (KOLO)

KOLO-TV,, November 8, 2006

Republicans bucked the national trend yesterday, with Gibbons, Ensign, Heller, Porter, and Krolicki all winning their races. However, Democrats took over the Secretary of State, Attorney General, Treasurer, and State Controller.

The anti-smoking initiatives were answered, with Question 4 being voted down while the much more restrictive Question 5 was passed. The other smoking question, Question 7 (legalization of marijuana), was voted down.

Support Short For Medical Marijuana (SFAL)

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, November 8, 2006

A movement to legalize the use of marijuana for medical uses was headed for defeat with partial election results available late Tuesday.

South Dakota's Initiated Measure 4 was patterned after laws in 11 states. Passage looked doubtful at 11 p.m. with 141,734 votes against legalized use compared with 127,713 votes in favor, a 53-47 margin, with 743 precincts out of 818 reporting.

Those against the measure said approval would have led to open use, and the public might think that it is the only medicine effective for certain ailments.

Sioux Falls police chief Doug Barthel said he feared that people would abuse the privilege.

"I think the state will be glad they voted against it, because from an enforcement aspect, I think it would have been a nightmare for us," Barthel said Tuesday night.

"Look at an event like JazzFest where you have thousands of people," he said. "Some who would have been allowed to smoke it would be doing that openly. How would we differentiate between who can and can't?"

Those in favor argued in part that marijuana can relieve seriously ill patients' discomfort and even save lives. But under South Dakota law, patients who use it face a year in prison and a $2,000 fine.

Support came from a group called South Dakotans for Medical Marijuana. A spokesman, Tony Ryan of Sioux Falls, was a police officer in Denver for 36 years. He has family members who suffer from cerebral palsy and multiple sclerosis.

"It would be an option," Ryan said. "They don't need it now, but there might be a day when they need it."

Valerie Hannah of Deerfield supported passage. She uses marijuana in a vaporized form to ease chronic pain of nerve damage she suffered from nerve gas in the Gulf War.

Hannah said legal drugs such as morphine make her feel "like a zombie" and put her in a stupor.

"If it fails, of course it's a disappointment, and very terrifying," she said. "I think we need to provide voters with a better education."

South Dakotans Defeat Medical Marijuana Measure (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. - South Dakota's medical marijuana measure went up in smoke Tuesday, as voters decided not to allow patients to use the substance as a relief from chronic pain.

With 96 percent of precincts reporting, 158,206 people or 53 percent of voters, shot down the ballot measure, with 142,247 voters, or 47 percent, showing their support.

Proponents wanted South Dakota to become the 12th state to allow some medical patients to smoke marijuana to ease their pain.

DOJ_NMG_0091860

Opponents, led by law enforcement officials, said allowing medical marijuana would send a mixed message to children concerning drug use. They also said people other than the patient could get their hands on the marijuana - as many teens do now with alcohol.

The law would have allowed each patient and caregiver up to six plants, which could produce from 2,700 to more than 13,000 joints every year.

FBI Probing Theft Of 1.8m Pills From Warehouse In Mansfield (BOS)

By Mac Daniel, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 8, 2006

The FBI joined the investigation yesterday into a sophisticated weekend theft of about 1.8 million prescription drug pills from a Mansfield warehouse, officials said.

A spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation said the weekend burglary at the AmerisourceBergen facility likely involves the interstate transfer of stolen property, triggering the federal probe. State Police and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration are also involved, though a DEA spokesman said the agency is taking an advisory role.

The break-in at the 185,000-square-foot warehouse in an industrial park was discovered Sunday afternoon. The facility was unoccupied at the time of the break-in; police said no security guards were on duty. Police said no one had reported anything suspicious.

A company spokesman said the stolen drugs have a retail value of about $500,000. Mansfield Police Sergeant Detective Sam Thompson said the stolen drugs, which included painkillers and anxiety medications, could have a street value of $10 a pill.

A team of burglars -- police believe between three and five -- probably entered the facility between Saturday and Sunday afternoon by cutting a well-placed hole in the roof after deactivating the warehouse's security camera and alarm system, Thompson said. The thieves avoided a nearby hatch in the roof, which was attached to an alarm, he said.

The burglars then shimmied down a series of water pipes to the warehouse floor and went straight for the controlled substances, which are kept in separate parts of the building away from over-the-counter medicines and health and beauty products, Thompson said.

The burglars also tried to drill open a vault containing drugs but were unsuccessful, he said. Based on the amount of drugs stolen, Thompson said investigators believe the burglars had a large pickup or box truck waiting.

When asked if the burglary looked like an inside job, Thompson said "it would lead me to believe there is that possibility but we're not totally sticking to that."

"We're going to try to turn over every leaf," he added. "It was someone who knew what they were doing. It's not your average rip a door open and go in."

He said detectives are seeking security video footage from other businesses in the industrial park to check for any suspicious vehicles or any other evidence.

Michael Kilpatric , AmerisourceBergen spokesman, said the company is reviewing security at its distribution centers. The Mansfield facility, one of 28 the company has around the country, distributes to the New England states.

Under DEA guidelines, buildings used to store drugs on the federal controlled substance list must have alarm systems and steel vaults to hold the most restricted drugs. If a ceiling is not made of 1-inch-thick steel, a wire mesh cage must be used to secure access. "We met all DEA guidelines," Kilpatric said.

An October report by the US Department of Justice's National Drug Intelligence Center found that millions of dollars in prescription drugs are stolen annually from pharmacies, manufacturers, distributors, importers/exporters, and individuals with legitimate prescriptions. Employees of drug manufacturers and commercial distributors are most of the culprits, the report found.

The report found the availability and abuse of opiates, particularly heroin but also stolen painkillers such as OxyContin, Percocet, and Vicodin, pose the most significant drug threats to the New England region.

"Prescription drug abuse is a serious area that has been expanding," said Anthony Pettigrew , DEA New England spokesman. "People don't believe anything you can get from a doctor can be harmful."

Pennsylvania-based AmerisourceBergen is the third largest US drug distributor. The Mansfield facility employs between 90 and 100 people, according to a company spokesman.

An AmerisourceBergen warehouse in Grand Prairie, Texas, was hit by a similar theft in January 2003 when $800,000 in merchandise was stolen. About 1,600 Viagra tablets from that theft were resold nine days later to a government informant, eventually leading to the federal conviction of the leader of a Texas retail theft ring. Kilpatric said there was a similar burglary at another company facility in 2004, but said the break-ins are not a trend.

States Confront Meth-lab Threat To Environment (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0091861

By Ben Arnoldy, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, November 8, 2006

Do-it-yourself labs can turn homes into hazmat zones. Some US states have enacted laws to address the risks.

BOSTON

Hotel rooms, apartment complexes, and homes aren't your typical toxic waste sites. But then, methamphetamine isn't your typical drug.

The drug - which makers often cook up in their kitchens using household chemicals and tools - is potent enough to transform homes into hazmat zones. When law officers bust a meth lab, the drugmaking materials are carted away. But what happens next to such former sites - numbering more than 100,000 across the country - varies dramatically.

Some states, led by Colorado, have enacted tough regulations that require former lab sites to undergo a formal safety assessment - and more cleanup, if needed - before they can be reinhabited. The laws are prompted by the extreme toxicity of the chemicals used to cook meth, and suspicions about the long-term effects of chemical remnants in the air and on surfaces. Other states mandate home sellers to disclose the presence of former meth labs.

The patchwork of state approaches reflects the uneven spread of the drug, the potential costs of cleanup, and concerns about setting safety standards in the absence of definitive scientific research, experts say.

"Until we fully understand what the potential health effects can be, we feel that it's better that states are more proactive as opposed to reactive," says Shawn Arbuckle with the National Jewish Medical and Research Center in Denver. Better safe than sorry, he adds.

Cooking meth just once contaminates a building with traces of acids and iodine in the air, as well as large amounts of meth on surfaces ranging from sofas to ventilation ducts, according to research done at National Jewish. Hydrochloric acid is an irritant to the eyes, skin, and respiratory tract, and iodine can trigger asthmatic reactions, says Mr. Arbuckle.

Business contractors have sprung up to assess and decontaminate former meth labs. Basic cleanup involves hauling away carpets, furniture, drapes, and other items that can absorb airborne particles. Then all surfaces are thoroughly cleaned, including ceilings and walls. Sometimes dry wall must be replaced.

Meth Lab Cleanup Co., based in Texas, charges about $300 to $500 for a consultation, assessment, and site sampling. Basic decontamination costs from $4,000 to $6,000 for a modest home. But expenses can quickly skyrocket when further work is required.

Joseph Mazzuca, the company's operation director, says cooks sometimes disconnect stove vents to prevent neighbors from smelling suspicious fumes. Instead the vent pipe is stuffed into the insulation, creating a bigger mess. He's also had to move a home to remove topsoil contaminated by dumped chemicals. While he has yet to see a well contaminated by dumping, he has seen PVC piping melted away.

Three-quarters of his calls are to sites that never involved law enforcement, suggesting there are many labs beyond the 100,000 reported to the Drug Enforcement Agency since 1998.

"Our estimate is that there are about a million and a half meth labs in America, and less than 1 percent of them have been decontaminated," he says.

He's noticed other disturbing trends. He sees children's clothing or toys at most sites. And 75 percent of labs are rentals. "Typically landlords, especially on the bad side of town, don't worry about [cleanup] so much unless there's a law," he says.

Increasingly, states are addressing that, particularly those that have dealt with the problem the longest, such as in the Midwest and West. Colorado has been at the forefront, forcing property owners not only to have the mess cleaned up but to adhere to a very specific set of procedures and testing requirements.

Northeastern states - which have yet to see high numbers of home labs (see map, page 2) - have been slower to adopt new laws.

Connecticut released a new set of nonbinding guidelines following a bust last year of two labs in East Hampton. After federal authorities came and went, the landlord of one of the properties, a small ranch house on a wooded road, began his own cleanup. He then sold the home, according to a local public health official and a former resident, without notifying the health department or telling the buyer beforehand of the existence of the former lab. (The attorney involved in the sale declined to comment, and neither the current owner nor the selling landowner could be reached.)

Connecticut still does not compel an owner to decontaminate except in serious cases, and property sellers still are not required to disclose former meth labs - a requirement now in 14 states.

"There is not uniformity across all of the states, and frequently people look to the federal government to step in at that point [to put] out something that can serve as a standard for all states to at least consider," says Kevin Teichman, a scientist with the Environmental Protection Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0091862

The EPA aims to offer standards by 2011 tied to demonstrated health risks. Arbuckle says that determining what is a healthy level of exposure over a long period of time will require more research - something Mr. Teichman says the agency is pushing.

Federal money is also going to assessments and cleanups. The EPA has revised its definition of brownfields to include former meth labs, though grants can go only to groups such as nonprofit organizations, not homeowners. The DEA offers free training and equipment to first responders and shoulders much of the bill for a contractor to remove lab materials whenever called to a scene.

"Technically the contractor has cleaned it out," says Steve Robertson, a special agent assigned to DEA headquarters. "If it was my property I would rip out the carpet, I would scrub the floors, I would repaint everything, because these ... are very hazardous chemicals."

Source: Graham Gets Letter From USADA (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

Track coach Trevor Graham received notice from the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency that he is accused of violating doping rules, sources familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press on Tuesday.

Graham, whose star athletes included Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and Justin Gatlin, was indicted by a grand jury last week on three counts of making false statements to federal agents. Now, he has 10 days to respond to USADA's allegation letter. The case then will be presented to a review panel that recommends whether sanctions should be levied.

The sources, who spoke to AP on condition they not be identified because the charges have not been announced, said the letter informed Graham that he is being accused on a "non-analytical" basis, meaning the doping violation isn't predicated on positive drug tests, but rather on other evidence.

Also receiving an allegation letter, sources said, was track coach Remi Korchemny, who pleaded guilty to one misdemeanor count of doling out the sleep-disorder drug modafinil in the BALCO steroids scandal.

USADA general counsel Travis Tygart said he could not comment on ongoing cases.

The accusations mark the first time a coach has been targeted for punishment by USADA.

Athletes guilty of first-time doping offenses often are given two-year suspensions. Any penalty recommended by the review panel would be subject to arbitration.

Evidence in USADA's case against Graham includes testimony from athletes, as well as information that became public last week when federal authorities released details of his indictment, the sources said. USADA long has been pursuing Graham, and the timing of the letter came after the indictments, so as not to hinder the federal investigation.

Graham always has denied providing banned substances to his athletes. His Raleigh, N.C.-based attorney Joseph Zeszotarski did not return phone calls or an e-mail.

The Jamaican-born Graham operates Raleigh-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes Gatlin, the 100-meter co-world record holder who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April. He was the latest of a handful of athletes coached by Graham who have tested positive for banned substances.

Graham also coached Jones at the Sydney Games in 2000, when she became the first woman to win five medals in a single Olympics.

Gatlin's positive test led the U.S. Olympic Committee to ban Graham from its training sites, and Nike terminated its contract with the coach.

In the federal indictment, prosecutors said Graham lied to investigators in 2004 about his ties to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative at the center of the steroids scandal.

He is scheduled for arraignment Nov. 16 in U.S. District Court and faces a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison and a $750,000 fine if convicted.

Three years ago, Graham mailed a syringe containing "the clear," a previously undetectable steroid, to USADA. At the 2004 Athens Olympics, Graham acknowledged mailing the drug, saying: "I was just a coach doing the right thing at the time." He did not say why he turned in the syringe or how he got the material.

Korchemny, who did not return phone calls Tuesday, coached sprinters Kelli White and Dwain Chambers, both of whom tested positive for banned substances and subsequently were suspended. White, who has retired from the sport, cooperated with investigators and has become an outspoken anti-doping advocate.

$2.2M Found In Probe Of Cocaine Kingpin (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091863

Tucked inside a closet in a Penn Hills home rested a large, padlocked suitcase with a US Airways name tag bearing the name "Terrance Cole" scrawled in black ink.

Inside the suitcase was a black duffel bag. Inside the bag was $2.2 million in $50 and $100 denominations, divvied into neat stacks of $10,000, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Tuesday.

"This is the largest cash seizure in the history of Western Pennsylvania," Buchanan said, announcing the recovery of the money last week at the Dollman Street address.

No arrests were made, and Buchanan would not say how federal authorities became aware of its existence. But the seizure came in connection with an investigation into Cole, the biggest cocaine kingpin in Western Pennsylvania history.

Cole, 39, formerly of Hazelwood and Penn Hills, was sentenced in March to life in prison for running a drug organization that distributed more than 2,500 kilograms of cocaine from 1991-2003. That's 25 million doses, or about two doses for every man, woman and child in Pennsylvania, according to 2005 census figures.

The drug enterprise was believed to have grossed $50 million, which yielded $10 million to $15 million in profits, Buchanan said.

Cole, often referred to as "The Boss" or "Big Head, " spent much of the proceeds, federal prosecutors said. He took frequent trips to Las Vegas, where he socialized with celebrities, including Bobby Brown and Whitney Houston, while gambling to launder drug money through winnings, prosecutors said, adding he bought numerous homes, fancy cars, trips to the Super Bowl and a pair of $2,000 blue alligator shoes.

But state and federal investigators believe more of Cole's stash remains hidden.

"This is just a down payment," state Attorney General Tom Corbett said of the money seized from the house where one of Cole's ex-girlfriends lives. "We're looking for the rest of it."

Federal agents said they found nothing when they dug up a safe in the backyard of another Penn Hills house where Cole's mother lives. The safe, buried about 8 feet deep, was empty.

Jason Cato can be reached at jcato@tribweb.com or 412-320-7840.

$2 Milliion In Cash Found In Penn Hills Home (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, November 7, 2006

(KDKA) PENN HILLS Local and federal agents hit the jackpot when they discovered more than $2 million in cash hidden in a bedroom closet of a Penn Hills home.

The house may look unassuming, but investigators say the house belongs to a woman who dated Hazelwood cocaine kingpin Terrance Cole before he began serving a life sentence in federal prison this past march.

Penn Hills police joined with federal and state agents in a raid on that house where Cole apparently stashed some of his cash before he went to jail.

"During the search of a bedroom closet agents recovered this locked suitcase," said U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan. "Inside the suitcase was this duffel bag. Agents found $2,250,150. The suitcase had the name Terrance Cole on the luggage tag."

The Feds won't say why they searched the house, only that they have continued to investigate Cole even after his conviction in March of running a ring that distributed over $50 million worth of cocaine in the Pittsburgh area since 1993.

Agents have reason to believe there may be more money out there.

They found a safe buried in Cole's mother's backyard.

As for the girlfriend who had the suitcase of cash in her closet, agents aren't sure she knew it was there and for now she won't be charged.

Man Pleads Guilty In Explosives Case (DMN)

By Holly Yan, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, November 8, 2006

Cedar Hill: He faces 10 years in delivery of a rocket to a drug dealer

A Cedar Hill man accused of delivering a military rocket to a drug dealer pleaded guilty Tuesday to distribution of explosive material to a convicted felon.

Eric Duane McNairy, 41, faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine after the November 2004 discovery of a luggage bag containing a U.S. military 66 mm M74 incendiary rocket with a rocket launcher and Vietnam War-era explosives at a Duncanville convenience store.

"Affixed to the strap of the bag was an American Airlines luggage tag bearing Mr. McNairy's home address," Kathy Colvin, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Dallas, said in a news release.

Investigators executed a search warrant at Mr. McNairy's home and found a matching luggage bag.

A few months after Mr. McNairy denied knowing about the rocket and grenades, he told FBI agents that the explosives belonged to his brother, who was serving a drug sentence.

Mr. McNairy told authorities he had been keeping the explosives in his backyard shed for two or three years and didn't want to keep them anymore. So he contacted an associate of his brother, Charles Andrew Brunston, 42, who had recently been released after serving time for a felony drug conviction.

Providing firearms or explosive devices to a convicted felon is a federal offense, as is possessing such weapons as a convicted felon.

Mr. Brunston, of Dallas, admitted in January 2005 that he received the bag from Mr. McNairy. He pleaded guilty in September to receipt and possession of explosive material by a convicted felon. He faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine and is to be sentenced in January.

Mr. McNairy is to be sentenced in February.

TAX:

Report: Merck Discloses 4 Tax Disputes In U.S. And Canada With $5.58B Potential Liabilities (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Merck & Co. has disclosed four separate tax disputes in the U.S. and Canada with potential liabilities totaling $5.58 billion, as the drug maker faces tens of thousands of lawsuits over its withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, The Wall Street Journal reported on its Web site Tuesday.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck says it is fighting the assessments disclosed in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Journal said.

Merck isn't the only drugmaker hit with steep tax bills. In September, GlaxoSmithKline PLC agreed to pay the U.S. government $3.4 billion to settle a dispute over how to tax deals between the London-based company and its American subsidiary.

As of Sept. 30, Merck had $15.22 billion in current assets, including $6.22 billion in cash. At least one of the transactions in dispute also includes an income statement benefit, which could potentially be reversed depending on the outcome. In the third quarter, Merck earned $940.6 million on $5.41 billion in sales.

Merck already is facing liabilities that could reach tens of billions of dollars related to Vioxx, the painkiller it withdrew from the market in September 2004 after evidence that it increased the risk of heart attacks and strokes. Merck has been fighting the cases one by one. It has won five cases and lost four.

In a recent interview, Merck Chief Executive Officer Richard Clark said the company was "very conservative" in its tax practices, the Journal said. He also said the potential liabilities weren't a concern, given Merck's finances. "I don't lose any sleep over that," he said.

A Merck spokesman said the company believed the transactions are in "full compliance with IRS rules" and that it plans to contest the matter, the Journal said.

According to Merck's SEC filing, the Canada Revenue Agency issued the company a notice on Oct. 10 for $1.76 billion in back taxes and interest "related to certain intercompany pricing matters."

The dispute involves revenue Merck had in 1998 to 2004 on its asthma and allergy drug Singulair, the Journal said, citing an unnamed person familiar with the matter. Singulair was originally developed by Merck's Canadian subsidiary in Montreal, entitling the Canadian government to tax revenue on the drug, the person said.

U.S. Patent & Trademark Office records show that, in December 1998, Merck transferred patents associated with Singulair to a Barbados subsidiary called Tradewinds Manufacturing SRL. At the time, Barbados was considered a tax haven because of a variety of favorable tax provisions it offered.

In its SEC filing, Merck said it disagrees with Canadian tax authorities, but said it could be "required to post a deposit of up to one-half the tax and interest assessed which could have a material adverse effect on the Company's cash flows in the quarter in which the deposit is made."

GlaxoSmithKline's settlement with the IRS came after the agency alleged Glaxo's American unit overpaid its British parent for drugs, largely for antiulcer drug Zantac. Those overpayments reduced the company's U.S. profit, and its U.S. tax bill. The IRS said the settlement was the largest ever.

DOJ_NMG_0091865

Software maker Symantec Corp. and telecom equipment manufacturer Motorola Inc. have also disclosed sizable transfer pricing disputes with the IRS. Symantec and Motorola disagree with the IRS's position. Symantec is suing the IRS over the proposed adjustments and Motorola says it is planning to dispute the finding.

Of the $5.58 billion in potential liabilities disclosed Tuesday, Merck had previously disclosed $2.3 billion related to a partnership deal dating back to 1993, the Journal said. The newspaper reported in September on how the transaction allowed Merck to shift taxable income to a subsidiary of a United Kingdom bank, Abbey National PLC, but avoid the financial loss of shifting comparable book income. The disputed $2.3 billion in taxes cover the years 1993 to 2001. The liability could be higher if the IRS assesses additional penalties.

Merck said the two other disputes, which are with the IRS, stem from "minority equity financing" deals.

Dow Chemical Co. is in a similar dispute with the IRS and Justice Department. Dow has called that deal a "minority equity financing" as well. Dow is suing the government over the IRS's proposed adjustments.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Resurgent Democrats Win Control Of House (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, November 8, 2006

Democrats won control of the House early Wednesday after a dozen years of Republican rule in a resounding repudiation of a war, a president and a scandal-scarred Congress.

"From sea to shining sea, the American people voted for change," declared Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the hard-charging California Democrat in line to become the nation's first female House speaker.

"Today we have made history," she said, "now let us make progress."

Lameduck Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., was elected to an 11th term, but several GOP officials said they expected him to step down as party leader and possibly even retire from Congress.

The White House made plans for President Bush to call the speaker-in-waiting, Pelosi, first thing in the morning; he will enter his final two years in office with at least half of Congress in the opposition party's hands.

"It's been kind of tough out there," Hastert said. Presidential spokesman Tony Snow observed: "It's not like a slap on the forehead kind of shock."

By 4 a.m. Wednesday, Democrats had won 228 seats, enough for control, and were leading for another 4, which would give them 232. Republicans, who hold 229 seats in the current House, won 191 and were leading in another 12, which would give them 203.

Democrats had captured 27 Republican-controlled seats, and no Democratic incumbent had lost thus far. Races were too close to call in more than a dozen seats, making it impossible to determine exactly how large the Democratic margin would be.

Still, 2006 already was an eerie reversal of 1994, when the GOP gained 54 seats in a wave that toppled Democrats after four decades. No Republican incumbent lost that year.

This time, Republicans fell from power in nearly every region of the country — conservative, liberal and moderate — as well as in every type of district — urban, rural and suburban. Exit polls showed middle class voters who fled to the GOP a dozen years ago appeared to return to the Democrats.

Casualties of a Democratic call for change, three GOP congressmen lost in Indiana, three more in Pennsylvania, two in New Hampshire, one in North Carolina, one in Kansas, one in California and more elsewhere. Democrats won open seats, which were held by Republicans, in New York, Ohio, Florida, Arizona, Colorado, Wisconsin, Iowa and Texas.

Scandals that have dogged Republicans appeared to hurt GOP incumbents even more than Bush's unpopularity and the nearly four-year-old war in Iraq.

Republicans surrendered the Texas seat of former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who left the House after being charged in a campaign finance scheme, the Ohio seat once held by Bob Ney, who resigned after pleading guilty in a lobbying scandal, and the Florida district of Mark Foley, who stepped down after the disclosure that he sent sexually explicit messages to male congressional pages.

In Pennsylvania, Democrats defeated Curt Weldon in the fallout from a federal corruption investigation and Don Sherwood who admitted to a long-term affair with a much younger woman who says he choked her.

"Today the American people voted for change and they voted for Democrats to take their country in a new direction, and that is exactly what we intend to do," Pelosi, who won an 11th term, told several hundred people celebrating in a Washington hotel ballroom.

DOJ_NMG_0091866

A grandmother five times over, Pelosi vowed to restore integrity, civility and honesty to Capitol Hill and said: "Democrats promise to work together in a bipartisan way for all Americans."

As her remarks ended, U2's "Beautiful Day" blared and red, white and blue confetti drifted from above.

"You have given us a chance to turn this country around, and we'll give you the government that no longer lets you down." Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the head of the Democrats' House campaign, told the crowd.

Ethics woes, the war and overall anger toward Bush appeared to drive voters to the Democrats, according to surveys by The Associated Press and the television networks of voters as they left voting places. Several traditionally hard-fought demographic groups were choosing Democrats, including independents, moderates, and suburban women.

Those exit polls also showed that three in four voters said corruption was very important to their vote, and they tended to vote Democratic. In a sign of a dispirited GOP base, most white evangelicals said corruption was very important to their vote — and almost a third of them turned to the Democrats.

Two out of three voters called the war very important to them and said they leaned toward the Democrats, while six in ten voters said they disapproved of the war. About the same number said they were dissatisfied with the president — and they were far more likely to vote Democratic.

Additionally, eight in ten voters called the economy very important to their House vote, and those who said it was extremely important — about four in ten voters — turned to Democrats.

All 435 House seats were on the ballot, and most incumbents won easy re-election. The current lineup: 229 Republicans, 201 Democrats, one independent who lines up with the Democrats for organizational purposes, and four vacancies, three of them in seats formerly held by Republicans.

The fight for control came down to 50 or so seats, nearly half in a swath from Connecticut through New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. All were in Republican hands, a blend of seats coming open and incumbents in trouble.

For months, national surveys showed Democrats favored over Republicans by margins unseen since 1990 as voters grew restless with the Bush administration and seemed more ready to end one-party rule on Capitol Hill.

American casualties and costs climbed in Iraq, and public support for the war fell, as did approval ratings for Congress along with the president.

Scandals dogged the ruling party as well.

DeLay, R-Texas, was charged with participating in a campaign finance scheme and resigned from the House. Ney, R-Ohio, resigned, too, after pleading guilty in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling investigation. A month before the election, Foley, R-Fla., left office when it was disclosed that he had sent sexually explicit electronic communications to male, former congressional pages.

Through it all, Democrats cast the race as a national referendum on Bush and Iraq, accusing Republicans of walking in lockstep with the president and rubber stamping his policies.

Republicans insisted the elections came down to choices between individual candidates from coast to coast — and that Democrats were liberals who would raise taxes, flee from Iraq and be soft on terrorists.

Initially, Democrats targeted GOP-held seats left open by retiring Republicans as well as districts where Bush won by close margins in 2004 — many in the Northeast and Midwest. In recent weeks, Democrats were able to expand the battlefield, mounting plays for seats long in Republican hands, such as in Wyoming and Idaho.

The GOP made serious bids for only a handful of Democratic-held seats, including two districts in Georgia that the Republican legislature redrew to make more hospitable to the GOP. The only two endangered Democrats appeared to be in those districts, where the vote totals were so close the races appeared to be headed to recounts.

One of the Democratic victories was in Louisiana, where scandal-tarred Rep. William Jefferson was forced into a runoff against another Democrat.

Along with elections for the next Congress, there were two contests to fill vacancies for the remaining few months of this Congress.

Republican Shelley Sekula-Gibbs will fill DeLay's unexpired term in the Houston suburbs, but only until DeLay's successor, Democrat Nick Lampson, is sworn in come January. And in New Jersey, Democrat Albio Sires will be seated early as a replacement for Bob Menendez who left his House seat for the Senate.

GOP's '94 'revolutionaries' Among The Fallen (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091867

WASHINGTON — Among the Republican losses Tuesday, the most symbolic were those of several lawmakers who first arrived in Congress in 1994, the year their party took control of the House of Representatives for the first time in 40 years.

Arizona's J.D. Hayworth, Indiana's John Hostettler and New Hampshire's Charlie Bass, in the class of "Republican revolutionaries" who helped bring their party into power that year, were among Republican casualties as Democrats scored victory after victory in districts they had targeted, winning back the House.

Longtime Republican incumbents Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Anne Northup of Kentucky, Charles Taylor of North Carolina, Jim Ryun of Kansas and Clay Shaw of Florida lost their seats. So did New Hampshire's Republican congressmen, Bass and Jeb Bradley.

Besides the likelihood of the first female speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, the 110th Congress in January will have a host of new faces.

Among them: a former NFL quarterback, Heath Shuler; the first Muslim member, Keith Ellison of Minnesota; a Buddhist, Hank Johnson of Georgia; and New Hampshire's first congresswoman, social worker Carol Shea-Porter.

The defeat of many moderate Republicans does not necessarily forecast a polarized House, says Morris Fiorina, a political scientist with the Hoover Institution.

"Even though a lot of Republicans pulled through, they pulled through with drastically diminished margins. There's going to be a sense even among a lot of survivors that we need to change course," Fiorina said. "There will be a lot of pressure to push Bush in a less confrontational direction."

Even some conservative districts rejected Republicans. In Indiana, where three Republican incumbents were ousted, Vanderburgh County Sheriff Brad Ellsworth unseated Republican Rep. Hostettler, a six-term incumbent, in a district where President Bush got 62% of the vote in 2004.

Elsewhere in the state, Democratic businessman Joe Donnelly defeated Republican Rep. Chris Chocola, and former congressman Baron Hill took back his seat from Republican Mike Sodrel.

Surveys of voters leaving polling places showed that three in four considered scandals and corruption in government an important factor when they cast their votes.

In Ohio, Democrats picked up a GOP seat when lawyer Zack Space won the seat Bob Ney vacated after he pleaded guilty to taking bribes. Ditto in Pennsylvania, where Democrat Joe Sestak defeated Rep. Curt Weldon, under investigation for helping a firm that employed his daughter's lobbying company. Another Pennsylvania Republican, Don Sherwood, lost to Navy reservist Chris Carney. Sherwood admitted to an extramarital affair.

The same scenario played out in Florida, where Democrat Tim Mahoney won the seat vacated when Rep. Mark Foley resigned after being accused of sending sexually explicit e-mails to teenage boys. Foley quit the race too late for his name to be taken off the ballot.

Democrats fended off a challenge in Vermont, where state Sen. Peter Welch defeated Martha Rainville for the seat vacated by Bernie Sanders, an independent who generally votes with Democrats. Sanders won a seat in the U.S. Senate.

Virginia Rep. Thelma Drake was one of the few Republicans targeted by Democrats to keep her seat.

For the past century, every two-term president but one has seen his party lose House seats in his sixth year in office. The exception: Bill Clinton, whose Democratic Party picked up five House seats in 1998.

New members of Congress include John Yarmuth, publisher of the Louisville Eccentric Observer. He's the Democrat who defeated Northup in Kentucky. Connecticut state Sen. Chris Murphy replaces Johnson, who entered Congress in 1982. Replacing New Hampshire's Bass will be Democratic prosecutor Paul Hodes.

Georgia Republicans had a chance of taking Democratic House seats.

Reps. Jim Marshall and John Barrow fought to hold districts that the Legislature redrew to give Republicans a better shot this year.

Nowhere was the GOP's task more daunting than in Ohio, where five House seats were at risk. Among the endangered Republicans: Deborah Pryce, the party's No. 4 House leader.

Elsewhere in the Midwest, Democrats showed unexpected strength in usually Republican districts. In Illinois, Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth made a strong bid for the seat retiring Republican Rep. Henry Hyde held for 32 years.

In Kansas, a late visit by Bush failed to save the seat of Rep. Ryun, a 10-year incumbent and former Olympic track star, who lost to chemist Nancy Boyda.

In Wisconsin and Minnesota, the departure of two Republican incumbents created opportunities for Democrats.

Some races in the once solidly Republican Rocky Mountain region tightened late in the campaign.

In Arizona, pre-election polls showed Democratic state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords with a comfortable lead for the seat being vacated by retiring Republican Jim Kolbe.

DOJ_NMG_0091868

In Colorado, Democrat Ed Perlmutter, a former state senator, and Republican Rick O'Donnell, a former member of Republican Gov. Bill Owens' Cabinet, competed in a district where voters are almost evenly split among Republicans, Democrats and independents. Incumbent Bob Beauprez, a Republican, won by 121 votes in 2004; he left to run for governor.

The region's other marquee race was in New Mexico, where Democrat Heather Wilson was being challenged by the state's attorney general, Patricia Madrid.

In California, ties to Jack Abramoff, a former lobbyist who pleaded guilty to influence-peddling, threatened two veteran House Republicans, Richard Pombo and John Doolittle. Both received campaign contributions from Abramoff, and Doolittle's wife, Julie, was employed by one of his personal charities.

Pombo faced Democrat Jerry McNerney, an alternative-energy entrepreneur and novelist. Doolittle's opponent was Charles Brown, a career Air Force officer who went to work for a local police department after his retirement.

In Washington state, Republican Rep. Dave Reichert, a popular former sheriff, tried to fight off a surprisingly strong challenge from Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft employee who made an issue of Reichert's support for Bush's Iraq war policy.

Democrats Win House Control In Midterm Elections; Senate Still In Doubt (USAT)

USA Today, November 8, 2006

Democrats took over the House in Tuesday's midterm elections but Senate control might take weeks to decide, in an election shaped by voter discontent with President Bush and the direction of the Iraq war.

The fate of the Senate increasingly looks like it might rest on a few thousand votes in Virginia, but the House is not in doubt, with Democrats winning more than 230 seats and a House majority by early Wednesday.

"The campaign is over. Democrats are ready to lead," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said Tuesday night. The election results mean Pelosi almost certainly will become the first female speaker in House history.

ELECTIONLINE: Latest developments | Your voting experience?

Democrat Claire McCaskill's victory over incumbent Sen. Jim Talent in Missouri has put Senate control within her party's grasp. Two Senate races remained undecided early Wednesday — Montana, where a Democratic challenger led, and Virginia, where another Democratic challenger was ahead by the slimmest of margins. Democrats must win both to seize Senate control.

The Virginia race between incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen Jr. and Democratic challenger Jim Webb was separated by a few thousand votes early Wednesday out of more than 2.2 million cast, with Webb holding the slight lead.

The slim margin raised the possibility of a recount and legal action, which could take weeks to resolve.

Adviser Karl Rove informed President Bush about 11:15 p.m. ET that the House was lost, according to White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

"Of course he's disappointed," she said of the president, but "he's looking forward to working with the Democrats."

Bush will discuss the results at a 1 p.m. ET news conference Wednesday, she said. He will also be making a series of congratulatory phone calls, including one to Pelosi.

Four incumbent Republicans lost in the Senate. Pennsylvanians voted out conservative stalwart Rick Santorum — the No. 3 GOP leader in the Senate — in favor of Democrat Bob Casey; Rhode Island voters picked Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse over incumbent Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee; Ohio voters chose Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown over Republican incumbent Mike Dewine; and McCaskill beat Talent.

Democrats also won major House races in Indiana, Pennsylvania and Kentucky and the closely contested governor's race in Ohio, the AP projected. And Democrats seized a majority of the nation's governorships for the first time in 12 years.

And Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the incumbent from Connecticut who was defeated earlier this year in that state's Democratic primary, has won re-election as an independent, according to projections.

Up for grabs in the midterm elections are all 435 House seats, 33 Senate seats and governorships in 36 states as well as ballot initiatives in some states on such topics as gay marriage and stem-cell research.

Following are key developments and projected election winners. All projections are made by the AP using a combination of election results and exit polls.

House races

Indiana was particularly cruel to House Republicans. Reps. John Hostettler, Chris Chocola and Mike Sodrel all lost in a state where Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels' unpopularity compounded the dissatisfaction with Bush.

In Florida, state Rep. Joe Negron, a Republican, conceded to Democrat Tim Mahoney in the race to replace disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. Foley resigned in September after being confronted with sexually explicit computer messages and inappropriate e-mails that he allegedly sent to male House pages.

At least two dozen Republican House seats are at risk. Among GOP-held open seats, those in Arizona, Colorado, New York, Ohio and Iowa seemed most vulnerable. More on House races

DOJ_NMG_0091869

If Democrats should win the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, would be in line to become the first female House speaker in history.

The fight for control came down to 50 or so seats, nearly half of them in a string stretching from Connecticut through New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. All were in Republican hands, a blend of seats coming open and incumbents in trouble.

Other Senate races

In one of the night's key races, Republican Bob Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga, defeated Democratic Rep. Harold Ford for the Tennessee seat held by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Ford had sought to become the first black southerner elected to the Senate in more than a century.

In other races, Rep. Ben Cardin, D-Md., won his state's Senate race over Lt. Gov. Michael Steele; West Virginia's Robert Byrd, a Democrat, won a record ninth Senate term; Democratic incumbent Bill Nelson defeated Republican challenger Katherine Harris in their U.S. Senate race in Florida; and incumbent Democrat Debbie Stabenow won re-election in Michigan.

Incumbent Democrat Robert Menendez won a tough New Jersey race against Republican state senator Tom Kean Jr. — one of the few races where a Democratic Senate incumbent appeared in trouble. Political independent Bernie Sanders won the Vermont seat now held by another independent, retiring Sen. James Jeffords.

The Senate will have two independents, thanks to Lieberman's victory. Both Sanders and Lieberman are expected to vote for Democrats when the Senate's leaders are elected.

Governors

In Ohio, Rep. Ted Strickland defeated Republican Ken Blackwell with ease to become the first Democrat elected governor there in 16 years., Deval Patrick triumphed over Republican Kerry Healey in Massachusetts and will become the state's first black chief executive. Democrat Elliot Spitzer, New York's high-profile attorney general, won the state's gubernatorial election. More on governors

In another Democratic pickup, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley was elected Maryland's governor, beating incumbent Republican Robert Ehrlich.

In Michigan, Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm, long targeted by the GOP, defeated millionaire Dick DeVos, even though he put more than $35 million of his own money toward his campaign.

In California, incumbent Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger was re-elected; Republican Charlie Crist, the state attorney general of Florida, defeated Democratic Rep. Jim Davis in the contest to replace term-limited GOP Gov. Jeb Bush.

Ten states had open seats because of retirements, term limits and primary defeat. Five other states were so competitive that incumbent governors were fighting hard to avoid being unseated. In all, 36 states chose their top leaders.

The Democrats were hoping to reverse the Republican majority among governorships that the GOP has held ever since the landslide of 1994.

Ballot measures

Amendments to ban gay marriage won approval Tuesday in three states — including Wisconsin, where gay-rights activists had nursed hopes of engineering the first defeat of such a ban. More on ballot measures

Nationwide, a total of 205 measures were on the ballots in 37 states — ranging from routine bond issues to a riveting contest in South Dakota, where voters chose whether to uphold or reject a toughest-in-the-nation law that would ban virtually all abortions.

Activists on both sides of the abortion debate were on edge over the campaign, and early returns showed a close contest. If the ban is upheld, abortion-rights supporters are likely to launch a legal challenge that could lead all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Exit polls

For voters in House races, national issues trumped local ones, according to national exit poll results released by the Associated Press.

About six in 10 voters disapproved of the war in Iraq, and they strongly favored Democratic House candidates. Less than a third said the war has improved the long-term security of the United States, down from 46% in the 2004 national exit poll.

While voters considered Iraq a very important factor in their decision, it lagged behind the economy, government corruption and scandal as a factor. Terrorism was rated at least as important as Iraq.

More than twice as many voters said they felt angry toward President Bush as felt enthusiastic. About four in 10 voters approved of how Bush is handling his job, slightly more than for Congress .

Eight states had ban-gay-marriage amendments on their ballots; South Carolina and Virginia joined Wisconsin in approving them, while results were pending in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Dakota and Tennessee. Similar amendments have passed previously in all 20 states to consider them.

DOJ_NMG_0091870

Voting problems

At St. John's United Methodist Church in St. Charles, Mo., 35 people waiting outside at 6 a.m. Tuesday to vote when polls opened. Turnout was heavy through the day, said Denise Jensen, a poll worker who has worked the past past several elections at the precinct.

"It's the highest I've ever worked," she said. "If we continue at this pace, we'll be at 80% turnout."

As both parties revved up their massive get-out-the-vote operations, programming errors and inexperience dealing with electronic voting machines caused some problems:

· A federal judge ordered an Ohio county to keep 16 Cleveland-area polling locations open until 9 p.m. ET because of long lines and earlier problems with voting machines.There were reports some machines wouldn't function. "We got five machines — one of them's got to work," said Willette Scullank, a troubleshooter from the Cuyahoga County, Ohio, elections board.

·In Indiana's Marion County, about 175 of 914 precincts turned to paper because poll workers didn't know how to run the machines, said Marion County Clerk Doris Ann Sadler. Election officials in Delaware County, planned to seek a court order to extend voting after an apparent computer error prevented voters from casting ballots in 75 precincts.

· In Florida, voting was briefly delayed at four districts because of either mixed up ballots or electronic activators being unintentionally wiped out, according to Mary Cooney, spokeswoman for the Broward County Supervisor of Elections. Voters were forced to use paper ballots after an electronic machine broke in the Jacksonville suburb of Orange Park.

"This is largely what I expected," said Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, a non-partisan group that tracks voting changes and procedures. "With as much change as we had, expecting things to go absolutely smoothly at the beginning of the day is too optimistic."

Contributing: Douglas Stanglin, Bill Nichols, Kathy Kiely, David Jackson, Andrea Stone, Randy Lilleston and the Associated Press.

GOP Loses 4 Key Senate Races, Wins Tenn. (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 8, 2006

Democrats captured four of the six Republican-held seats they needed to take control of the Senate, winning critical contests in Ohio, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania and Missouri, and inched closer Wednesday to erasing the GOP's majority.

Seizing on voter discontent with President Bush and the war in Iraq, Democrats mounted challenges for two remaining Republican-held seats in Virginia and Montana — and were ahead in both. But in Virginia, Democratic challenger James Webb's lead over Republican incumbent George Allen was razor thin and a recount was likely.

Republicans and Democrats both dispatched lawyers to Virginia to tally uncounted absentee ballots Wednesday, as well as canvass votes counted on Election Day.

GOP incumbent Sen. Jim Talent in Missouri conceded defeat early Wednesday to Democrat Claire McCaskill, the state auditor. "It was not for lack of effort, the headwind was just very, very strong this year," Talent told subdued supporters.

In Pennsylvania, Democrat Bob Casey, son of a popular former governor, soundly defeated incumbent Sen. Rick Santorum, a conservative and third-ranking member of the Senate GOP leadership. Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown easily beat GOP incumbent Mike DeWine in Ohio, a state where Republican scandals were devastating for the party.

Former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse defeated incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island. Chafee is an openly anti-war Republican who consistently voted against President Bush on legislation.

But Republican Bob Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga, defeated Democratic Rep. Harold Ford for the seat held by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Ford had sought to become the first black southerner elected to the Senate in more than a century.

Democrats needed just one more seat to produce a 50-50 Senate, like the one that existed in early 2001, when Vice President Dick Cheney wielded tie-breaking authority.

Americans "have come to the conclusion, as we did some time ago, that a one-party town simply doesn't work," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told party workers early Wednesday.

Reid said a strong Democratic turnout in both Senate and House races shows "we must change course in Iraq."

Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, claimed victory early Wednesday but Allen, behind by fewer than 8,000 votes, urged his supporters to watch the remaining returns carefully.

"The election continues," Allen told them. "The counting will continue through the night. It will continue tomorrow."

A Democrat also was ahead in Montana. Democrat Jon Tester held a narrow margin of just 3,317 votes over incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns with nearly 83 percent of the vote counted. Election officials in Yellowstone County, Mont., said voting machine problems were delaying reporting of any votes in the Montana Senate race until later Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0091871

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the Democrats' vice presidential candidate in 2000 but running as an independent after losing the Democratic primary, kept his seat from Connecticut.

In New Jersey, Sen. Bob Menendez held off a strong challenge from Republican Tom Kean Jr., son of a former governor, to keep the seat in Democratic hands. Menendez, appointed to the seat in January after Jon Corzine gave it up to become governor, had been viewed as the most vulnerable of 17 Senate Democratic incumbents.

Democrats also kept their seat in another important race in Maryland, where Rep. Ben Cardin held off a late surge by Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele to succeed retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes.

Former First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, considering a Democratic bid for the White House in 2008, easily won re-election to a second term from New York.

Lieberman will be one of two independents in the new Senate. Rep. Bernie Sanders, an eight-terms congressman who calls himself a socialist, won the seat of retiring Sen. Jim Jeffords, also an independent. Both Lieberman and Sanders have said they will align themselves with Democrats.

Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan were re-elected. Democrats also kept seats in Wisconsin, North Dakota, New Mexico, Michigan, Nebraska, West Virginia, Massachusetts, Florida, Delaware, Wisconsin and Hawaii.

Republican Sen. John Kyl won re-election in Arizona despite Democratic hopes for an upset by wealthy businessman Jim Pederson.

Republicans also won re-election in Indiana, Maine, Mississippi, Wyoming, Texas, Utah and Nevada.

In Florida, Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson handily rebuffed a challenge from Republican Rep. Katherine Harris, a two-term House member.

Harris came to national attention in 2000 when, as Florida secretary of state, she certified Bush as the Florida winner in his nearly deadlocked presidential race with Democrat Al Gore. However, she fell out of favor with Florida Republicans, and was even urged by Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, the president's brother, not to run.

Democrats needed a net gain of six seats to take control of the Senate, which, except for a 19-month period in 2001 and 2002, has been run by Republicans since 1995.

Exit polls showed that almost six in ten voters disapproved of the war in Iraq, and an equal percentage said they disapproved of how President Bush was handling his job.

In Pennsylvania, about half of those who said in exit polls that they voted for Casey characterized their votes being primarily against Santorum rather than a vote for Casey. Casey also got a boost from one-third of voters who said they were angry with Bush. One-fourth of them said they were mad at GOP leaders in Congress.

Ohio voters expressed similar views. About six in 10 Brown voters said their vote was intended to register opposition to Bush. Two-thirds of Brown voters said they disapproved of the way Congress was handling its job.

Amy Klobuchar, a prosecutor, kept the seat of retiring Sen. Mark Dayton in Minnesota in Democratic hands, defeating Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy.

Among incumbents who coasted to re-election were liberal Democratic lion Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts West Virginia Sen. Robert C. Byrd, who has spent more than half of his 88 years in the Senate.

Veteran Republican senators coasted to re-election in five states: Richard Lugar in Indiana, Olympia Snowe in Maine, Trent Lott in Mississippi, Kay Bailey Hutchison in Texas and Orrin Hatch in Utah.

In Wyoming, Republican Craig Thomas, though hospitalized with pneumonia, won re-election to a third term. And Republican Sen. John Ensign in Nevada turned back a challenge from Democrat Jack Carter, son of former President Jimmy Carter.

Other Democrats winning re-election included Tom Carper in Delaware, Jeff Bingaman in New Mexico, Ben Nelson in Nebraska, Herb Kohl in Wisconsin, Kent Conrad in North Dakota and Daniel Akaka in Hawaii.

Democrats Seize Control Of US House (FT)

By Jeff Pruzan In New York

Financial Times, November 8, 2006

The Democratic party ended 12 years as the minority group in the House of Representatives on Tuesday night, seizing the 15 seats needed to retake control from the Republicans with many races still to be counted.

Control of the Senate remained in the balance, with contests in four critically important Republican-held seats still considered too close to call by late Tuesday. Democratic victories in three of those races would yield the Senate to that party as well.

DOJ_NMG_0091872

But control of the House was seen as critically important to the Democrats' efforts to put the brakes on a White House that has enjoyed the assistance of a friendly Republican Congress for four years.

The Democratic takeover installs Nancy Pelosi, the San Francisco congresswoman, as the first woman House Speaker in US history.

In Washington, a roar went up at 11.10pm in the ballroom of the Hyatt hotel, where the Democrats were holding their election night party as CNN declared that they had taken the House. Activists cheered and jumped in the air, some pulled out cigars to celebrate.

A second roar came minutes later, as the news station predicted a net gain of 29 House seats for the Dems. "It feels great. It's been a long time coming," said Democrat supporter Barry Featherman.

"This is a huge moment," said Sid Wolf, a Senate staffer. "It will bring the balance back to government."

The long-anticipated wave of Democratic support - much of it seen as an anti-Iraq war, anti-White House or anti-Congress vote - outsted a number of Republican House veterans, including Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Curt Weldon and Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania, Charles Taylor of North Carolina and Clay Shaw of Florida.

Early on, Democrats picked up three out of the six seats they need to regain control of the Senate from the Republican party.

In Pennsylvania, Senator Rick Santorum - a longtime conservative standard-bearer - lost his seat to Bob Casey Jr, the conservative son of a popular former Democratic governor. Mike DeWine, a moderate two-term senator, lost to Sherrod Brown, a Democratic congressman.

In Rhode Island, Lincoln Chafee, the Senate's most liberal Republican, lost a close race to Sheldon Whitehouse, his Democratic challenger. The Rhode Island seat had been widely seen as a toss-up after Mr Chafee defeated a conservative challenger in an August primary election.

In Indiana, Republican congressman John Hostettler lost to Brad Ellsworth, a Democratic sheriff, in a race long seen as a national indicator of voter mood. Mr Ellsworth was the first challenger of the evening widely reported to have unseated a member of Congress.

Anne Northup, a Republican congresswoman from Kentucky, was also projected to have lost to her Democratic challenger, John Yarmuth.

At the outset, no Democratic seats had yet switched to Republican hands. In New Jersey, Democratic senator Bob Menendez fought back a challenge from Tom Kean Jr, Republican son of a popular former governor, to protect what has been seen as one of the Democratic party's few vulnerable Senate seats.

Another Senate slot viewed by many as a potential Republican pick-up - the Maryland seat being vacated by retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes - appeared to have tipped to Ben Cardin, a Democratic congressman, over Michael Steele, the state's Republican lieutenant governor.

A number of the most hotly contested races - including the Virginia Senate race between George Allen, the Republican incumbent, and Jim Webb, his conservative Democratic challenger - remained undecided early in the evening.

Voter sentiment also returned Democrats to power in a number of state governors' mansions.

In Ohio, a batch of Republican scandals helped Democratic congressman Ted Strickland defeat Ken Blackwell, the Republican secretary of state. In Massachusetts, Deval Patrick easily won election as the left-voting state's first Democratic governor since 1991. Mr Patrick will also become the north-eastern state's first black governor.

Eliot Spitzer's long-expected victory in the New York governor's race also puts that seat in Democratic hands for the first time since 1994. Mr Spitzer gained notoriety as the state's attorney-general - particularly for his pursuit of white-collar crime on Wall Street - and a serious Republican challenge to defend the seat never surfaced this year.

And in Maryland, Martin O'Malley, Baltimore's Democratic mayor, ousted Republican Robert Ehrlich as governor.

Analysts have long predicted that Democrats would enjoy gains in this year's midterm election, in which all House seats and a third of Senate seats are up for grabs. Few of the seats were seen as competitive during the election cycle, but Democrats had long been tipped as well within reach of recapturing the 15 seats needed to retake the House for the first time since 1994, and the six seats to wrest the Senate from Republicans for the first time since 2002.

Additional reporting by Krishna Guha and Jeremy Grant in Washington

Tight Va. Race Could Hold Senate Key (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And William M. Welch

USA Today, November 8, 2006

Democrats won at least 23 Republican-held seats Tuesday in the House of Representatives, gaining majority control for the first time since 1994. They also ousted three Republican senators as voters delivered a message of dissatisfaction to President Bush and his party.

"We are on the brink of a great Democratic victory," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, who is in line to become the first female speaker of the House.

Democrats were claiming victories over Republicans across the USA in midterm elections dominated by voter concern about the war in Iraq, in which more than 2,800 U.S. troops have died, and congressional scandals. The results amounted to a political reversal for Bush as he plots a course for the final two years of his administration.

Presidential adviser Karl Rove informed Bush around 11:15 p.m. ET that the House was lost, according to White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

"Of course he's disappointed," she said, but "he's looking forward to working with the Democrats."

Democrats needed a net gain of 15 seats to retake the House. In the Senate, they needed to win six-GOP held seats to regain majority control. Democrats defeated incumbent Republicans in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania and Ohio. Republicans held the Tennessee seat of retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Republicans have controlled the House since 1995 and the Senate since 2001.

Among the hot-button issues decided on ballots across the country, South Dakota voters rejected a state law that would have banned nearly all abortions in the state.

Confusion and problems with electronic voting machines and new ID procedures were reported in Ohio, Indiana and many other states. Turnout appeared strong as voters decided on all U.S. House seats, 33 Senate seats, governorships in 36 states.

·In the House, Democrats ousted some veteran GOP incumbents, including Reps. Clay Shaw of Florida and Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, leaders on Social Security and health care. Republicans also lost seats in Arizona, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Texas.

·In the Senate, Democrats ousted Pennyslvania's Rick Santorum, a conservative lightning rod who was the No. 3 Republican leader in the Senate. Democrats held seats in New Jersey, Maryland, Washington and Minnesota that were the best chances for GOP gains. Virginia's race, which could decide control of the Senate, was too close to call.

The Senate was assured of having two independents who will vote with Democrats: Vermont's Bernie Sanders and Connecticut's Joe Lieberman, who left the party after losing the primary.

·Democrats were on their way to a majority of governor's offices, gaining the top jobs in Massachusetts, Ohio, New York, Arkansas and Colorado. Republicans went into the election holding a 28-22 majority.

In Massachusetts, Democrat Deval Patrick defeated Republican Kerry Healey to become the state's first African-American governor.

Already dealing with a divisive war, Bush would face newly empowered Democrats who want U.S. troops to begin leaving Iraq and would have subpoena power to investigate Bush's conduct of the war and the overall fight against terrorism.

Loss Of House Is Rare Defeat For Bush (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 8, 2006

Resigned to Democratic control of the House, President Bush struck a businesslike tone Tuesday night and made plans to call the woman poised to become speaker of a Democratic House majority.

"The president's not the kind of guy who is going to be somber about things," said press secretary Tony Snow. But he added: "They have not gone the way he would have liked."

Bush, unaccustomed to political defeat, planned a morning phone call to House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi and made plans to give his take on the midterm election results at an afternoon news conference.

The president watched the results in the White House residence, where Snow described the mood as "businesslike."

Asked if the president was surprised that the House was shifting to the Democrats, Snow said it wasn't "a slap-on-the-forehead kind of shock."

Determined to stave off a Democratic-controlled Congress, Bush raised millions of dollars, flew thousands of miles, shook hands, kissed babies, praised fellow Republicans and blasted Democrats — in private at first, lately before cheering crowds.

From huge hotel ballrooms in Washington to luxury homes across the country, Bush collected more than $193 million for the GOP at about 90 fundraisers over 20 months. Switching to traditional campaign rallies only at the last, he raced through 15 cities in 11 days.

Despite Republican fears and Democratic hopes that Election Day would place the House, the Senate and a majority of governors' mansions in Democratic hands, Bush remained relentlessly optimistic.

DOJ_NMG_0091874

"We've had quite a week," he said in Texas. "We're closing strong."

Tuesday morning in his adopted hometown of Crawford, Bush cheerfully voted in the local firehouse. Outside, an "I voted" sticker on his jacket, he put aside the partisan attacks and appealed to Americans to vote, whichever party they favored.

The president then returned to the White House to await the results so pivotal to the last two years of his presidency.

He was joined for dinner by political strategist Karl Rove, GOP chairman Ken Mehlman, White House chief of staff Josh Bolten, former Commerce Secretary Don Evans and Brad Freeman, a California venture capitalist and top Bush fundraiser.

A Capitol Hill even half dominated by Democrats would erect a bedeviling barrier to the remaining items on his presidential agenda. It would also raise the specter of possible investigations into his pre-Iraq war use of intelligence, post-Sept. 11 expansion of executive power and other issues.

From a famous family of politicians, Bush first entered the electoral fray on his own behalf in 1978 when he ran, and lost, for Congress from West Texas.

He has not lost since, not for governor of Texas in 1994 and again in 1998, not in two runs for the White House, and not in 2002, when — with his help — his party bucked historical trends and not only kept but expanded its majorities in the House and the Senate.

For this year's midterm elections, Bush headlined at least as many political events as before the voting in 2002. But the nature of his effort was much different.

With the war growing unpopular and his approval ratings 25 points lower than four years ago, Bush kept his political appearances more out of the public eye.

When the public rallies did start, two months later than in the 2002 election cycle, they were exclusively in GOP-friendly states he won in 2004, most in small or rural communities less likely to have a boisterous anti-Bush presence.

He didn't stay away from contested races. But by jetting into the reddest of states, such as Nebraska, Kansas and Montana, the president was playing defense. His assignment was not to lure undecideds, but to coax a dispirited GOP base to turn out.

White House political strategists said the president helped.

But some in Bush's party made a point of distancing themselves from his policies, even while they eagerly accepted his behind-closed-doors fundraising help. Others said "No, thank you" to any presidential involvement.

Democrats Take Control Of House; Decisive Races In Senate Are Tight (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

Democrats seized control of the House of Representatives and ousted at least three Republican senators yesterday, riding a wave of voter discontent with President Bush and the war in Iraq in the most contested Congressional battle since Republicans captured Congress 12 years ago.

The Democrats seemed to be falling short of winning the six seats they need to win the Senate, officials in both parties said early this morning. But their victory in the House — overcoming a legendarily efficient White House political machine, directed by Karl Rove — represented a dramatic turnaround in the fortunes of the Democratic Party and signaled a sea change in the political dynamics of a government that has been dominated by Republicans for a decade.

No less significant for the long-term political fortunes of their party, Democrats were winning governors' seats across the country — notably in Ohio, Arkansas and New York.

By early this morning, Democrats had picked up more than the 15 seats they needed to win control, knocking off Republican incumbents from New Hampshire to Indiana to Florida, officials in both parties said. Although results from the West Coast had not yet come in, neither party expected those contests would alter the basic outcome.

Among the faces who will be absent from the halls of Congress next year are some of the more moderate members of the party — Representatives Charles Bass of New Hampshire and Clay Shaw of Florida and Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

Mr. Rove, the president's top political strategist, alerted the president that the House was lost at around 11 p.m., the White House said.

"His reaction was he was disappointed in the results in the House," Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said late last night. "But he's eager to work with both parties on his priorities over the next two years — he's got an agenda of important issues he wants to work on, and he's going to work with both parties."

Mr. Bush has called a press conference for Wednesday afternoon. Asked if Mr. Bush had made phone calls to Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader and likely Speaker of the House, Pelosi, Mr. Fratto said the president would not make any phone calls until Wednesday morning and that he was still hopeful late Tuesday that the Senate would remain under Republican control.

DOJ_NMG_0091875

In addition to Mr. Chafee of Rhode Island, the other defeated Republican senators were Mike DeWine of Ohio and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

At the same time, one of the Republicans' top targets — Senator Robert Menendez, Democrat of New Jersey — survived a nearly $5 million onslaught by the Republican Party to defeat Thomas H. Kean Jr.

In New York, Eliot Spitzer breezed to victory, becoming the first Democrat in 12 years to move into the governor's mansion in Albany, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton won easy re-election. In Connecticut, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, running as an independent, defeated the man who beat him in the Democratic primary, Ned Lamont.

Democrats scored one crucial win in governors' races as Representative Ted Strickland won in Ohio. His victory, along with the defeat of Mr. DeWine by Sherrod Brown, signaled that Ohio was no longer the Republican bulwark that it has long been. Democrats also took control of the governor's mansion in Massachusetts, and Gov. Edward G. Rendell, a Democrat, won a second term in Pennsylvania.

Despite the early Democratic gains, tension gripped officials in both parties as the evening unfolded.

"We're on the brink of a great Democratic victory," Ms. Pelosi said as she appeared before an enthusiastic crowd of Democrats in Washington early this evening.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who headed his party's effort to win the Senate, appeared in a ballroom full of supporters in Washington at 8:45 p.m. to claim victory in Pennsylvania and Ohio.

"So far, we're up two" Mr. Schumer said to great applause, adding, "We're biting our nails on Virginia."

"We're not breaking out the Champagne bottles yet," he said. "But so far, so good."

Four other closely watched Senate races were still undecided by late evening. They were in Virginia, where Senator George Allen, the Republican, was in a dead heat with Jim Webb; in Missouri, where Republican Jim Talent was leading State Auditor Claire McCaskill; in Tennessee, where the Republican Bob Corker was ahead of Representative Harold Ford Jr., for the seat being vacated by Senator Bill Frist, and in Montana, where the Republican, Conrad Burns, was in a close race with State Senator Jon Tester.

In Virginia, only a few thousand votes separated the two candidates after 98 percent of the votes were counted. With more than 100,000 absentee ballots still uncounted, the result was not expected for hours. Republicans said they were confident they would be able to withstand the Democratic assault and hold on to at least the Senate. "I think it's going to be a fairly late night for both the House and the Senate," Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, said on CNN.

Despite the Democratic victories, two Georgia Democrats struggled for re-election — Representatives Jim Marshall and John Barrow — had been important to the Republican strategy of holding on to the House. President Bush flew to both their districts last week to campaign for their Republican challengers.

But early in the evening, some closely watched Republican incumbents went down to defeat. In Kentucky, Representative Anne M. Northup, who had a history of withstanding tough challenges, was defeated by John Yarmuth. And in Indiana, three Republicans were defeated: Representatives John Hostettler, Mike Sodrel and Chris Chocola. In Connecticut, Representative Nancy L. Johnson, a veteran Republican, was defeated.

Mr. Hostettler's defeat was particularly noteworthy, because he was defeated by a conservative Democratic sheriff, Brad Ellsworth, who, if ideologically a fit for his district, will stand out in the Democratic caucus next year.

At stake was Republican control of both the House and the Senate in the most competitive midterm election since Republicans seized control in 1994. That was the last time one party took control of both houses away from the other. This year, Democrats were looking to win 15 seats to capture the House and 6 to win the Senate.

The election to a large extent became a national referendum on President Bush and the war in Iraq, according to exit polls.

Sixty percent of voters interviewed as they left the polls today said they opposed the war in Iraq, and 40 percent said their vote was a vote against Mr. Bush. In addition, a significant number of voters said corruption was a crucial issue in their decision, in a year in which Republicans have struggled with scandal in their ranks.

Independent voters, a closely watched group in a polarized country, broke heavily for Democrats over Republicans, the exit polls showed.

The day included concerns about electronic voting machines being used for the first time in many parts of the country, as well as about often strict new voter registration laws. Problems were reported in a dozen states, including Indiana and Ohio. Polling hours in parts of eight states were extended to make up for the problems.

President Bush cast his vote in Crawford, Tex., then returned to Washington to watch the returns at the White House with a group that included Mr. Mehlman, and Karl Rove, the president's senior adviser.

DOJ_NMG_0091876

Throughout the day, Republican Party officials said they were encouraged by reports of what they said was high turnout in typically Republican parts of the country, as well as counts of early votes and absentee ballots. They disputed early exit poll findings that suggested that Republican candidates might be in trouble, though they acknowledged the problems the party's candidates faced this year.

"We are in a challenging year," Mr. Mehlman said on CNN.

The voting finished an often bitter campaign that pitted a Democratic Party frustrated by years of losses against a White House and a Republican Party acutely aware that losing control of the House or the Senate would fundamentally alter the remainder of Mr. Bush's presidency.

The Republicans went into the campaign with institutional advantages.

Because of redistricting, few incumbents appeared vulnerable initially. Republicans also had what both parties viewed as the considerable advantage of a powerful and sophisticated get-out-the-vote machine the Republican Party began putting together as soon as Mr. Bush took office in 2001.

Once again, Republicans had a financial advantage, even though vigorous fund-raising efforts by Democrats narrowed the historic gap. Over all, Republicans spent $559 million, compared with $456 million by Democrats, according to records filed with the Federal Election Commission. And Mr. Rove made clear that he believed Republicans could again roll to victory by emphasizing terrorism and national security issues, as they have in both national elections since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But by the middle of October, Republicans found they were struggling with what several described as the worst political environment in a generation, making it easier, according to exit polls on Tuesday, for Democrats to achieve their central strategic objective: Turning this election into a national referendum on Mr. Bush's leadership and, more generally, on Republican stewardship.

The war in Iraq deteriorated throughout the fall, the American death toll spiked in October, and public opinion turned more firmly against the conflict. Eight in 10 voters who said they approved of the war in Iraq voted Republican, and 8 in 10 voters who said they disapproved voted Democratic, the exit polls said.

In contrast to 2004 and 2002, when the president was sought after by Republican candidates throughout the country, Mr. Bush was extremely unpopular in many parts of the country this year, limiting the places where he was welcome to campaign. He was shunned by his party's candidate for governor in Florida on Monday, and Democrats ran hundreds of advertisements featuring their Republican opponents standing or sitting next to Mr. Bush. Nearly 4 in 10 voters leaving the polls said their vote on Tuesday was cast against Mr. Bush.

The Republicans also struggled with corruption scandals, including the resignation in September of Representative Mark Foley of Florida, after he admitted sending sexually inappropriate messages to teenage pages.

By the end of the campaign, Republicans said they had been forced to spend money in races that should never have been in play, including the one to replace Mr. Foley and another for the seat once held by Tom DeLay of Texas, the former Republican majority leader who resigned from Congress after being indicted on charges of conspiring to violate Texas election laws.

GOP Ceded The Middle And Paid The Price (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2006

For six tumultuous years President Bush has provoked intense opposition while mobilizing passionate support for an ambitious conservative agenda.

On Tuesday, that perilous strategy crumbled — and triggered his party's abrupt fall from power.

Republicans lost control of the House, and at best face a weakened grip in the Senate. The widespread losses will present Bush and the GOP with a sharpened challenge from congressional Democrats eager to command attention for their policy priorities, such as raising the national minimum wage, and to investigate the administration's performance on Iraq, global warming and other issues.

In the long run, the results raise fundamental questions about the viability of the strategy Bush and his chief political advisor, Karl Rove, have pursued to build a lasting Republican political majority.

Bush and Rove placed their main emphasis on unifying and energizing Republicans and right-leaning independents with an agenda that focused squarely on the goals of conservatives.

But Tuesday's broad Democratic advance underscored the risks in that approach: In many races, Republicans were overwhelmed by an energized Democratic base and a sharp turn toward the Democrats by moderate swing voters unhappy with the president's performance.

"The story line really is that the Democrats are winning the middle," said Democratic pollster Al Quinlan.

DOJ_NMG_0091877

Veteran GOP pollster Bill McInturff said: "Iraq is front and center of this election, and people voted for change. The GOP base held — was motivated and voted — but the margins among independents and moderates [for Democrats] was too much to overcome."

The National Election Pool exit polls conducted by Edison Media Research and Mitofsky International showed that 80% of voters who disapproved of the Iraq war voted Democratic for Congress, while 80% who approved voted Republican. But only about two in five voters approved of the war, while nearly three-fifths disapproved, according to figures posted by CNN.

A mirror revolt

Tuesday's election may represent a bookend to the historic Republican landslide in 1994.

In that election, Republicans captured the Senate by gaining eight seats and won the House for the first time in 40 years by gaining 52 seats. The engine for the GOP advance was a widespread backlash, both among its core supporters and independent swing voters, when Democratic President Clinton veered left on several key issues after promising to govern as a centrist.

Republicans have controlled the House since then, and the Senate for all but 18 months. But on Tuesday, a political uprising that looked like the mirror image of the voter revolt against Clinton broke the GOP's grip on the House and left the Senate split basically in half.

The election saw Democrats strengthen their hold over the regions in the country where they are already strong, with Senate victories in Maryland, New York, New Jersey and Rhode Island, and House gains in Pennsylvania, Connecticut and New York.

At the same time, Democrats pushed into Republican territory with a big Senate win in Ohio, a pick up of three House seats in Indiana, as well as gains in the interior West.

The Democratic successes in such places chipped away at one of the most powerful patterns of the last few decades: a tendency for each party to consolidate its control of House and Senate seats from states it usually carries in the presidential races.

Republicans continued to enjoy strong support from their core supporters, based on the results from several key races and exit polls.

That helped the GOP restrain its losses in many "red" states, even as they suffered erosion in "blue" states such as Pennsylvania and New York.

In Virginia's tight Senate race, for instance, Republican Sen. George Allen stayed step-for-step with Democrat Jim Webb partly by capturing nearly 60% of the vote in Chesterfield County, a traditional GOP stronghold outside Richmond, and running slightly better than he did six years ago in Chesapeake, a conservative military-influenced community in the state's far southeast corner.

Republicans also held hotly contested GOP-leaning districts in Florida and Virginia and mounted strong challenges against Democratic House incumbents in Georgia.

The determination of the Democratic base to strike a blow against Bush was evident in the large turnout in party strongholds like Philadelphia and Cleveland.

At the same time, Democrats registered gains among two groups of swing voters.

Swinging to the left

In many places, the results suggested that socially moderate, upscale voters were breaking clearly for the Democrats.

In Pennsylvania, Republican Sen. Rick Santorum six years ago carried all three of the large suburban counties outside Philadelphia by a combined total of nearly 100,000 votes. But on Tuesday, the overall victory margin for Democrat Bob Casey Jr. in these counties exceeded 120,000 as he cruised to victory.

The same trend was evident in Virginia. In that dead-heat contest, Webb pulverized Allen in the affluent suburbs outside Washington.

Democrats also made gains among more socially conservative, economically strained swing voters, who have provided critical votes for Republicans in recent years.

In Indiana, Democrat Brad Ellsworth convincingly defeated Rep. John Hostettler in a heavily rural district where Bush captured over three-fifths of the vote two years ago.

Beaver and Westmoreland counties in Pennsylvania's southwest corner, considered strongholds of blue-collar conservative "Reagan Democrats," split about evenly in Santorum's reelection six years ago. But Casey carried them by nearly 25,000 votes on Tuesday.

John C. Green, a political scientist at the University of Akron, said the erosion Republicans faced among affluent and working-class swing voters underscored the risks of Bush's decision to push an agenda opposed by nearly half the country on even his best days.

DOJ_NMG_0091878

"The Bush people chose to put up with a very high level of conflict," Green said. "They didn't try to build a large consensus majority."

Bush wasn't on the ballot Tuesday, but he loomed as a decisive factor. Attitudes toward Bush powerfully shaped the results.

In Missouri, for instance, site of the nail-biting contest between Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill, the exit poll showed that almost 90% of those who approved of Bush's performance backed Talent, while nearly 85% of those who disapproved backed McCaskill.

In other states such as Ohio, Rhode Island, New Jersey and Maryland, exit polls found much more lopsided majorities than in Missouri disapproving of Bush's performance — a trend that created hurdles for GOP candidates.

Especially ominous for the GOP may have been the reopening of the gender gap. In 2004, Bush used security issues to narrow the traditional Democratic advantage among women.

But with surveys for months showing women especially dismayed over the Iraq war, Democrats ran up large margins with female voters, according to the exit polls.

ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

A Voter Rebuke For Bush, The War And The Right (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jim VandeHei

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

The political pendulum in American politics swung away from the right yesterday, putting an end to the 12-year Republican Revolution on Capitol Hill and delivering a sharp rebuke of President Bush and the Iraq war.

The GOP reign in the House that began with Newt Gingrich in a burst of vision and confrontation in 1994 came crashing down amid voter disaffection with congressional corruption. The collapse of one-party rule in Washington will transform Bush's final two years in office and challenge Democrats to make the leap from angry opposition to partners in power.

How far the balance shifts to the left remains to be seen. The passion of the antiwar movement helped propel party activists in this election year, and the House leadership under the likely new speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), hails from the party's liberal wing. But the Democrats' victory was built on the back of more centrist candidates seizing Republican-leaning districts, and Pelosi emphasized that she will try to lead without becoming the ideological mirror of Gingrich.

"We have learned from watching the Republicans -- they would not allow moderates a voice in their party," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in an interview as he waited to see if Democrats would take control of the upper chamber as well. "We must work from the middle."

The Democrats' return to power in at least one house and gains in the other mean Bush will almost certainly face powerful pressure to reassess his Iraq policy -- not just from Democrats but from within his own party. Even many Republicans hanging on last night emerged from a bruising election restive and looking for a fresh direction.

By the end of the campaign, Republicans were airing ads distancing themselves from Bush's wartime leadership, and the president himself abandoned the phrase "stay the course." The White House is placing hope on a study group headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a longtime Bush family intimate, to offer a new approach to the war. Yet Vice President Cheney laid down a marker last week, saying "it doesn't matter" if the war is unpopular and vowing to continue "full speed ahead."

During a victory speech last night, Pelosi made clear that would not suffice: "We cannot continue down this catastrophic path. And so we say to the president, 'Mr. President, we need a new direction in Iraq. Let us work together to find a solution to the war in Iraq.' "

The results represented the first defeat at the polls for Bush politics since he came to power after the 2000 presidential election ended with a recount battle. In back-to-back elections after that, he defied conventional wisdom to pull out victories, tapping into a strain of anxiety that has flavored the national electorate since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush and senior adviser Karl Rove tried to replicate that strategy this fall, hoping to keep the election from becoming a referendum on the president's leadership and instead make it a choice between two parties with different governing philosophies. "One thing that's true is this will have been a referendum election," said Gary Jacobson, a political science professor at the University of California at San Diego.

Overall, 59 percent of voters surveyed in a news media consortium series of exit polls yesterday expressed dissatisfaction or anger with the Bush administration; 36 percent said they cast their vote to express opposition to Bush, compared with 22 percent who were voting to support him. Fifty-six percent of voters support withdrawing some or all U.S. troops from Iraq, which will embolden Democrats pushing for a pullout.

DOJ_NMG_0091879

Corruption proved to be a more potent issue than it had appeared even weeks ago. After 12 years in control, the Republicans who took power with Gingrich promising to sweep out a calcified and ethically bankrupt Democratic leadership found themselves perceived as becoming what they had tried to expunge. Exit polls found 41 percent of voters rated corruption "extremely important" to their decision.

"What you saw was the voters speak out very loudly on the way Congress conducted itself," said Rep. Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.). "We really have to take stock of where we are and we have to go about doing things different." Cantor said this includes a renewed emphasis on fiscal discipline and ethics reform.

"Republicans should have been more diligent in locating instances of individual corruption and handled those appropriately," said former representative Vin Weber (R-Minn.), an adviser to GOP leaders and the White House. "We did not need to lose all those seats."

The loss provoked the start of what could be a painful period of self-examination among Republicans eager to find answers, or place blame. With moderates in the Northeast falling, the Republican conference will grow more conservative. Some said they expect Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) to step aside as party leader after the fallout from the page scandal and a new younger generation vowing to return to the promise and principles of the Gingrich revolution hopes to take the reins. Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), one of several younger conservatives who has lashed out at his party's veering from core fiscal and social principles, is planning to run for leadership.

"It's not an affirmation of a Democratic agenda; I think that's clear, because they didn't offer one," said John Weaver, a strategist for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). "It's about how we as Republicans set aside our principles to try to stay in power. We decided to try to spend money like Democrats, we decided not to reform or tackle big issues. And at the end of the day, the American voters said, 'Enough is enough.' "

The complexion of the Democratic presence in Congress will change as well. Party politics will be shaped by the resurgence of "Blue Dog" Democrats, who come mainly from the South and from rural districts in the Midwest and often vote like Republicans. Top Democrats such as Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) see these middle-of-the-road lawmakers as the future of the party in a nation that leans slightly right of center.

In private talks before the election, Emanuel and other top Democrats told their members they cannot allow the party's liberal wing to dominate the agenda next year. Democrats will hold 30 or 35 seats that went for Bush in the past, meaning that Democratic candidates such as Brad Ellsworth in rural Indiana are likely to face competitive races again in 2008. Still, their interests are likely to collide with those of veteran liberals such as Reps. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and John Conyers Jr., (Mich.), who will chair committees.

With that in mind, there is a chance the 110th Congress could begin on a bipartisan note. Democrats have vowed to move quickly to tighten ethics laws and require offsets for new spending -- two plans many Republicans will probably support in light of yesterday's results. Democrats also plan to push next year to raise the minimum wage, increase spending for cargo inspection at ports and reduce rates on student loans, all issues likely to draw some GOP support.

Partisan standoffs are likely over the war and any Democratic efforts to repeal Bush's tax cuts for upper-income America. In both cases, Democratic divisions could complicate Pelosi's plans. Democrats largely avoided detailed positions on a new Iraq strategy, but votes over spending for the military and the Iraq operation will force them to take a position.

At the center of all this will be Bush, who enters the final phase of his presidency with an opposition House and the sting of a campaign in which he was deemed to be an albatross. Bush arrived at Election Day with a lower approval rating than any other president in a midterm since Harry S. Truman in 1946. Aides took some consolation that the losses approximated the average for the sixth year of a two-term presidency.

For weeks, the White House maintained it was doing no contingency planning in case of Democratic gains. But Bush advisers are mapping out an agenda for his final two years that would include legislation that might win bipartisan support, such as extending and expanding the No Child Left Behind education program and creating a guest-worker program for illegal immigrants. Other priorities, such as adding investment accounts to Social Security, would seem virtually impossible in a Democratic House.

As the election approached, the White House said it would not trim its sails no matter who won. But as they absorbed the losses last night, Bush aides said he will return to his style of governance in Texas, when he forged a strong working relationship with a legislature led by conservative Democrats. "Obviously, we are disappointed with what happened in the House," said White House counselor Dan Bartlett. Bush, he added, will reach out to Democrats at a news conference today. "He will do his part."

A Loud Message For Bush (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091880

Everything is different now for President Bush. The era of one-party Republican rule in Washington ended with a crash in yesterday's midterm elections, putting a proudly unyielding president on notice that the voters want change, especially on the war in Iraq.

Mr. Bush now confronts the first Democratic majority in the House in 12 years and a significantly bigger Democratic caucus in the Senate that were largely elected on the promise to act as a strong check on his administration. Almost any major initiative in his final two years in office will now, like it or not, have to be bipartisan to some degree.

For six years, Mr. Bush has often governed, and almost always campaigned, with his attention focused on his conservative base. But yesterday's voting showed the limits of those politics, as practiced — and many thought perfected — by Mr. Bush and his chief political adviser, Karl Rove.

In the bellwether states of Ohio and Pennsylvania, two Republican senators, both members of the legendary freshman class of 1994, were defeated by large margins. Across the Northeast, Republican moderates were barely surviving or, like Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, falling to Democrats who had argued that they were simply too close to a conservative president.

Most critically, perhaps, Republicans lost the political center on the Iraq war, according to national exit polls. Voters who identified themselves as independents broke strongly for the Democrats, the exit polls showed, as did those who described themselves as moderates.

Senator Olympia J. Snowe, a Maine Republican who was re-elected yesterday, said that with the election's results, the administration's Iraq policy "has to change."

"It absolutely has to change," Ms. Snowe said. "And that message should have been conveyed by the administration much sooner."

Mr. Bush's allies could argue that history was working against Republicans, that in a president's sixth year in office, his party was ripe for big losses. They could also argue that Congressional Republicans brought their own vulnerabilities and scandals to the table. But this was a nationalized election, and Mr. Bush and Iraq were at the center of it.

Nearly 4 in 10 voters said they saw their ballot as a vote against Mr. Bush, about twice as many as those who said they had cast their ballots for him. It was a remarkable turnaround for a president who just two years ago emerged triumphant from his re-election campaign, declaring that he had earned political capital and intended to spend it.

That capital slowly drained away with an ill-fated fight on Social Security, a furor over the government's mishandling of Hurricane Katrina, an aggressive intervention for conservative causes like the right-to-die case of Terri Schiavo, and, more than anything, pollsters said, the war in Iraq. In the final days of the campaign, Mr. Bush's travels to some of the most Republican and least competitive regions in the country were a portrait of his political isolation.

Geoffrey Garin, a Democratic pollster, said, "An important feature of this election, with implications for 2008, is that the center of the electorate clearly doesn't like to be ignored in an era of base politics. The Republicans played to the base at their great peril among the middle."

After a campaign that only escalated the tension between Mr. Bush and Congressional Democrats, the president will now face overwhelming pressure to take a more conciliatory approach. For example, he will be under increasing pressure to re-evaluate his support for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, which he so publicly restated in the closing days of the campaign.

Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas at Austin, said Mr. Bush certainly had the capability to practice more bipartisan politics; he governed that way often in Texas, and also occasionally in Washington, on legislation like the No Child Left Behind Act.

Other analysts pointed out that on issues like energy and immigration, Mr. Bush can find common ground with many Democrats. Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman and lobbyist who is close to the administration, said, "They'll be able to pivot quite easily on this and adapt to political reality."

But much of Mr. Bush's domestic agenda, which was not exactly gliding through the current Congress, will face even tougher prospects now. That includes any effort to overhaul entitlement programs like Social Security, already heavily shadowed by his failed effort to push through private investment accounts for Social Security in 2005, as well as any effort to extend all of his tax cuts, which Democrats say were heavily skewed to the most affluent.

Moreover, with a greater Democratic presence in the Senate, Mr. Bush will have far less latitude in his judicial nominees.

Even if Mr. Bush makes the grand gestures, Democrats heading into the 2008 presidential campaign may not be in the mood to reciprocate. Still, on Iraq, some change is almost inevitable, analysts say.

There is already a vehicle for a new bipartisanship, experts noted. A commission headed by James A. Baker III, former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, former Democratic representative from Indiana, is exploring policy alternatives for Iraq and is expected to make recommendations this winter.

DOJ_NMG_0091881

House Democratic leaders have already indicated that they will not cut off financing for the war; in many ways, their greatest power will be their ability to investigate, hold hearings and provide the oversight that they asserted was so lacking in recent years.

Experts point out that Mr. Bush is hardly the first president to confront a House controlled by the opposition; since World War II, some form of divided government has been the norm. President Bill Clinton, through a combination of negotiation, brinksmanship and bluffs, produced major legislation with the Republican Congress after 1994, including an overhaul of the welfare system and a huge balanced budget law.

Mr. Bush could try to do the same. But first he would have to abandon the political worldview that he drew, by many accounts, from his father's defeat — to never cross his base. President George H. W. Bush lost conservatives when he broke his "no new taxes pledge."

The younger Bush has rarely made that mistake. His circle had clearly hoped that the conservative base would come through in the end, saving the Republican majority even in the face of an unpopular war. But this time, it was not enough.

Democrats Take Control Of House; Virginia Could Determine Senate (WSJ)

By Jason Fry

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Democrats took control of the House, riding a surge of voter anger that ended 12 years of GOP rule. A very close race in Virginia could determine control of the Senate, with the distinct possibility of yet another electoral season ending in recounts and rancor.

By early Wednesday, Democrats had picked up more than 20 House seats from Republicans -- sufficient turnover to make California Democrat Nancy Pelosi the House's first female speaker.

Democratic challengers capitalized on voter anger to oust numerous Republican incumbents from the House. In Indiana, Brad Ellsworth defeated John Hostettler, Baron Hill ousted Mike Sodrel, and Joe Donnelly beat Chris Chocola. In Kentucky, Democrat John Yarmuth ousted Kentucky Republican Anne Northup. In Ohio, Democrat Zack Space beat Joy Padgett to fill the seat vacated when the GOP's Robert Ney resigned. Twelve-term Connecticut Republican Nancy Johnson was defeated by Democrat Chris Murphy. New Hampshire Republican Charles Bass, a six-termer, was ousted by Democrat Paul Hodes. In Florida, Tim Mahoney beat the GOP's Joe Negron to fill the seat vacated by disgraced Republican Rep. Mark Foley, and Ron Klein ousted veteran Republican Clay Shaw Jr. In Pennsylvania, Republican incumbents Curt Weldon and Don Sherwood were ousted by Joe Sestak and Christopher Carney. (See article1.)

FOLLOW THE VOTE

· Senate overview2

· House overview3

· Governors overview4

· Voting problems5

· Ballot Issues6

· Map: When the polls close7 | Photos8

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20069.

PREVIEW

· Election Quiz:10 Test your political IQ.

· Got an election-related question? Write to The Wall Street Journal's Alan Murray at askalan@wsj.com11, and check back Election Night, when Alan will answer selected questions at wsj.com/video12 from 6 p.m. ET to midnight.

SENATE AND GOVERNORS

13 · Review opinion polls14 in hot Senate races, and see what the data could mean for the breakdown of seats in the chamber after Election Day.

· The Senate's Uncertain States:15 Interactive profiles of the demographics and candidates in hard-fought Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Virginia.

· Battlegrounds Poll:16 Who's ahead in the most hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

RACE FOR THE HOUSE

17 · Opinion polls: Key House races18

· Representative Races: Data on 20 key districts19

· Chief Concerns: Who heads key committees if Democrats win the House?20

DOJ_NMG_0091882

In the Senate, Democrats defeated a trio of incumbent Republicans, but had to win three remaining races to take control of that body. The outcome might not be determined until the early-morning hours -- or later. In Tennessee, Harold Ford failed in his bid to beat Republican Bob Corker for the seat vacated by Bill Frist. But Democrats believed that Montana challenger Jon Tester would oust Conrad Burns and Claire McCaskill would narrowly prevail in Missouri against GOP incumbent Jim Talent. That would leave control of the Senate hinging on Virginia, where the race between Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger Jim Webb was too close to call and certainly headed for a recount.

"The votes are in and we won," Mr. Webb told a crowd of jubilant supporters at a northern Virginia hotel ballroom early Wednesday.

About an hour earlier, Mr. Allen sounded a rather different note in an appearance before his supporters: "The election continues," he said. "The counting will continue through the night, and will continue tomorrow, and I know you will all be like eagles and hawks watching as every one of these votes are counted."

In Pennsylvania, Democrat Bob Casey defeated Rick Santorum, the third-ranking member of the Senate GOP leadership. Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown beat GOP incumbent Mike DeWine in Ohio, a state where Republican scandals were devastating for the party. And former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse defeated Lincoln Chafee, an openly anti-war Republican, in Rhode Island. In Maryland, Democrat Ben Cardin beat Michael Steele to keep an open seat in Democratic hands -- though Mr. Steele refused to concede. And in New Jersey, incumbent Robert Menendez held off challenger Thomas Kean Jr. for another seat Democrats had to keep. (See article21.)

All 435 House seats were on the ballot, as were 33 Senate races. In addition, 36 states were electing governors and voters were set to decide hundreds of statewide ballot initiatives on everything from gay marriage and embryonic stem-cell research to the minimum wage. Voting delays due to equipment malfunctions were reported in a number of states.

In the gubernatorial ranks, Democrat Ted Strickland claimed the governor's mansion in Ohio and Democrats Deval Patrick and Eliot Spitzer followed suit in Massachusetts and New York, respectively. All three governorships had been vacated by Republicans. Mr. Strickland's win returns a Democrat to the governorship for the first time since the 1980s; Mr. Patrick will become just the second black governor in the U.S. since Reconstruction, following former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder. A bright spot for Republicans was Charlie Crist, who kept the Florida governorship now held by the president's brother Jeb in GOP hands. (See article22.)

Republicans won control of the House and Senate in a 1994 landslide and have held it ever since, except for a 19-month period in 2001 and 2002 following Mr. Jeffords' switch from the GOP to independent. (The Democrats surrendered that majority in the 2002 elections.)

An early wave of exit-poll data, compiled and analyzed by a media consortium, suggested that voters went to polling places frustrated with an increasingly unpopular president, the war in Iraq and a Republican-led Congress that hadn't provided the checks and balances Americans seem to want. The results were compiled and released early in the evening, before polls in any states had closed. While early exit-poll results in past elections have, at times, proved inaccurate at projecting final results and have been too heavily weighted toward Democratic voters, the early data suggested a country feeling deep dissatisfaction and seeking change.

Some six in 10 voters said they disapproved of Mr. Bush's performance as president and of the way Congress is handling its job. Those voters were overwhelmingly giving their support to Democrats. Even 15% of people who voted for Mr. Bush in 2004 were giving their votes to Democrats running for Congress. Just 5% of John Kerry's supporters were crossing over this year to vote Republican.

More than half of voters surveyed said they disapproved of Congress's handling of the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley, and they went for the Democrats by a three-to-one margin. Republican leaders argued this election would be about local, not national issues, but voters disagreed. By nearly a two-to-one margin, they said national issues were more important than local issues in casting their ballot for the House.

Exit polls showed that terrorism and the war with Iraq were nearly equal in voters' minds as important issues. That suggested something of a draw in the battle between Democrats, who wanted the focus to be on Iraq, and Republicans, who wanted voters thinking about the broader war against terrorism. Among those responding to the national exit poll, 69% called the war in Iraq either extremely important or very important in determining their vote for their local congressional representative, while 73% said the issue of terrorism was extremely or very important.

There were also signs that Republicans' hopes for a last-minute turn of public opinion in their favor were dashed. In the early exit polls, voters who said they made their choice for House elections in the past three days broke decidedly for Democrats.

While the president wasn't on yesterday's ballots, he was on many voters' minds. Just as the 1994 midterms were an outlet for voters disillusioned with President Clinton and his party controlling Congress, the 2006 election shaped up as a referendum on Mr. Bush and what Democrats derided as "a rubber-stamp Republican Congress." Hanging over everything was public dismay with the deteriorating course of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0091883

Then there's history: Since World War II, the party in control of the White House has lost an average of 31 House seats and six Senate seats in the second midterm election of a president's tenure in office. If history repeats itself tonight, Democrats would take over the House and Senate.

Overall, turnout was reported to be high across the country. From Virginia to Missouri to California, poll workers recorded levels normally seen in a presidential-election year.

Patrick Burns, who works at a nonprofit group in Washington, said neighbors swamped his polling place in Arlington, Va. The state has a hotly contested Senate race. "I've been voting there for 10 years and this was the heaviest I've seen," said Mr. Burns.

Reports of Voting Glitches

Election Day saw complaints of computer glitches, long lines, problematic voter rolls, poll-worker errors and even missing extension cords. But fears that new voting equipment and high turnout might lead to a massive breakdown of the election system seemed, at least initially, to go unrealized.

In DeKalb County, Ga., Latitia Naghise said she attempted to vote for Mark Taylor, the Democratic candidate for governor, but her touch-screen voting machine twice tried to record her as voting for Republican Sonny Perdue.

A polling place in Mills County, Ill., south of Chicago, was ordered by a court to stay open when the election judge didn't show up with the ballots. "I still haven't heard from him," said clerk Nancy Schultz Voots, who said she collected the ballots from his daughter hours later.

Heavy demand for absentee ballots apparently overwhelmed clerks. Voters complained they hadn't received their ballots, prompting an initially unsuccessful legal attempt by some voters in Anne Arundel County, Md., to extend the deadline. Both parties -- and even Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich -- had advised residents to vote absentee out of wariness of new electronic machines.

Republicans complained about voting irregularities and campaign vandalism in about a dozen states throughout the day, an apparent effort to counterbalance complaints from Democrats about election problems. In an interview with conservative radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told listeners that Democrats are "always crying wolf when in fact, if you look historically, they have been the ones that very often have been responsible for the irregularity."

Democrats were particularly concerned about what they regarded as misleading sample ballots being distributed in Maryland that allegedly represented top Republican candidates as Democrats, and suggested they had been endorsed by African-American leaders. Other complaints involved voting problems and Republican tactics in a total of 10 states, including allegedly misleading automated phone calls to voters. In Virginia, the party said the FBI was investigating allegations of voter suppression "stemming from calls directed at keeping voters from voting, or giving them incorrect information on their polling locations."

In other places, high turnout created its own problems. Election officials raced across St. Louis to deliver additional voting machines, as lines grew long and tempers ran short. Missouri is one of this election's key battleground states, and also has questions on the ballot about the contentious embryonic stem-cell issue.

Many of the problems seemed to result from new equipment, identification requirements and voter-registration lists required by the Help America Vote Act. That 2002 law made billions of dollars available to assist states in replacing their punch-card and lever voting machines, assemble statewide voter databases and make other election improvements by this year.

Many states were late meeting the deadlines, though, and about 55 million voters were using new voting equipment this year. In many states, voter databases -- which tell poll workers who is eligible to vote and where -- haven't been cleaned of misspelled names and other simple errors that could keep voters from being able to cast ballots.

The Election Protection Coalition, a group of mostly liberal activist organizations, said it had received 12,300 calls to its complaint line by midafternoon, with complaints from Ohio accounting for more than half. Most calls were "informational," it added, including questions about the location of their polling station.

Public interest focused on the voting machines, and calls to Election Protection and other hotlines pointed to programming glitches and training problems. There were numerous examples of vote "jumping" -- when a vote cast one way on a touch screen registers the other way on a machine's summary page.

Other problems seemed caused by a lack of training or preparation. There were numerous reports of machines that wouldn't work, and poll workers who didn't know how to fix them.

In South Carolina, Republican Gov. Mark Sanford stood in line at his Sullivan's Island precinct, then was turned away because he didn't bring a voter registration card -- unable to vote for himself or anyone else. Eyes red and watery from being exposed to too much light at an event two days earlier, he waited with his four boys while his wife voted, then went to the registration office to get a new card. "I hope my luck turns," Mr. Sanford said. (It did -- Mr. Sanford was re-elected.)

DOJ_NMG_0091884

2006's has been by far the costliest campaign in American history, with more than $1.4 billion spent by candidates, parties and outside interest groups. Much of the money went to television commercials that attacked one candidate or another.

The two political parties spent an estimated $225 million on congressional races: The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent about $64 million in 56 races, while Republicans spent more than $70 million on 52 races.

-- The Journal's Jackie Calmes, Christopher Conkey, Christopher Cooper, Yochi J. Dreazen, Greg Hitt, June Kronholz, John D. McKinnon, Laura Meckler and David Rogers contributed to this article, as did the Associated Press.

Democrats Take Control Of House; Senate Hinges On Race In Virginia (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

Democrats captured control of the House last night for the first time in more than a decade while control of the Senate remains up for grabs.

In early results, Democrats had stripped from Republicans at least 18 seats in the House, with at least nine more Republican seats in danger of takeover. The wins were three more than the 15 needed to win the chamber and set the stage for Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, to become the nation's first female speaker of the House.

"We are on the brink of a great Democratic victory," Mrs. Pelosi said last night.

In the Senate, Democrats captured three Republican seats but still needed to sweep the three seats still in doubt this morning -- Virginia, Missouri and Montana -- to take control.

Control of the Senate may turn on Virginia, where Republican Sen. George Allen stumbled badly and was virtually tied with James H. Webb Jr., a little-known Democrat who had raised hardly any money before Labor Day. In his speech last night, Mr. Allen said "this election continues" and reminisced about his first election victory, won on a recount.

Also, Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill led Republican Sen. Jim Talent by fewer than 1,200 votes, with 74 percent of that state's votes counted.

The Republican losses were the first electoral setback for President Bush since winning the White House six years ago. Both sides said Mr. Bush's low popularity and voter anger over the war in Iraq were the leading contributors to Republican losses.

The biggest giant to fall last night was Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, who is the Republican Conference chairman, his party's No. 3 Senate post. He was felled by state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., the son of a popular former governor.

"This was just a little too steep a mountain to climb but it was not for want of people to help us climb it," said Mr. Santorum, with his tearful family gathered around him, after early returns showed him about 20 percentage points behind.

Mr. Casey's famous name and cautious campaign prevailed over the conservative Mr. Santorum in the reliably Democratic state. Conservative leaders last night mourned the loss of Mr. Santorum as one of their most devoted and effective champions.

Rep. Sherrod Brown, Ohio Democrat, also denied Republican incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine re-election to a third term. Mr. Brown, a seven-term liberal in the House, rode a wave of anti-Republican sentiment in the state to easy victory last night. In Rhode Island, liberal Republican Sen. Lincoln Chaffee was projected to lose to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

The Republicans' best hope for a pickup -- Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in Maryland -- was trailing in a close race. Republicans had dreamed of picking off Democratic held seats in New Jersey and Michigan, as well, but the states returned, respectively, Sens. Robert Menendez and Debbie Stabenow to the Senate.

In the House, Democrats needed to gain 15 seats to win control, which they will do but likely will have a relatively small majority.

Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, the deputy Republican whip who won overwhelming re-election last night, said the race wasn't so much a mandate for Democrats as it was a message to Republicans.

"This is a message from the voters that we really need to step up and reclaim the mantle of reform that propelled us to power 12 years ago," he said, citing the need to return the party to fiscal discipline and honest government.

Asked whether voters could expect a shake-up in House Republican leadership, Mr. Cantor said, "We got to let the dust settle."

Rep. John Hostettler, Indiana Republican, was last night's first casualty, losing a devastating defeat last night to conservative Democrat Brad Ellsworth in his maiden run for Congress. With over half of precincts reporting, Mr. Ellsworth had captured more than 60 percent of the vote. Republican Rep. Chris Chocola lost to lawyer Joe Donnelly.

In Kentucky, Democrat John Yarmuth picked off Republican Rep. Anne M. Northup in a close race. She was seeking her sixth term in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0091885

Republicans appeared to managed to contain fallout from the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley and the sexually explicit Internet messages that he sent to teenage boys he had met through the congressional page program, but in the end could not hold onto Mr. Foley's Florida district. It was narrowly captured by Democrat Tim Mahoney, despite great efforts by Republicans.

Because of state election rules, Mr. Foley's name could not be replaced with the new Republican candidate, Joe Negron. To smooth discomfort of voters having to still cast ballots for Mr. Foley, Republicans began a campaign with signs that read: "Punch Foley for Joe!"

But the only other race that was directly tied to the scandal, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, had pulled far ahead of his opponent in polls going into yesterday's election.

Rep. Deborah Pryce, Ohio Republican who was tied only tangentially to Mr. Foley as his friend, narrowly won re-election.

Republicans were far less successful at easing the damage caused by their association with former casino lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a scandal that earlier this year led to the resignation of Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and landed Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio with a 27-month prison sentence. Democrats captured both of those reliably Republican seats.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, was re-elected to the Senate for a fourth term after losing the Democratic nomination earlier this year to anti-war candidate Ned Lamont.

The Senate also got its first self-described socialist in Rep. Bernard Sanders of Vermont, who was easily elected to the seat being vacated by independent Sen. James M. Jeffords.

Republican operatives in Washington privately lamented last night having spent millions trying to salvage what they termed the year's worst-run campaign. They said that money would have better spent on races in Maryland, Michigan and New Jersey.

Last night also saw the comfortable re-election of several political icons whose campaigns got very little press attention amid the din.

Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, won overwhelming re-elections to their ninth terms. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, also cruised to a second term with ease.

"I voted for change, except for me," the former first lady said, casting her ballot in Chappaqua, N.Y.

Voter turnout nationwide was huge, with election officials from Connecticut to Tennessee saying the number of ballots cast was comparable to the number cast in a presidential election year. But there was no shortage of frustration at polling precincts, many of which were using electronic voting machines for the first time.

In Louisville, Ky., a poll worker was arrested after he was accused of choking a voter and pushing him out the door. In Allentown, Pa., a voter was accused of smashing a touch-screen voting machine with a paperweight. A Madison, Wis., polling site was closed briefly after a bomb threat was called in.

As expected, both sides began calling fouls early in the day yesterday.

In Virginia, the State Board of Elections asked the FBI to investigate a series of complaints about phone calls to Democratic voters that gave them the wrong polling-place information or told them that they couldn't vote. In Michigan, Republican candidate for Senate Mike Bouchard reported that hackers had crashed his campaign Web site, which remained down through the end of the day.

Judges in Indiana and Ohio ordered polling stations that had reported problems to remain open last night to give voters more time to cast ballots.

Republican Blame Game Begins (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

Recriminations flew from every which way against Republican leaders as voters turned out yesterday for the culmination of an election campaign that had President Bush's party on the defensive.

With the party fighting to avert a midterm meltdown, conservatives were critical of Republicans on both ideological and tactical grounds.

"This election is not a defeat for conservatives but for Republicans -- they thought they could desert core conservative principles, become the party of big government and get away with it," said Republican media consultant Craig Shirley.

The Rev. Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberties Commission, said, "Republicans would have been better off with Mr. Bush heading the ticket, as if it were a presidential year, because Southern Baptists and evangelicals don't feel the same frustration toward Mr. Bush as they feel toward Republicans in Congress. They have much more affection for him than for Republicans in the House and the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0091886

Republicans failed to keep the Democrats from "nationalizing" the election, as exit polls indicated that voters considered the Iraq war their top priority. Yet Mr. Land said conservative voters moved toward the Republicans as a result of that "nationalizing" trend.

"Everywhere I've traveled, I've heard evangelicals say, 'The Republicans don't deserve to be re-elected, but we don't deserve to have Nancy Pelosi as speaker or Harry Reid as Senate majority leader either,' " the Baptist spokesman said, referring to the current congressional Democratic leaders.

For many, the election was what Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said he didn't want it to be -- a referendum on Mr. Bush and the Iraq war. Mr. Mehlman had stressed a Republican strategy of emphasizing local candidates and local issues.

"There was general revulsion in the country, particularly among Democrats and independents, against the conduct of the war in Iraq," said pollster John Zogby. "This was, at the grass roots, a referendum against the war and the president. For Republicans, there was significant disappointment about opportunities lost through enormous budget deficits, threats to civil liberties, a failed social agenda, and the war."

The war was a serious drag on Republican prospects, said Charles Gerow, a Pennsylvania-based Republican strategist.

"There aren't many explanations for the Republican's poor showing in the polls around the country other than the war in Iraq," Mr. Gerow said. "The economy is doing well, gas prices are down ... but there's no doubt that there's growing bitterness over the handling of the war -- and the messages that are being used to communicate the administrations position aren't working."

Longtime conservative activist Paul M. Weyrich agreed.

"The war in Iraq had to be what went most wrong for Republicans," said Mr. Weyrich, president of the Free Congress Foundation. "The public didn't like it and blamed the Republican Party for it. A good portion of the disaffected vote was, I think, made up of conservatives. When you add dissatisfaction over the issues of immigration and spending, it was just too much."

Even conservatives with close ties to the White House were critical of the Republican Party's recent performance.

"What went wrong for Republicans? Everything," said American Conservative Union President David A. Keene. "Republicans will blame everyone but themselves, but this will have been a referendum not on the ideas that brought them to power, but on the sorry way in which they've gone about either ignoring or implementing those ideas as well as on their competence, integrity and morals."

Tactical errors on the legislative front abounded, Republican strategists said.

"Our side botched immigration, botched the whole Mark Foley-congressional pages affair," Mr. Shirley said. "The Republicans in Congress became so insulated from the grass roots and understanding how angry it was over the deviation from Republican principles."

Richard A. Viguerie, whose direct-mail operations helped build the modern conservative movement, explained Republican woes by noting that in the 2002 and 2004 elections, Mr. Bush and Republicans were "able to make a nexus between Iraq and the war against terrorism. However, that connection has now been broken, and the American people do not see that Iraq has anything to do with fighting the global war against radical Islam."

Analyzing the party's troubled campaign season, outgoing Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee said, "What went right was a very focused get-out-the-vote effort and what went wrong is that our party went into this election without having rallied around a single message and direction, the way we did under Ronald Reagan. We splintered over the little things and didn't unite over the big things."

GOP Coalition Fractured By Opposition To War (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two years ago, President Bush won re-election and Republicans bolstered their control of Congress courtesy of a coalition that included fiscal conservatives, “values voters” and independents who were worried about terrorism.

In Tuesday's congressional elections, that coalition was fractured by opposition to the war in Iraq, disgust about corruption and unease over the economy. Fueled by dissatisfaction with Bush's leadership by nearly 6 in 10 voters, Democrats scored significant gains in the Senate and won control of the House for the first time since 1994.

Democrats also gained governorships, including in the mega-states of Ohio and New York.

“Remember that song, ‘I feel the earth move under my feet?' ” says Bernadette Budde of BIPAC, a business-oriented political action committee. She likens the midterm elections not to a tidal wave, with floodwaters that recede, but to an earthquake that permanently alters the political landscape.

Officials will find themselves “standing on a tectonic plate,” she says.

DOJ_NMG_0091887

Compared with the last midterm election, in 2002, Republicans lost significant support among independents and suburbanites — prime groups of swing voters that both parties pursue. Young people, voters with college degrees and secular voters also moved decisively to Democrats.

Surveys of voters as they left polling places on Tuesday showed fissures among some groups the Republicans have long counted on and others they are trying to cultivate:

·Hispanics, a group Bush has reached out to since his days as governor of Texas, voted nearly 3-1 for Democrats. In 2004, Republicans won 44% of the votes cast by Hispanics, the nation's fastest-growing ethnic group. GOP candidates received just 29% of their votes Tuesday. That could reflect a reaction to efforts by Republicans, especially in the House, to crack down on illegal immigration. Last month, Bush signed legislation to build a 700-mile-long fence along the U.S.-Mexican border.

·White evangelical Christians remained a bulwark: Seven in 10 voted for Republicans. But the focus on issues important to the Christian Right, including banning same-sex marriage and embryonic stem-cell research, apparently alienated less religious voters. Those who attend church only occasionally moved to the Democrats by 9 points, compared with 2004. Those who never attend church moved away from the GOP by 11 points.

·White men's support was crucial in the Republican sweep of Congress in 1994. Their margin for Republicans was cut in half, to 8 points, compared to 2002. “They see themselves squeezed in this economy,” Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg says of many white men and other voters who began shifting to the GOP in 1980. “They're ambitious and they work hard for their families, but they're watching jobs with fewer assured benefits, and there's great resentment about rising health-care costs and energy costs. And all of this comes together with the war.”

The election returns transformed the political landscape in Washington from one in which Republicans for most of the past six years have held all the levers of power.

After the worst setback on Capitol Hill for Republicans since the Watergate debacle in 1974, the White House presumably will be forced to revamp its legislative strategy and learn to deal with a Democratic speaker, expected to be Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California. Bush is likely to face investigations into the lead-up to the Iraq war and Iraq's reconstruction. In the Senate, resistance to conservative judicial nominations presumably will stiffen. The pressure to alter course in Iraq will surely intensify.

In the GOP, recriminations began even before the polls opened.

“There's going to be a lot of folks in the party who are going to want an assessment of who we are … and what our priorities are,” says Dick Armey, a former House majority leader and architect of the GOP's 1994 takeover of Congress. Armey and James Dobson have sparred publicly in recent days over whether the GOP's woes are due in part to excessive influence by Christian conservative groups like Dobson's Denver-based Focus on the Family.

Republican members of Congress are likely to delay the election of their congressional leaders, scheduled for Nov. 15, to give them time to consider what to do.

Corruption was the top-ranked issue: 41% called it “extremely important.” Six in 10 of those voters favored Democrats. Republicans lost the Florida district that had been represented by Mark Foley, who resigned in the wake of the congressional-page scandal. In Pennsylvania, Rep. Don Sherwood, accused by his mistress of trying to strangle her, lost, too.

Terrorism, rated “extremely important” by 39%, worked to Republicans' advantage, but by just 7 points — not the slam-dunk that the White House envisioned. Bush repeatedly argued during the campaign that Democrats couldn't be trusted to keep the nation safe. On Tuesday, 29% of voters said that Republicans alone could protect the country from terrorism — only somewhat more than the 22% who said only the Democrats could.

In the end, views on the Iraq war did the most to determine how people voted. Eight in 10 of those who opposed the war voted for Democrats; eight in 10 of those who supported the war voted for Republicans.

“It was like that old Charlie Brown cartoon, with Pig Pen” shadowed by a cloud of dust, says Frank Fahrenkopf, former Republican national chairman. With the war, “every Republican had that black cloud over him regardless of what they did. It was pretty tough to get out from under that.”

A majority of voters surveyed said the United States should withdraw all or some of its troops from Iraq now. By 24 points, they said the war hadn't improved the long-term security of the United States.

And the economy?

The pocketbook issues that often shape elections were trumped by concern about the war. Two years ago, voters with a positive view of the economy heavily favored Republicans. This time, voters who thought the economy was good but opposed the war voted by nearly 2-1 for Democrats.

“There's no doubt that Iraq is a big piece of why people want change,” says Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. “The economy is also there. How Congress works is there. But Iraq is your first piece of evidence in the case you make for change.”

DOJ_NMG_0091888

Despite some evidence in the USA TODAY/Gallup Poll and others that the gap Republicans faced was narrowing in the campaign's final days, the exit polls dispute that. Voters who decided whom to support in the last three days favored Democrats by 16 points.

For Democrats, gains on election night offer the opportunity to forge an electoral majority that would hold together through more than one election — but no guarantees.

For one thing, Democrats won in some congressional districts that were designed to be predominantly Republican. The GOP can "really go back very hard at those seats and cherry-pick them all back" in two years, vows Ken Khachigian, a Republican strategist in California.

For another, much of the electorate was driven to the Democrats by opposition to Bush, who will be on his way home to Texas after the 2008 election. More than a third of voters said they cast ballots to express their opposition to the president. Just one in five said they cast them to support him.

Some Republicans argue that weariness over the war and Bush, not some underlying weakness in the GOP coalition, darkened the party's prospects this year.

"This is sort of 2006-specific; it's sort of Iraq-specific," says Khachigian, a onetime adviser to President Reagan. "There's no question the guy's in a rough patch and it mainly revolves around the war," he says of Bush. But he argues that the party's underlying message and voter alliance are intact.

Bush, an asset for congressional candidates four years ago, was a liability for many this time. His approval rating was 42% in the exit polls. That's 10 percentage points lower than on Election Day in 2004 and 24 points lower than in 2002.

Still, some Republicans see strains in the party coalition that go beyond Bush. Ryan Sager, author of The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians and the Battle to Control the Republican Party, published in August, sees a growing clash between Southern social conservatives who care most about moral values and Western libertarians who want a small government that leaves them alone.

Eroding support for Republican candidates in the West forced Bush and Vice President Cheney to stump in states including Montana, Colorado and Idaho. Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana was one of the nation's most vulnerable Republican incumbents. Democrat Bill Ritter won the governorship in Colorado, and races in Nevada and Idaho, where Republican candidates once were favored, went down to the wire.

"This could mark the beginning of the end" of the Reagan coalition, Sager says. "If Republicans are handed a pretty big loss on Tuesday, they're going to have to decide whether to get their act together and work things out, to use that marriage metaphor."

"The strains in the Republican Party I would say are definitely showing," says John Mark Hansen, a political scientist at the University of Chicago. He likens it to the fraying of the New Deal coalition that became apparent in the 1960s.

Some Democrats hope the Iraq war will define the parties for years, just as the GOP's faltering response to the Great Depression tainted it for a generation and President Johnson's Great Society branded Democrats as the party of big social programs and civil rights.

During the 2004 election, 35.5% of those surveyed in Gallup polls identified themselves as Republicans. Since then, that proportion has dropped to 30.2%, a decline of more than 5 percentage points.

The proportion of Americans who call themselves Democrats has grown from 34.2% in 2004 to 36.3% now, a gain of more than 2 points. Independents, just 29.5% of the electorate in 2004, have now surpassed the GOP share, at 33.4% — an increase of nearly 4 points.

So far, though, the Democratic Party's favorable rating hasn't exactly soared. It is 52%, below its standing through the 1990s. Even Comedy Central's left-leaning The Daily Show with Jon Stewart mocked the Democratic message to voters this year as a 30-second TV ad that consisted of a blank screen with sounds of birds trilling in the background.

"To say the election is an affirmation of them instead of a rejection of Republicans would be a stretch for me," scoffs former Republican national chairman Rich Bond. "They just happen to be standing there when it happened."

William Galston, a former White House adviser to President Clinton, agrees. "Right now the American people see one party which has an agenda they believe doesn't work, and one party which they believe doesn't have an agenda."

Democratic congressional leaders insist that they have outlined specifics. A "Six for '06" platform includes raising the minimum wage, lowering interest rates on student loans and expanding research using embryonic stem-cell research. It promises a "new direction" and "redeployment" in Iraq without many specifics.

This election "is quite properly a referendum election on Bush and not a referendum on Democrats," says Matt Bennett of centrist Third Way. He says the voters' marching orders are an "open question," more of a demand for a new direction than a specific platform. "The mandate is, 'Do something different, for God's sake,' " he says.

DOJ_NMG_0091889

Democrats Wrest Control Of The House (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Democratic Party wrested control of the House from the Republicans in today's congressional elections and were within reach of taking the Senate as well.

The Democrats won more than the net 15 seats they needed by winning 25 seats now held by the Republicans and losing none of their own. They left the political landscape littered with 17 defeated Republican incumbents and captured eight more seats held by retiring Republicans.

The Senate posed a much greater challenge to the Democrats

Just about every close race had to fall the Democrats' way if they were to gain the six seats they needed to take control. They rolled half way to their goal by knocking off incumbent Republicans in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, and they needed to win three of the three undecided races in Missouri, Montana and Virginia.

Making the Democratic takeover possible was the fact that the Republicans could not take a single Democratic-held Senate seat. In the toughest races, incumbent Robert Menendez fended off a stiff challenge and Maryland's Ben Cardin won a closely contested race in a seat held by a retiring Democrat.

"There's a wind of change blowing out there," said an exuberant Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who was within shouting distance of becoming the majority leader.

A Democratic takeover of either chamber would complicate President Bush's final two years in the White House. The Congress that will go out of business shortly after the first of the year was recalcitrant enough, forcing Bush to veto his first bill, authorizing embryonic stem cell research, and enacting few of his top-priority legislative requests. A Democratic Congress that took office in January might not be able to accomplish much legislatively over his veto, but it could block Bush's agenda and conduct public investigations of controversial administration policies from the war in Iraq to alleged corruption in the No Child Left Behind program.

Not since the Republican landslide of 1994 have the Democrats controlled the House. It was then that Rep. Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who since made a scandal-ridden exit from Congress, engineered one of the great landslides of recent decades. Republicans gained 53 seats in the House, defeating 34 Democratic incumbents in the process.

Republicans also gained control of the Senate that year by picking up eight seats. Since then, Democrats twice regained control of the Senate, although Republicans have enjoyed a majority since 2003.

This election is six years into Bush's presidency; the last big Democratic win in congressional elections was in 1986, a comparable juncture in Ronald Reagan's administration. Democrats won control of the Senate by picking up eight seats. They added only five House seats, although they already had a huge majority of 253 seats to the Republicans' 182.

As the polls close sequentially from east to west, vote counts will reveal whether the Democrats will control zero, one or two chambers in the next Congress.

Democrats Take House (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

Democrats recaptured the House last night, defeating Republican incumbents in every region of the country, and were close to gaining control of the Senate in midterm elections dominated by war, scandal and President Bush's leadership.

By early this morning, Democrats had picked up more than two dozen Republican-held House seats without losing any of their own, putting Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) into position to become the nation's first female speaker.

In an increasingly tense battle for control of the Senate, Democrats won seats in Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island. Virginia and Montana remained undecided, but Democrats were leading in those states, both needed to win power.

In Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) trailed former Navy secretary James Webb by fewer than 7,800 votes. In Montana, Sen. Conrad Burns (R) was running about 10,000 votes behind state Senate President Jon Tester.

Democrats also scored heavily in gubernatorial races, picking up at least seven states to claim a majority nationally.

The upheaval in the House and the changing balance in the Senate signaled a dramatic power shift in Washington that will alter the final two years of Bush's presidency, with resurgent Democrats expected to challenge the administration on its domestic priorities and the Iraq war.

Pelosi joined other Democratic leaders at a boisterous rally just after midnight and sounded themes that others in her party echoed throughout the night.

DOJ_NMG_0091890

"Today the American people voted for change and they voted for Democrats to take our country in a new direction, and that is exactly what we intend to do," she said. "The American people voted for a new direction to restore civility and bipartisanship in Washington, D.C., and Democrats promise to work together in a bipartisan way for all Americans."

Bush remained at the White House and will speak to reporters at a news conference at 1 p.m. today. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) won reelection but acknowledged the inevitable when he told supporters in Illinois, "It's kind of tough out there."

Republicans lost almost regardless of their ideology or support for the president. Conservative Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the most vulnerable incumbent throughout the year, was the first senator to fall, losing to state Treasurer Robert P. Casey Jr. Not long after, Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine (R), known for working across party lines, fell to Rep. Sherrod Brown after being caught up in the undertow of state GOP scandals, economic woes and the impact of the Iraq war on Buckeye State voters.

Then came Rhode Island, where Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee, the son of a beloved former senator and one of the most liberal Republicans in Washington, lost to former attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse in a state where Bush's popularity is among the lowest in the nation.

Early this morning, Missouri state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) defeated Sen. James M. Talent in one of the year's closest races.

But in Tennessee, Republicans claimed one of the other premier races when former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker (R) defeated Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. in the election to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R).

In one of the most-watched Senate races, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, who lost the Democratic primary to businessman Ned Lamont because of his support for the war and the president, turned the tables and easily won reelection.

In New York, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) rolled up a big margin as she cruised to a reelection victory that is widely seen as a step toward a presidential campaign in 2008.

In New Jersey, appointed Sen. Robert Menendez (D) overcame a challenge from state Sen. Thomas H. Kean Jr., robbing Republicans of a seat that not long ago they thought they may be able to win. In Minnesota, a newcomer, Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar, held on to the seat of a retiring Democratic senator. In Maryland, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D) was the winner over Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in the contest to succeed retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D).

In Massachusetts, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) won an eighth term. Democrats also held Senate seats in Delaware, Florida, Hawaii, Michigan, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Washington, West Virginia and Wisconsin. In Vermont, Rep. Bernard Sanders (I) won the seat of retiring Independent Sen. James M. Jeffords.

Republicans held on to their Senate seats in Arizona, Indiana, Maine, Mississippi, Texas, Utah and Wyoming.

House results trickled in at first and then came in a torrent. Some of the most prominent Republicans were among the losers last night.

One was Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.), who won her first race in 1982 when Republicans were losing two dozen districts. She lost to state Sen. Chris Murphy. In Kentucky, Rep. Anne M. Northup has been targeted by Democrats in virtually every election but until last night was a survivor. She was defeated by John Yarmuth, editor of an alternative newspaper.

In Iowa, Rep. Jim Leach (R), who was not considered particularly vulnerable, lost to Dave Loebsack in a district that Sen. John F. Kerry won in the 2004 presidential election.

In Florida, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., one of the most powerful Republicans in the House, lost his reelection bid to state Sen. Ron Klein. Republicans also lost the seat of former congressman Mark Foley (R), who resigned in disgrace over sexually explicit Internet messages sent to a former House page.

In Arizona, Rep. J.D. Hayworth, one of the GOP's most vocal and visible conservatives and a hard-liner on immigration, lost his reelection bid to former state senator Harry Mitchell. The Arizona Republic newspaper had endorsed Mitchell, referring to Hayworth as a "bully."

Republicans lost the scandal-scarred seats of former congressman Robert W. Ney in Ohio and former House majority leader Tom DeLay in Texas. Scandal also contributed to the defeat of two Pennsylvania incumbents, Rep. Curt Weldon (R), who lost to retired Navy Vice Adm. Joseph Sestak, and Rep. Don Sherwood (R), who fell to Christopher Carney.

The Northeast proved particularly difficult for Republicans. New Hampshire voters defeated both of their GOP incumbents. Only a few weeks ago, Reps. Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley appeared headed for reelection, but their races changed almost overnight. Bass was defeated by lawyer Paul Hodes, while Bradley lost to Carol Shea-Porter, a county chairman. She won a second straight upset last night after riding opposition to the war to a surprise primary victory.

In gubernatorial races, Democrats gained seven states and now control a majority nationwide. Big prizes included New York, where Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer won handily against weak opposition, and Ohio, where Rep. Ted Strickland swamped Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell. In Massachusetts, Clinton administration assistant attorney general Deval Patrick defeated Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, who was attempting to succeed Gov. Mitt Romney (R).

DOJ_NMG_0091891

Republicans had controlled all three states for more than a decade.

Democrats picked up a Southern seat when Arkansas Attorney General Mike Beebe defeated Asa Hutchinson for the post of retiring Gov. Mike Huckabee (R). They also added to their impressive strength among governors in the Rocky Mountains when Denver prosecutor Bill Ritter defeated Rep. Bob Beauprez in Colorado.

The gubernatorial contest in Minnesota remained undecided early this morning.

A national exit poll of voters in House races, conducted by Edison/Mitofsky for the National Election Pool, showed Democrats carrying independent voters, who emerged this fall as a critically important constituency in the midterm elections, by a wide margin. Meanwhile, about 90 percent of Republicans and Democrats were supporting candidates from their own parties, but independents were siding decisively with Democrats.

The divides that have defined the nation's politics over the past two years shaped yesterday's vote, but those hostile to the Bush administration, unhappy with Congress or pessimistic about the direction of the country far outnumbered those who approve of the performance of Bush and Congress or who think the country is heading in the right direction.

Four in five voters who approve of Bush's performance were supporting Republicans in House races, while an equal number of those who disapprove of his performance were supporting Democrats. But those who disapprove of the way the president has handled his job outnumber those who approve by about three to two.

Voters cited a series of issues that were extremely important in determining their candidate preferences, according to the national exit poll. They were not asked the most important issue affecting their votes.

About four in 10 voters called corruption and scandals in government an important issue and said they were voting heavily for Democratic candidates in the House. Forty percent said that the issue of terrorism was extremely important in their vote and that they were narrowly supporting Republican House candidates.

About four in 10 also cited the economy and said they were backing Democratic House candidates by a wide margin. Iraq, which has dominated much of the fall debate, was another issue that about four in 10 called extremely important in their votes, and they were also heavily backing Democrats.

Immigration reform was an issue that Republicans counted on to help their candidates. The three in 10 who called immigration reform extremely important in determining their votes split in favor of GOP House candidates, but not by as much as Republicans may have hoped. The strongest support for Republican House candidates was from those who cited values issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage.

Bush voted yesterday morning in Crawford, Tex., then flew back to Washington for a dinner with friends and aides. The group included first lady Laura Bush, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, top strategist Karl Rove, counselor Dan Bartlett, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans and Bush friend Brad Freeman. After dinner, they watched election results come in upstairs in the White House residence.

The history of midterm elections put Republicans on the defensive from the start of the campaigns. The sixth year of two-term presidencies often has produced sizable losses and shifts in power in the House or Senate for the party controlling the White House. That was true in 1958, 1974 and 1986.

Dissatisfaction with the war and the administration compounded GOP worries, turning the campaign into a referendum on the president and his Iraq policies.

Bush's ratings began to slump more than a year ago and attitudes hardened after the administration's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina in August 2005. By May of this year, the president's approval rating had plunged to 33 percent in a Washington Post-ABC News poll. Bush has struggled since to break 40 percent, and in the Post-ABC final preelection survey, his approval rating was 40 percent among all Americans and 43 percent among registered voters.

Even those numbers, however, were low by historical standards on the eve of midterm elections. Presidents hovering in the mid-40s or below at that point have seen their parties suffer major setbacks. That was the case for Bill Clinton in 1994, Ronald Reagan in 1982, Lyndon B. Johnson in 1966, and Harry S. Truman in 1946 and 1950. Jimmy Carter had an approval rating of 49 percent in 1978 and Democrats lost 15 House seats that year -- precisely the number Democrats needed to gain yesterday to win the House.

At the beginning of September, Bush sought to shift the focus from Iraq to the campaign against terrorism. He used the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks to elevate his argument and throughout the campaign portrayed Democrats as weak on fighting terrorism. Most polls, however, showed the public far more focused on Iraq than on terrorism and until the very end expressed greater confidence in Democrats to deal with Iraq.

Unhappiness with the Republican-controlled Congress also contributed to the party's woes throughout most of the fall, with the 109th Congress recording some of the lowest approval ratings of any Congress in a decade.

Staff writer Lyndsey Layton, political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb and staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0091892

Vote Seen As A Poll On Bush (MINNST)

By Steven Thomma

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 8, 2006

CONTROL110806

Last update: November 08, 2006 – 12:39 AM Vote seen as a poll on Bush

Steven Thomma, McClatchy News Service WASHINGTON - Democrats captured a coveted Senate seat in Pennsylvania on Tuesday, an early landmark victory in their bid to regain power in the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives.

Democrat Bob Casey was declared the winner over Republican Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, a one-time conservative icon who'd hoped to run for the presidency.

Next door in Ohio, Republican Sen. Mike DeWine lost to U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown, a Democrat.

Democrats also held on to one of their most-endangered Senate seats, as Sen. Bob Menendez of New Jersey fought off allegations of corruption and defeated Republican Tom Kean, the son of a popular former governor.

In another sign of trouble for Republicans, this one in the House, Democrat Brad Ellsworth defeated Republican Rep. John Hostettler in a solidly Republican district in Indiana. Hostettler was a leader among the social conservatives who came to power in the Republican takeover of the House in 1994.

In yet another striking gain, the Democrats won the governor's office in Ohio for the first time in 20 years. U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland defeated Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell to seize the governor's office being vacated by Republican Gov. Bob Taft.

The Ohio statehouse was a coveted prize in a state that could be as important to the 2008 presidential campaign as it was when it put George W. Bush over the top for a second term in 2004.

Early results also showed a razor's-edge election for a pivotal Senate seat in Virginia, where incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen fought both allegations of racism and a tough challenge from Democrat James Webb, who was Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary and who based his campaign on opposition to the war in Iraq.

At stake onTuesday:

· All 435 seats in the U.S. House, where Democrats needed to gain 15 seats to take control for the first time since 1994.

· Thirty-three seats in the Senate, where Democrats needed to gain six to take control for the first time since 2002.

· Thirty-six governors' offices, where Republicans entered the election with a 22-14 edge, including control of the four largest states -- California, Florida, New York and Texas -- plus Ohio.

Voting problems were reported at scattered sites around the country, as millions faced new voting machines bought to alleviate problems such as those that turned the 2000 presidential election in Florida into a mess.

Extra eyes at the polls

The Department of Justice had 850 poll watchers in 22 states looking for signs of discrimination or other efforts to interfere with voting.

The two major political parties also had attorneys and poll watchers around the country. The AFL-CIO sent poll watchers to Michigan, Missouri, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Washington.

Republicans warned of the threat of vote fraud throughout the day, citing reports of double voting and the loss of computer activation cards in Tennessee. They also cited fraudulent registration cards filed in Colorado, Missouri, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Republican-friendly talk radio echoed the complaints.

"There have been some reports about attempted voter fraud, and certainly we hope any and all voter fraud in any way is detected and dealt with before Election Day," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Democrats started the day warning of problems, then backed off as the day went on.

President Bush watched the returns in the second-floor residence of the White House with longtime friend Brad Freeman and political aide Karl Rove.

In a footnote to the Bush presidency, Tuesday's elections defeated the two state secretaries of state who oversaw controversial election decisions that helped Bush: Ohio's Blackwell, whose rulings benefited Bush in 2004, and former Florida Secretary of State Katherine Harris, whose actions helped Bush in 2000.

Harris was defeated in a bid for a U.S. Senate seat from Florida.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., also watched the returns from Washington, where she awaited both the fate of her party and the birth of a grandchild. Pelosi would become the first female speaker of the House if Democrats win the House and second in line of succession to the presidency, behind Vice President Dick Cheney.

In many ways, Tuesday's voting was a referendum on Bush, an unpopular president leading an unpopular war.

DOJ_NMG_0091893

He entered the final weekend of campaigning with an approval rating of 38 percent in the Gallup Poll, the lowest since Harry Truman had an approval rating of 36 percent in the fall of 1950. Truman's Democratic Party went on to lose the presidency two years later.

The Iraq war dominated this year's political landscape, despite Bush's early attempts to change the subject to the broader -- and more politically popular -- war on terror.

About six in 10 voters said Tuesday that they didn't like the way Bush was doing his job. A similar percentage said they opposed the war, according to exit polls conducted by the television networks and the Associated Press.

Democrats didn't offer a clear alternative policy on Iraq, gambling that voters were sufficiently unhappy with the Republicans who started the war and have managed it since.

Stiff-arming the president

If Democrats ran against Bush this year, many Republicans ran away from him.

Candidates such as DeWine stressed their independence rather than their loyalty to party or president.

And in one stark example that angered the White House on Monday, Bush flew to Florida to campaign specifically for Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist -- only to find that Crist had left town to campaign by himself somewhere else.

Scandals also hurt Republicans: first, the tales of payoffs from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, then the still-evolving story of House Republican leaders not stopping former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida from sending inappropriate messages to teenage pages working in the House.

About three out of four voters said Tuesday that scandals influenced how they voted -- and that the news pushed them toward the Democrats.

Republicans had braced for losses for months. It's normal for a president's party to lose seats in the sixth year of a two-term presidency.

Over the last 100 years, the president's party has lost an average of 32 seats in the House and five in the Senate in such sixth-year elections.

Webb Has A Slim Edge Over Allen, But Recount Likely (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

Democratic challenger James Webb held a slim lead over Republican Sen. George Allen early today in Virginia's U.S. Senate race, a dramatic and nasty battle that almost certainly will be decided by a recount next month.

With more than 99 percent of the votes tallied by about 2 a.m. today, Webb claimed victory with a lead of about 7,800 votes among the more than 2.3 million cast -- a difference of three-tenths of a percent. Some absentee ballots in Loudoun County, Richmond and Virginia Beach were still being counted in the early morning.

Meanwhile, Virginia voters overwhelmingly approved a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and civil unions and returned all the state's incumbents to the U.S. House. Republicans won in two local elections in Prince William County.

Webb captured a huge amount of support in Northern Virginia, while Allen was beating him across large swaths of the rest of the state. Those differences confirmed a widening gulf between voters in the Washington suburbs and the rest of the state, which also drove approval of the same-sex marriage amendment over Northern Virginia's opposition.

Shortly after 1 a.m. today, after he took the lead in the count, Webb told supporters at a Tysons Corner hotel: "I'd also like to say the votes are in, and we won. This is a great moment for all of us."

But Allen did not show signs of giving up. In Richmond, Allen emerged after midnight to tell his supporters to "Stay strong for freedom . . . and accuracy in elections will prevail." He said he would call on them in the days ahead.

"This has been an interesting election, and the election continues," he said.

When Webb claimed victory, he did it as a Marine. He came into the Vienna hotel ballroom accompanied by his brother Gary playing the bagpipes, and about a dozen of his Marine buddies emerged from behind the stage. He stood at attention, ramrod straight, as they filed in.

The nail-biter left the candidates in limbo as their campaign advisers began to talk about a recount, which could consume Virginia for weeks and raise doubts about which party will control the U.S. Senate. A recount would seem a fittingly dramatic end to a campaign that was filled with scandals, personal revelations and racial accusations.

"I guess I know how I'll be spending my Thanksgiving and Christmas vacations," joked Jean Jensen, the secretary of the State Board of Elections, who a year ago oversaw a recount that awarded the state attorney general's job to the Republican candidate, Bob McDonnell, who had a 360-vote edge. Gov. Timothy D. Kaine (D) controls the Board of Elections.

DOJ_NMG_0091894

Under Virginia law, a margin of less than a half-percent can trigger a recount which the state pays for. A losing candidate can also request -- and pay for -- a recount if the margin is less than 1 percent. As of early Wednesday, the state-financed recount seemed all but certain.

A recount would not officially start until the state board of elections certifies the election-day results, which is scheduled to happen on the fourth Monday in November. Results of a recount may not come until December.

Webb jumped into the lead early, but by 10 p.m., Allen claimed a tiny advantage. As the night stretched on, the margin between the two widened and shrunk, adding to the drama. Then, around midnight, Webb jumped into the lead, after some absentee ballots were counted in Fairfax County.

An independent candidate, Gail Parker, claimed about 25,000 votes, or a little more than 1 percent. Parker, who campaigned as an Independent Green candidate, spent almost no money on her campaign and made increasing support for building mass transit the exclusive issue of her campaign. Analysts said it was unclear whose votes her presence might have affected more.

Despite steady rain in many parts of the state, election officials said turnout across Virginia was high and could end up rivaling participation usually seen during presidential contests. Nearly half of the state's 4.5 million registered voters cast ballots.

Webb appeared to be doing well among women, African Americans and independents, according to exit polls. Allen had a significant lead among white voters, religious voters and veterans.

In other state elections, 13-term Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R) fought off a well-funded challenge by Democratic health care expert Judy Feder in the 10th Congressional District of Northern Virginia. Feder had raised more money than Wolf and made his support of President Bush an issue.

U.S. Representatives Thomas M. Davis III (R) and James P. Moran (D) were easily reelected. In Virginia Beach, Democratic challenger Phil Kellam was leading in a close race against freshman Republican Rep. Thelma D. Drake in a nationally watched contest.

In Prince William, Republican Corey A. Stewart beat Democrat Sharon E. Pandak in the race for chairman of the Board of County Supervisors. And in Manassas, Republican Jackson H. Miller beat Democrat Jeanette M. Rishell for the House seat held by the late Harry Parrish (R).

Chris Zimmerman (D) was reelected Arlington County Board chairman.

For Allen, 54, a win would represent a stunning recovery. Six months ago, he was actively exploring a bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But his Senate reelection campaign faltered after he called a Webb volunteer of Indian American descent a "macaca," which is a slur in some cultures.

Webb, 60, is a former Marine and first-time candidate who rarely seemed at ease on the campaign trail. In his campaign, Webb vowed to change the debate surrounding the Iraq war, which he opposed.

Voters yesterday expressed anger over President Bush's policies, especially in Iraq, with 52 percent saying they don't like the war and 53 percent disapproving of the job Bush is doing, according to the poll of 1,986 Virginia voters conducted by Edison Media Research and Mitofsky International. The responses suggested that Allen's staunch support for the president cost him some votes.

"Two words," said Mark Early, 46, an independent from Arlington County, explaining his vote for Webb. " 'Neuter Bush.' With a Democratic Congress, the best we can do is limit the damage."

A majority of voters said they believe that Allen respects racial minorities despite accusations that he used racial slurs. But some voters also said they were turned off by Allen's macaca comment.

"That pretty much did it for me," said Sheryl Mason, 42, of Prince William, who voted for Webb. "You kind of think that if he makes that kind of slip-up . . . what's he been saying in private?"

But Allen was apparently successful in convincing voters that their taxes would go up if Webb was elected to the Senate. Almost two-thirds of voters questioned in the exit polls who said taxes were an extremely important issue said they voted for Allen.

"I really don't want my taxes raised," said Anne Harrell, 39, who voted for Allen in her Annandale precinct. "It's the money that's driving me."

When Allen formally announced his reelection bid in April, the biggest challenge appeared to be how to balance his Senate campaign with his presidential ambitions. Allen, who had just returned from speeches in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, declined to say whether he would serve a full six-year term if he were reelected.

"When we get to the future, I'll determine the future," he told reporters that day.

At the time, Webb was locked in a bitter primary with Fairfax lobbyist Harris Miller, a favorite among the Democratic Party establishment. But Webb's campaign was already focused on Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0091895

"We'd like to think this seat in the Senate means more than a place holder for George Allen," Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said then.

Webb beat Miller in June, but heading into the summer, he trailed Allen by 16 percentage points in one poll. Worse for Webb, his campaign was virtually broke, and he had little patience for the hard work of fundraising. With no experience in politics, Webb appeared stiff on the stump. Democrats said privately that they doubted their candidate could win.

"If you had asked anybody about this election on Aug. 10, they would have told you it was effectively over," said Robert D. Holsworth, director of the Center for Public Policy at Virginia Commonwealth University.

But everything changed Aug. 11, when Allen mocked the Indian American Webb volunteer, who was shooting video of Allen at a campaign stop in Breaks, Va., a rural town near the Kentucky border.

The videotape sped across the country on the video-sharing site YouTube, creating negative headlines for more than a week. Indian American groups called Allen a bully, and he became fodder for late-night comedians.

The macaca incident raised fresh questions about Allen's racial sensitivity, an issue that has dogged him since the beginning of his political career. News organizations began probing anew his fondness for the Confederate flag while serving as governor.

The fallout from the macaca incident knocked Allen and his campaign off stride for weeks. He hit back, helping organize a news conference with several female U.S. Naval Academy graduates who said a 1979 magazine article by Webb had contributed to an atmosphere of men harassing women at Annapolis.

But even with headlines about Webb's article, which said a dormitory at the academy was "a horny woman's dream," Allen's lead had been whittled to four points by early September, which meant the race was a virtual dead heat.

Just as he appeared to be recovering, Allen made another headline-producing gaffe at a debate Sept. 19 in Fairfax County. Asked by a television reporter about reports that his mother was Jewish, Allen replied angrily, chiding the reporter for "making aspersions" about his religious background.

The next week, Allen was hit with accusations from former college football teammates and other past acquaintances who said they recalled him using the "n-word" during and after college. Allen denied it, but other accusations continued to surface for more than a week. A poll at the end of September showed the race tied, with each at 43 percent.

The Allen controversies and the tightening poll numbers gave Democrats hope, and money began pouring into Webb's campaign. The day after a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" Sept. 17, Webb raised $100,000 in online contributions. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee began pouring money into Webb's campaign, which eventually topped $6 million.

By October, both candidates and their national-party backers were in attack mode, airing tough ads on television and radio.

Late in the month, the Allen campaign leaked accusations about sexually explicit passages in Webb's novels to the Drudge Report, an Internet gossip site, and the Fox News Channel.

Allen's attacks on Webb's attitudes toward women took a toll. Polls in mid-October showed Allen with a slight lead and Webb's support among women below that of previous Democrats in Virginia.

But the Oct. 27 attack on Webb's novels seemed to backfire, as several polls taken just afterward indicated momentum for Webb.

By yesterday, the Virginia Senate race had become one of the most closely watched in the nation, as Allen struggled in the campaign's final days to overcome a politically devastating summer.

But longtime political observers in Virginia said Allen's long history in the state and especially his term as a popular governor made the contest a difficult one to predict.

"George Allen stood a 50-50 chance of being the Republican nominee for president," Holsworth said. "Less than three months later, he [stood] a 50-50 chance of retaining his own seat. It's been simply astonishing to watch."

Allen, Webb In Tight Finish (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

RICHMOND -- Republican Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. were locked in a razor-thin race in Virginia last night as the nation watched to see whether the contest would change which party controls the Senate.

The race was too close to call and seemed to be headed for a recount. Mr. Webb, a Vietnam War veteran who served as President Reagan's Navy secretary, held a lead of 7,815 votes as of 2:30 a.m., and declared victory before several hundred supporters.

All but 9 of 2,443 precincts had been counted. "I would like to say the votes are in and we won," the former Marine said with a huge smile. "This is a great moment for all of us that believe in an inclusive society and all of us that believe we need to bring true economic fairness back to economic system."

DOJ_NMG_0091896

Mr. Allen had no plans to concede, and reminded supporters gathered for him here in Richmond that he has won close elections before.

"The first time I ever won an election ... it was 18 votes. We had to have a recount," Mr. Allen said, to huge cheers from those who were still left in the room at about 12:30 a.m.

"So, the point of the matter is, we're still counting votes." In that 1983 race for a House of Delegates seat, Mr. Allen ultimately won by less than 30 votes.

He later went on to be a member of Congress and governor, and then unseated Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

"I know the counting will continue through the night, it will continue tomorrow," he said. "I know you are going to be like a bunch of eagles and hawks watching how everyone one of these votes are accurately counted."

It will take weeks before the results are certified, and the margin is highly likely to change as volunteers canvas the tallies and triple check their math in each precinct.

After that, the loser can request a recount if the margin remains less than 1 percent. Secretary of State Jean Jensen, a nonpartisan official who works under Democratic Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, will be in the spotlight tomorrow to explain the process.

Independent Gail Parker, who said Monday that she supports Mr. Webb, received 25,604 votes, or 1.11 percent.

Voters also approved a state constitutional amendment that defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The amendment passed 58 percent to 42 percent, with 2,380 of 2,443 precincts reporting.

Webb's Margin Grows (RTD)

By Tyler Whitley

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 8, 2006

Democrat Jim Webb leads George Allen in a Senate race that appears headed to a recount, but his margin grew as more returns were tallied early this morning.

Allen led for most of the night, but late returns from Prince William County moved Webb in front, at first narrowly.

Out of more than 2.3 million votes cast, Webb led by about 7,500 votes, compared with a lead of less than 2,000 earlier in the morning, according to unofficial returns compiled by The Associated Press, with 2,407 of 2,411 precincts reporting.

It was not immediately clear how many absentee ballots remained to be counted across the state; the GOP mounted a strong effort in that area.

Virginia law allows a recount if a candidate's margin of loss comes within one percentage point or less of the total vote cast.

Still, Webb was confident of victory.

"The votes are in, and we've won," Webb told revelers shortly after 1 a.m. at a celebration in Vienna.

"The point of the matter is, I've been through it," Allen said about 12:30 a.m. when he spoke at his campaign celebration in Richmond. "I know the counting will continue through the night. It will continue tomorrow."

The outcome could decide which party will control the Senate when it convenes next year.

Webb went on television about 11 p.m. to say he thought he would win when all the votes were tallied.

"It's going to take awhile. But at some point very soon, I think we're going to be on top," Webb told a cheering audience at the campaign celebration. in Vienna shortly after 11 p.m. He appeared with his wife, Hong Le Webb, former Gov. Mark R. Warner and Gov. Timothy M. Kaine; he held hands aloft with the governors as if poised for victory.

"When we look where the votes are that have yet to be counted, it looks very, very good for our side," he said. "I've been in a lot of fights in my life. This is nothing new."

Allen easily won rural and suburban areas, while Webb won big in vote-rich Northern Virginia.

Glenda Gail Parker of Alexandria, running as an Independent Green Party candidate, was picking up 1 percent of the vote.

The race had national implications because Allen needed to keep his seat for the Republicans to retain a majority in the U.S. Senate.

Allen, 54, was seeking re-election to a second six-year term. Webb, 60, was making his first run for elective office.

A supposed shoo-in when the race began, Allen saw the race narrow as he made key missteps and as the war in Iraq became increasingly unpopular.

An exit poll by The Associated Press showed that a majority of Virginia voters disapproved of the war and said the U.S. should withdraw some or all of its troops. Of those, a majority favored Webb. Those who disapproved of President Bush voted overwhelmingly for Webb.

Allen won support among religious voters, those who have served in the military and those who believe fighting terrorism is important. Surprisingly, Webb was the favorite among those who thought the economy was important. The economy, in a state with a low unemployment rate, was supposed to benefit Republicans.

Blacks and women favored Webb, the exit poll showed.

DOJ_NMG_0091897

Allen may have been helped by the so-called same-sex marriage amendment, which appeared heading toward easy passage. Allen supported the amendment;. Webb thought it was unnecessary.

Turnout was strong, with long lines reported in some areas.

The contest was classified as one of the nastiest in Virginia history, but that did not deter voters from going to the polls.

Webb, a published author and a Vietnam War veteran who was wounded in that war, was recruited to the race as an opponent of the war in Iraq. Allen defended Bush's war policy but began backing away from it at the end of the race.

Webb is a former Republican who served for 10 months as a Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan. He said he switched to the Democratic Party because of dissatisfaction with the war and with Republican economic policies.

Allen defeated Democratic U.S. Sen. Charles S. Robb six years ago and was immediately touted as a rising star in the Republican Party. Allen had served earlier as Virginia's governor, in the House of Representatives and in the House of Delegates.

Although running for re-election, Allen let it be known that he did not like the slow pace of the Senate.

Allen sought to paint Webb as a tax-raiser who did not know Virginia. Webb sought to portray Allen as a lackey for President Bush.

Both used misleading ads against the other.

Webb drew big crowds in the closing days of the campaign, while Allen drew much smaller crowds. Allen aides said they had a superior get-out-the-vote operation.

Allen began the race with a big lead in the polls and in fundraising. He hoped to use a big victory in Virginia to propel him to the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

He already had made trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, the early presidential nominating states, where he offered himself as the conservative alternative to the front-runner, Arizona Sen. John McCain.

Because of his sunny demeanor, some were comparing him to Reagan.

Webb, meanwhile, got into the race late and finished a bitter Democratic primary battle with Northern Virginia lobbyist Harris Miller almost broke.

But things started going downhill for Allen on Aug. 11 when he pointed to a volunteer tracker with the Webb campaign and called him "macaca." The word refers to a type of monkey and is considered a slur in some countries. The young tracker, S.R. Sidarth, a native of Fairfax County native who is of Indian-American descent, recorded the moment on camera.

The comment, circulated widely over the "YouTube" Web site, became a worldwide embarrassment for Allen and quickly put him on the defensive.

Allen apologized personally to Sidarth 10 days later.

Allen then battled questions about his Jewish heritage and long ago use of the n-word.

The Allen campaign also turned to the past, bringing up Webb writings in 1979 when he demeaned the role of women in the military. Later the Allen campaign disseminated smutty passages from Webb's six war novels.

In October, as Webb closed in on Allen in the polls, national Democrats poured money into the Webb race through the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Webb, a reluctant campaigner at first, became more adept on the stump. He was helped by former Gov. Mark R. Warner and Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, plus such national Democrats as former President Bill Clinton, Sen. Barrack Barack Obama of Illinois and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Allen received campaign visits from McCain and Bush. Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner, campaigned for Allen and joined him in two campaign commercials.

Bush and Clinton raised about $500,000 each for Allen and Webb. Allen tried to put Webb on the defensive over taxes. Webb questioned Allen's financial dealings.

Webb stressed a message of economic populism. Allen stressed his record as governor and senator. He was governor from 1994 to 1998.

Tester Leads Burns As Count Drags On (BG)

Billings Gazette, November 8, 2006

HELENA - Democratic challenger Jon Tester clung to a lead over Republican U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns on Tuesday night, but vote-counting delays prevented a winner from being named.

Tester jumped to an early lead over Burns, but Republicans weren't ready to concede because of delays in vote-counting in Flathead County, a Republican stronghold, and Gallatin County, which Burns carried in his 2000 re-election.

At press time, with 65 percent of the precincts counted, the unofficial tally showed Tester with 127,342 votes or 51 percent, while Burns had 116,751 or 47 percent. Libertarian Stan Jones trailed with 6,168 votes for 2 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0091898

Despite his lead, Tester was not declaring victory shortly before midnight.

Tester, speaking to a roomful of supporters at a Great Falls hotel, urged them to remain at what they hope will be a victory party.

"We'll be coming out here in an hour, maybe two, maybe a half-hour and then we'll be able to party, OK," Tester said. "Stick around. I guarantee you it will be worth the wait."

He then pumped his fist to supporters.

Burns clung to the hope that he can reverse Tester's lead when the full vote count comes in from heavily Republican Flathead County. The vote-tallying machine in Flathead County broke down, so officials there were counting votes by hand.

And Gallatin County, another heavily populated area that is a political battleground, hadn't reported any vote totals by midnight.

The Burns campaign's senior adviser, Erik Iverson, was preparing for a long night.

"It's slow-going, that's for sure," he said.

Although Burns trailed in the early returns, Iverson said the Burns was not giving up hope.

We're likely in for a long night," Iverson said.

"We're anxious to see what happens up in the Flathead," Iverson added, saying that election officials had tallied only five of 35 precincts - by hand. Burns led in the early Flathead returns.

Gallatin County, which had people register to vote and cast their ballots past the 8 p.m. poll closing time, also hadn't reported any results. Iverson said Burns believes he can win that county.

Although Tester led in Yellowstone, Iverson said the campaign doesn't know yet which precincts the votes have been counted.

"We know that turnout in Republican precincts (in Yellowstone County) was huge," Iverson said. "Thirteen precincts turned out more voters than in 2004, a presidential election year."

The cornerstone of Burns' campaign was his seniority and his ability to bring home the bacon for Montana. He cited his 18 years in the Senate, particularly his membership on the Senate Appropriations Committee, which approves federal spending.

Running on a campaign theme of "delivering for Montana," Burns said he had brought $2.2 billion in federal funds to Montana, a figure challenged as inaccurate by the state's senior senator, Max Baucus, and Gov. Brian Schweitzer, both Democrats.

Burns, rated as one of the most vulnerable Republican Senate incumbents, trailed in the public polls the entire race until closing the gap in at least one poll last week.

The Republican was under fire for the entire campaign, initially for his ties to disgraced and admitted-felon Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Burns accepted nearly $150,000 in campaign funds from Abramoff, his associates and his tribal clients. Burns, under fire, returned the money or donated it to charity in December 2005.

Starting in August 2005, Montana Democrats began running negative ads against Burns over Abramoff and never let up.

Burns insisted he had done nothing wrong. Although some national newspapers said Burns was under investigation by the U.S. Justice Department in the Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, Burns insisted he was not under investigation and had not been questioned by the federal agency.

Tester said it was time for a change and criticized Burns for losing touch with Montana and taking on Washington values. The flat-topped farmer said he wanted to make the U.S. Senate "look more like Montana."

The Democrat, underfunded and trailing, came roaring back in the June primary election to defeat state Auditor John Morrison, who had twice run for state office.

Tester called on President Bush to develop a plan to remove U.S. troops for Iraq. He also called for repeal of the U.S. Patriot Act, a law passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Supporters said the law gave the federal government tools to stop future terrorist activities, while critics like Tester said it amounted to a breach of Americans' right to privacy.

Burns branded Tester as a tax-and-spender, while Tester said Democrats, who controlled the state Senate in 2005, helped spend a budget surplus on education, health care and social services, which were neglected by a decade of Republican control of the Legislature and the governor's office.

The two men debated seven times around the state. In the last six debates, Tester supporters, many of them dressed in bright yellow T-shirts that said "Fire Burns," greatly outnumbered Burns backers.

Burns, 71, was first elected to the U.S. Senate in 1988 two years after he won a seat on the Yellowstone County commissioner. He easily won re-election in 1994 and survived a tough re-election in 2000 against Democrat Brian Schweitzer, then a political unknown and today Montana's governor.

DOJ_NMG_0091899

A Missouri native who attended the University of Missouri for two years before joining the Marines, Burns moved to Billings in the 1960s. A cattle auctioneer, Burns also worked for a cattle magazine. He started an agricultural radio network that still exists today.

Tester, 50, was first elected to the Montana Senate in 1988 and is completing his eighth year. He elected president of the state Senate in 2005, the first time Democrats controlled the body in a decade.

He is an organic grain farmer on the land homesteaded on by his grandparents and farmed by his parents. Tester is a music graduate of the University of Great Falls and taught music in Big Sandy but later concentrated on farming full time.

Tester ran on a platform of promoting alternative energy, expanding health care, and enacting middle class tax cuts. He and his wife criss-crossed the state in their red pickup truck.

Burns Narrows Gap, Trails Tester By 1 Percent (GFT)

Great Falls Tribune, November 8, 2006

Republican incumbent U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns is making a late push as more precincts report, narrowing the gap between himself and Democrat Jon Tester.

With 704 of 867 precincts, or 81 percent, Tester leads Burns by about 4,000 votes. Tester has 144,544 votes, or 49 percent; Burns has 140,547 votes or 48 percent and Libertarian Stan Jones has 7,532, or 3 percent.

Some Vets Of Iraq, Afghanistan Lose Their Election Day Battles (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, November 8, 2006

WHEATON, Ill. — Veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan brought unique perspectives on the wars to their campaigns for the House of Representatives. Their military service, though, was not enough to propel most of them to victories.

Veterans brought “firsthand credibility” to the year's biggest issue, said Paul Rieckhoff of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, a group that has criticized the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq war. Vets could give Congress insights on deployments and fighting the Iraq insurgency, he said.

But Democrat Paul Hackett, an Iraq veteran who lost a House election in Ohio last year, said veteran candidates' “stamp of credibility” isn't always enough: “They need to have other bona fides.”

The Democratic Party recruited veterans to counter perceptions that the GOP is tougher on national security. More than 60 veterans ran for Congress as Democrats; about 40 ran as Republicans. One in four House members and one in three senators served in the military.

“It's hard to call these candidates soft on defense when they put their lives on the line,” said Christopher Borick, a political scientist at Muhlenberg College in Allentown, Pa.

Most Iraq and Afghanistan veterans took on incumbents and lost:

·Illinois. Democrat Tammy Duckworth, an Illinois National Guard helicopter pilot who lost both legs in a 2004 attack in Iraq, was defeated in Chicago's western suburbs by Peter Roskam, a Republican state senator.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars political committee endorsed Roskam over Duckworth. Without her military background, the race wouldn't have been competitive, said Paul Green, a political scientist at Chicago's Roosevelt University. “The Republican Party threw a ton of money into that race.”

·Maryland. Democrat Andrew Duck, a former Army intelligence officer in Iraq, lost to Republican Rep. Roscoe Bartlett.

·Minnesota. Democrat Tim Walz defeated Republican Rep. Gil Gutknecht. Walz served in Afghanistan as a member of an Army National Guard artillery battalion.

·Pennsylvania. Democrat Patrick Murphy, who deployed to Iraq as an Army lawyer, was in a virtual tie with Republican Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick early Wednesday.

Democrat Joseph Sestak beat GOP Rep. Curt Weldon. Sestak is a retired Navy admiral who led battle groups in Iraq. The Justice Department is probing whether Weldon used his influence to help his daughter's lobbying company.

·Texas. In President Bush's district, Republican Van Taylor lost toDemocratic Rep. Chet Edwards. Taylor is a former Marine captain. Taylor underestimated Edward's popularity among the military, said Thomas Myers, a political scientist at Baylor University in Waco. Voters, Myers said, were focused on “how the war has been managed,” not on veterans' performance.

Other vets on ballots Tuesday: Ex-National Guard general Martha Rainville, a Republican, lost to Democrat Peter Welch for Vermont's House seat. Democrat and former naval officer Eric Massa lost to Rep. Randy Kuhl, R-N.Y.

Election Leaves Women Poised To Play A Greater Role In Politics (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

DOJ_NMG_0091900

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Even before the final tally in election 2006, one group already stood out as victors: women in politics.

The Democrats last night were poised to take control of the House, and their success stands to make California Rep. Nancy Pelosi the first female House speaker and the most powerful woman ever to sit in Congress. (As of early Wednesday morning, the Democrats had been projected to win enough seats for control of the House.)

Last night's Democratic gains immediately will turn attention to the priorities Ms. Pelosi would set for the House's expanded Democratic contingent. She has said Democrats should, among other things, push to increase the minimum wage and give the federal government new power to negotiate for lower drug prices in the Medicare health program, while warding off any attempts to privatize Social Security and beginning to withdraw troops from Iraq. 1

"Let us work together to find a solution to the war in Iraq," Ms. Pelosi said at a Democratic rally. "The campaign is over. Democrats are ready to lead."

Another prominent woman in Congress, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, is the Democrats' presidential front-runner for 2008, preparing for what may become the most serious run for the White House yet by a woman.

But the advances by women are hardly limited to those two headline-grabbing leaders. Across the nation, record numbers of women sought political office this year. Buoyed in part by the public's desire for change and the perception that women will bring it, many of them battled their way through primaries to make it into yesterday's general election.

Several of those women were poised to win last night, increasing their overall numbers in Congress, as well as in state legislatures, depending on the outcomes of some tight races.

At the state level, a record 2,433 women were running for seats as state lawmakers, according to Rutgers University's Center for American Women and Politics. That breaks a record set in 1992, the so-called Year of the Woman because of vast numbers of wins by female politicians that year.

In the Senate, a record 12 women candidates made it through their primaries this year, and two -- Amy Klobuchar in Minnesota and Claire McCaskill in Missouri -- were in competitive races that could increase the number of women in the Senate to a new high of 16. Based on exit polls, Ms. Klobuchar appeared to be on her way last night to victory as Minnesota's first woman senator.

ELECTION 2006

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20062.

Gaining Ground

A total of 138 female candidates were running for the House, just short of the record 141 in 2004. In the final tally, women are likely to gain some ground there, though not as much as in 1992, when 19 were elected.

Exit polls showed Democrat Kirsten Gillibrand beating Republican Rep. John Sweeney of New York, and Democrats Kathy Castor in Florida and Yvette Clarke in New York were headed toward taking over seats previously held by male Democrats. Those gains, of course, would be tempered by a loss of seats held by incumbent Republican women. Based on exit polls, Republican Reps. Nancy Johnson of Connecticut and Anne Northup of Kentucky were headed for defeat last night.

In the current environment, with the public holding Congress in generally low esteem and many incumbents tainted by scandal, women candidates often are perceived as "agents of change," says Debbie Walsh, director of the Rutgers center.

In addition, an atmosphere favoring Democrats improves the outlook for women candidates, who tend to be disproportionately Democratic. Of the 12 women who ran for Senate seats yesterday, eight are Democrats; of the 138 women who ran for the House, 97 are Democrats.

"It's going to be a huge year for Democratic women in particular, but for all women," says Karen White, national political director of Emily's List, an organization that recruits and supports Democratic women candidates who favor abortion rights.

Ms. Pelosi, who hails from a politically prominent Catholic family in Baltimore, will be under an intense spotlight as she tries to bridge differences in her own party and make good on her promise to increase bipartisan cooperation in the House.

Republicans have painted Ms. Pelosi, who represents a decidedly liberal district in San Francisco, as a liberal extremist. But she has used the campaign to fight that portrayal, and has sought to cast herself -- and her party -- as more moderate in the waning weeks of the election season. Under Democratic control of the House, Ms. Pelosi has promised fiscal restraint and has emphasized budget cuts over tax increases as a way to fund any new spending.

As is her custom, Ms. Pelosi returned to Washington this week to watch the election results, while Speaker Dennis Hastert remained in Illinois.

"It's going to be fun; it's going to be fun," Ms. Pelosi said in a brief hallway interview Monday night in the Capitol, conveying her optimism that voters would return her party to power.

Huge Challenge

DOJ_NMG_0091901

Ms. Pelosi has vowed that, as speaker, she would restore civility to the House, a huge challenge after an emotional 2006 campaign in which she herself became a favorite target of Republicans.

"This fierce partisanship has really no place," she said. "The election's over, we go to govern, we find common ground. If you don't find it, you stand your ground, but it's in the world of ideas. It doesn't say, 'I don't agree with you, so you can't even have your idea discussed on the floor of the House.' "

Ms. Pelosi's posture may be smart politics, given what is likely to be a close balance between Democrats and Republicans in Congress over the next two years. But it is also an example of what researchers say is a style common among women legislators: They tend to prefer transparency and inclusiveness.

Rep. Louise McIntosh Slaughter, a New York Democrat, who potentially will head the committee that sets rules for legislative debates, said Democrats would "open up the political process" and "bring transparency, integrity and democracy back to the legislative process."

The strides made by women in Congress and state government are no accident. Numerous programs, run by both partisan and nonpartisan organizations, seek to increase their numbers. Emily's List has a Political Opportunity Program that trains and donates funds to women candidates at the state and federal levels.

The group had a longstanding relationship with several candidates in this election cycle, including Gabrielle Giffords, the former Arizona state legislator who campaigned for the seat left by retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe, as well as Mary Jo Kilroy, a county commissioner who mounted a strong challenge in Ohio against Deborah Pryce, the highest-ranking woman in the House Republican leadership.

"We've been working hard to put these women in the pipeline for almost a decade," said Emily's List's Ms. White. "Here in 2006 the opportunity is there, and many of these women have taken it."

On the Republican side similar efforts exist but so far haven't been as fruitful. Democrats "obviously have done a better job in recruiting women," says Beverly Davis, president of the National Federation of Republican Women, which is based in Alexandria, Va. "We have to get more Republican women to step up and realize that they do have the qualifications and they would make good candidates."

For all the gains women are poised to make this year, government remains a field dominated by men. Even in 1992, the number of females elected to the House went to just 47 from 28. This year, 67 women were serving in the House, bringing the total number of women in Congress to 81.

Election Juxtaposes Ballots And Bullets (WSJ)

By David Rogers And John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Democrats were rolling up election victories last night driven by public concern over the war in Iraq, just as the Army was preparing a new emergency-funding request for $49.2 billion more to pay for overseas operations for the remainder of this fiscal year.

The juxtaposition illustrates the new political reality in Washington, a challenge both for newly powerful Democrats and the Republican president: With the Democrats poised to take control of the House in the next Congress, each will be forced to deal with each other if the government is to function over the next two years.

Mindful that Republicans still have the votes to filibuster them in the Senate as well as a presidential veto, House Democrats have stuck to a modest agenda, such as increasing the minimum wage, toughening ethics rules and reviving stem-cell legislation previously vetoed by the president. Now they inherit a backlog of unfinished spending bills for the current fiscal year, which began Oct. 1, as well as new demands for funding the war.

ELECTION 2006

· For complete coverage, see WSJ.com/Election20061.

The Army request is part of a larger war supplemental bill that the administration had considered asking Republicans to take up in a postelection session. Together with other services, the total request is expected to be in the range of $75 billion on top of $70 billion provided by Congress in September.

Congress has the power to cut the request, though there is resistance among many Democrats -- fearful of hurting the troops in the field -- to use the appropriations process to force change in the administration's Iraq policy. But Democrats may demand a stricter interpretation of what qualifies as emergency funds. Within the Army's request, for example, about $18 billion is for procurement, and Democrats may ask that the White House submit that as part of the regular defense budget.

An early test for Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, who is expected to be the new House speaker, will be delivering on promises to enact tougher ethics rules. Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois tried that a year ago, but ran into opposition from Republicans who argued the public impact of scandals had been exaggerated.

DOJ_NMG_0091902

Outside watchdogs are pressing hard. "All of the late polling shows that corruption is one of the top issues with voters," said Fred Wertheimer, a longtime proponent of tighter restrictions on travel, meals and entertainment paid for by lobbyists. "If you don't move quickly when the mandate's there, then the Washington money culture starts moving back in."

The White House is braced for subpoenas from hostile committees led by Democrats and for Republicans now more interested in identifying Mr. Bush's successor than in rallying behind a waning presidency. At a Philadelphia-area fund-raiser a few weeks ago, former President George H.W. Bush said he would "hate to think what...my son's life would be like" if Democrats won enough seats to take over Congress.

The conventional wisdom is that two years of gridlock are likely. "I don't see the recipe for anything to happen," said Republican lobbyist Ed Rogers. "Bush will be back in true Republican mode -- vetoing spending bills that didn't come from his own party."

But in an interview this week, Ms. Pelosi said: "The election's over; we go to govern." And others are hopeful that somehow the election will change the partisan atmosphere that has paralyzed Congress. "Clearly there's a desire [among voters] for change, not just on a policy level but in how the relationship works," said Sen. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) "If the president says, 'I got the message; we've got to start to work together,' you could have a productive two years," he said. "If not, it's going to be a rough two years."

There are hints that the administration may hold out an olive branch, particularly in areas of concern for Democrats -- such as alternative energy and education. "We'll work with both sides of the aisle," White House budget director Rob Portman, a former House member, said in an interview. "There will be an open dialogue, [and] we'll agree on some of the areas."

The weakening of House Republicans -- who were a major obstacle to an immigration compromise before the election -- has bred optimism that Congress can send the president a bill he will sign early next year.

The immediate impact of the election could be short-term chaos on Capitol Hill. The Republican leadership left so much unfinished work, there is no time for a cooling-off period before lawmakers return next week for a lame-duck session.

Pending are major appropriations bills for the current fiscal year. The Internal Revenue Service, preparing 2006 tax forms, needs answers soon on whether popular tax breaks will be extended. The White House is pressing for quick action on a Vietnam-trade bill before the president flies to Hanoi next week. The administration is pressing for some of its priorities, potentially still including the Iraq funds. But Republicans could prefer to go home. In the best of times, the budget decisions facing them are difficult: the Senate Appropriations Committee wants $5 billion more than its House counterpart for domestic spending on education, medical research and public works.

Most of the government is operating under a stopgap funding resolution due to expire Nov. 17, and already there are discussions about extending that until Dec. 8. "This is an institution of human beings, and people aren't going to want to be here. If the Republicans do not win, I predict they will not stay longer than a day," said one longtime House Democratic aide who lived through the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994.

That year, too, there was a short lame-duck session to deal with a major trade agreement, but the memories are more of shocked committee chairmen wandering the House floor talking of the staff they would have to fire.

The Voters' Message (WP)

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

SIX YEARS OF nearly unbroken one-party rule have not been healthy for the country. The apparent Democratic takeover of the House of Representatives yesterday is a good thing. Republicans won control of the House in 1994 promising a change from Washington business as usual. Instead, entrenched by gerrymandered redistricting into what they envisioned would be a permanent majority, Republicans slid toward lax oversight, unbridled partisanship and rampant sleaziness, if not outright corruption. Voters yesterday expressed their anger at President Bush and their frustration with the war in Iraq, as well as their disgust with the arrogant misbehavior of House Republicans. Though we regret the loss of some of the most talented Republican moderates, the GOP deserved to lose its majority.

Less clear is that Democrats deserved to win -- or that they would have done so absent Republican missteps. The Democrats won the House, and, as of this writing, at least narrowed the GOP majority in the Senate, but not because voters necessarily agreed with their program. How many voters, we wonder, could name even one of the Democrats' vaunted "Six for '06" legislative proposals? As they prepare to wield power, Democrats don't have capital from voters; at most, they enjoy a line of credit.

The right way to draw on that will be to resist the partisan temptation to act as the other side did, highhandedly and unilaterally. Instead, Democrats need to reach out to congressional Republicans as well as to Mr. Bush; the increased presence of conservatives in the Democratic ranks ought to help presumptive-Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) forge bipartisan majorities. The Democrats should swiftly enact promised ethics and lobbying reforms that Republicans slighted. They should conduct vigorous oversight but not incessant, backward-looking investigations; subpoena power should be used sparingly. It was easy for Democrats to offer campaign promises of fiscal discipline; it will be harder -- given the raft of new spending they have proposed -- to live up to promises of pay-as-you-go budget constraints.

DOJ_NMG_0091903

After six years of belligerent partisanship, the president would do well to change course dramatically in his final two years. In this, Mr. Bush has a good role model: Gov. George W. Bush of Texas, who managed to work across party lines to achieve results. Granted, Democrats in Congress aren't the same as Democrats in Texas, but the new congressional Democrats share a common interest with the president in demonstrating an ability to overcome bickering to achieve results. There's opportunity on issues ranging from immigration and climate change to entitlement reform and education.

As for Iraq, the president and his party need to be mindful of the passionate voter discontent with the war. Some Democratic candidates advocated prompt withdrawal, which we believe would be perilous to U.S. and Iraqi interests, but many were pressing for adjustment, not the "cut and run" of Mr. Bush's caricature. The president's lofty campaign rhetoric is bearing decreasing resemblance to the grim reality in Iraq. With the election over, he needs to show more flexibility and deftness to address the deteriorating situation.

Post-Election Job Number One (NYT)

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

Whatever this election accomplished, it did nothing to end the rancor and distrust that define current American politics. Yet, as the campaign went on (and on) there was one issue on which people from both parties appeared to be finding common ground: Donald Rumsfeld has to go.

While Democrats have been demanding a new secretary of defense for a long time, Republicans — worried about re-election as well as the course of the war — began to join the outcry this fall. Some made it part of their campaign mantras. Many others have been complaining in quiet about Mr. Rumsfeld's continued job security. Even people who are strong supporters of the continued presence of American troops in Iraq acknowledge that there needs to be a change.

It's possible that no one could have turned the invasion into a success, given the fissures in Iraqi society that the fall of Saddam Hussein have exposed. But we will never know, since the shortage of American troops and the lack of postwar planning made disaster inevitable. Mr. Rumsfeld deserves to go simply because he has failed at his job. Denying that reality is presumably why the president is so bent on keeping him.

Still, at a time when even the Bush administration admits the need for a change of tactics, it should be easy to see that a new team at the Defense Department would be better equipped to rethink the way the war is being conducted. The president has a degree in business. He should understand how difficult it is for managers to come up with creative ways of getting out of problems that their ideas created in the first place.

Before he presided over the Iraq invasion, Mr. Rumsfeld promised that as secretary of defense he was going to transform America's military so it was prepared to fight the conflicts of the 21st century. Mr. Bush has cited the progress being made on that front as one of the reasons he wants Mr. Rumsfeld to stay. But — in a familiar pattern for this administration — the changes have been more rhetorical than real.

Truly transforming the military would have meant trading in expensive cold war weaponry, like attack submarines and stealth fighters, for pilotless drones, swifter ships and lighter, more mobile ground forces. Mr. Rumsfeld never had the interest — or the political will — to take on that fight. Instead, he bought peace with Congress and the military brass by holding down the size of ground forces in order to continue paying the ballooning cost of unnecessary weaponry. He created a smaller, more mobile force that was too small to successfully pacify Iraq.

There is absolutely nothing more for Mr. Rumsfeld to do as secretary of defense except continue to defend failed policies and tinker with unworkable strategies. Most of the men and women who will be part of the 110th Congress in January have come to that conclusion, whatever their party affiliation. They simply need to share it with President Bush.

Can Bush Salvage His 2nd Term? (USAT)

By Ross K. Baker

USA Today, November 8, 2006

Nineteen fifty-eight was a miserable year for congressional Republicans, the worst for them since the 1930s. The Democrats gained 49 seats in the House and defeated a remarkable 15 GOP senators. More than even the numbers, the very political complexion of the Senate changed with the replacement of a number of very conservative Republicans with some very liberal Democrats. It was the election that set the stage for the New Frontier and Great Society initiatives of the 1960s.

For the next two years of President Eisenhower's term, 1958 would stand out as the low point in the fortunes of a Republican president whose personal popularity usually exceeded that of his party. Eisenhower would struggle to achieve the completion of his dream, the Interstate Highway System, but could manage little else. Without the cooperation of friendly Democrats in Congress, he would not even have gotten that.

DOJ_NMG_0091904

History tells us that the likelihood of great accomplishments for a re-elected president is not great whether or not his party enjoys a majority in Congress. In the aftermath of the 2006 elections, President Bush will face the fate of other two-term presidents — two years in which achievements are likely to be few and frustrations many. But if he could emulate Eisenhower and reach out to his congressional adversaries, he may be able to salvage the last remnant of his incumbency.

The presidential life cycle can be likened to the ages of man: vigorous youth followed by middle age and its efforts to fend off senescence and, finally, the inevitable onset of fragility and the trips and falls of a body that is no longer agile. There is even a kind of midlife crisis that occurs when a re-elected president faces his last midterm elections. Hoping in vain for the restoration of youthful sinew, presidents find instead that the administration has lost its intellectual adroitness, that its running gear is shot, and that all that remains is a desperate quest for a legacy that emphasizes its early successes.

President Truman, who served out most of Franklin D. Roosevelt's unprecedented fourth term and one term won in his own right, is the president whose situation most closely resembles the political environment in which President Bush finds himself: bogged down in an unpopular war, this one in Korea, and suffering from diminished personal popularity. The 1950 congressional elections had slashed Democratic strength in Congress, but Truman's party managed to hang on to the Senate by two seats and to the House by 36. Truman had survived an assassination attempt just before Election Day, the kind of early-November surprise that might have generated sympathy for him, but it did little to help the Democrats. Truman, like Bush, was besieged by calls for the firing of one of the principal figures in the administration who was being held responsible for the unpopular war.

Demands for the head of Secretary of State Dean Acheson sound remarkably like those today calling for the removal of Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. And the blunt refusals of Bush to dismiss Rumsfeld could have been uttered by Truman in his defense of Acheson.

It only got worse.

Truman's standing in the eyes of the public was diminished by incidents ranging from his vulgar attack on a music critic who panned the concert performance of Truman's daughter, Margaret, to his firing of a national hero, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, for insubordination.

Similarly, President Reagan's post-midterm troubles began almost immediately after the 1986 elections, in which the Democrats recaptured the Senate that they had lost when Reagan was first elected in 1980. The “bicoastal economy” was the big issue. At the time, serious hardship in the Midwest was starkly contrasted with the vigorous economies on both seaboards.

It was in the aftermath of this electoral setback that the Iran-contra scandal — in which the United States secretly sold arms to Iran in the hopes of freeing U.S. hostages and then diverted most of the profits to support the anti-Communist insurgency in Nicaragua — was revealed. Reagan's approval rating in The New York Times/CBS Poll plummeted from 67% to 46% between Election Day and the first week in December. It was the steepest one-month drop in presidential support in polling history.

President Clinton, in his last two years in the White House, offers a rare example of a relatively propitious last quarter of a presidential term, paradoxically because of the very agonies that he was suffering in his impeachment. In large measure, it was because of revulsion against the efforts to remove Clinton that the Democrats pulled off something of a surprise in 1998 by incurring no Senate losses and actually gaining five seats in the House. Republicans blamed the Democrats' surprise showing on Clinton's nemesis, House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., who was deposed from the speakership for the loss suffered by the party.

The nation seemed ready for a political truce.

Bush, unlike Clinton, has a major war on his hands. Clinton had only Kosovo, a far less perilous involvement than Iraq. But perhaps in the last two years of President Bush's term, he can shake off the lame-duck curse and redeem a pledge to the American people that he made in the 2000 campaign. He vowed then to be “a uniter, not a divider,” and indeed he was for a brief period after the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

Democrats might be understandably reluctant to accept an olive branch, and even some in his own party in Congress continue to resent the sometimes overbearing dominance of his administration. But the alternative to cleaning the slate is two years of continued partisan strife. It is Bush who must take the initiative or face two years that are barren of accomplishment and a poor foundation for the favorable judgment of history.

Ross K. Baker is a political science professor at Rutgers University. He also is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Billing Errors Dog Medicare Drug Benefit Since Its Start (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

DOJ_NMG_0091905

USA Today, November 8, 2006

Just days before enrollment for next year's Medicare drug benefit begins, federal agencies are still trying to fix a long-running billing problem that at its peak this summer ensnared about half a million people.

Despite those efforts, about 50,000 people who chose to have their monthly Medicare drug premiums taken out of their Social Security checks are still having incorrect amounts withheld.

It's been almost a year since Social Security began taking $33 a month out of Anita Preitauer's monthly check to cover her enrollment in a Medicare drug plan. But the 85-year-old Red Bluff, Calif., woman dropped the drug plan in February.

Despite repeated calls over the months to Medicare, Social Security and the insurer, Preitauer has not been able to get the problem resolved. Medicare owes her $330.

"It makes me feel very frustrated and worried, wondering each month how I can make all my bills," she says.

Problems with the amounts taken out of Social Security checks for the drug benefit have been ongoing since the program began, advocate groups say. Some people have been charged for plans they are not in. Others have not had any money taken out. "We have cases that go back as far as July and have not been resolved," says Deane Beebe at the Medicare Rights Center in New York, an advocacy group.

Medicare fixed about 100,000 cases last month, leaving about 50,000 unresolved, says Jim Kerr, an acting deputy director at Medicare.

"It has taken a great deal of time to resolve some of them, unfortunately," Kerr says.

In all, about 4.7 million Medicare members elected to have drug program premiums withheld from Social Security. Most others who signed up for the drug benefit send a check each month to their insurer or have the money automatically deducted by the insurer from a bank account or credit card.

To avoid problems for next year, Kerr suggests that enrollees who want to use Social Security withholding sign up before Dec. 8, well before the Dec. 31 deadline. Advocacy groups, such as the Medicare Rights Center, suggest enrollees avoid Social Security withholding for the drug plan and choose one of the other options.

Doris Oja, 71, of Placentia, Calif., has had $68.50 taken out of her Social Security check monthly since January, even though she signed up for a Medicare Advantage program that has no monthly premium.

She called Social Security, which told her to call Medicare. She called Medicare, which promised to get back to her in three days.

Ten days later, she got "a recorded message on my answering machine from Medicare wanting to know if the problem had been solved." It had not. She went back to Medicare, which promised a prompt response. Sixteen days later, she got a call telling her they were working on it.

"They just pass the buck," Oja says:. " 'It's Social Security's problem'; 'It's Medicare's problem.' "

States With Insurance Holes In Medicare Drug Plans On Rise By KRISTEN GERENCHER (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

The number of states with stand-alone Medicare prescription drug plans that will offer no substantial coverage for the top drugs prescribed to older Americans in the insurance gap known as the "doughnut hole" will increase to 13 next year from four this year, according to a new study.

Beneficiaries in many of the 37 states and District of Columbia with plans that will extend substantial coverage in the gap starting next year will see starkly higher premiums, according to a report from Families USA, a health-care consumer advocacy group that analyzed data from the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services.

Premium growth among plans that offer "meaningful" doughnut-hole coverage varies widely across states, but the median rise for the lowest-priced Part D plans is 87.4%, the study found.

The findings, which the health-insurance industry disputes as incomplete, come two weeks before Medicare beneficiaries can start choosing Part D plans for next year. Open enrollment begins Nov. 15 and runs through Dec. 31.

This year, Alaska, Hawaii, Maine and New Hampshire are states that don't have plans offering meaningful coverage of both the most commonly prescribed brand and generic drugs in the gap, said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA. Next year, those states will be joined by Connecticut, Florida, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin. That means the total of potentially affected Medicare beneficiaries will increase to 6.6 million from 375,000, the report said. Low-income beneficiaries weren't included in the count since they typically don't have insurance designed with a gap.

"The doughnut hole, which is a major structural problem with this Part D program, is not ameliorated by plans in 13 states in any meaningful manner," Mr. Pollack said.

DOJ_NMG_0091906

The doughnut hole is a gap in coverage for beneficiaries who have drug expenses exceeding $2,250 for the year. Under the standard benefit for 2006, those beneficiaries are responsible for paying the full cost of their drugs until they hit $5,100, putting them on the hook for as much as $2,850 in addition to monthly premiums, which can be hard on those who need maintenance medications for chronic conditions. In 2007, the doughnut hole will increase to $3,051, the report said.

Families USA deemed "meaningful" to be coverage of the most routinely prescribed brand-name and generic drugs. It found 18 of the 25 most commonly prescribed drugs to seniors aren't available in generic form, the report said. Heartburn and acid reflux agents Prevacid and Protonix and osteoporosis drug Fosamax are only available in brand form, making them more costly.

Mohit Ghose, spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group representing companies that provide health benefits for more than 200 million people, including Medicare Part D and Medicare Advantage, said competition between plans is holding costs down and giving beneficiaries the flexibility to shop for the plan that's right for them.

"The bids by Part D plans that have been made are 10% lower on average in 2007 than in 2006, which points to one very important thing: that the program is working," Mr. Ghose said.

"The level of flexibility in the program has provided better benefits and lower out-of-pocket costs than the framers envisioned in the legislation," he said. "For this year, you had consistently lower premiums than were envisioned at the time the legislation passed."

"Under a one-size-fits-all government program, none of these top 25 drugs, regardless of the methodology in calculating them, would be covered," Mr. Ghose added.

He questioned the study's use of 2004 data, which he called potentially outdated, on the most commonly prescribed drugs. Some were counted twice in different dosages such as Lipitor, which appeared once in the 10-milligram formulation and once in the 20-milligram dosage.

Mr. Pollack said the group took the most recent data available from the Pennsylvania PACE program, which is widely used as a benchmark for determining the most heavily prescribed drugs, and made no modifications to it.

Mr. Ghose questioned why the 6.4 million beneficiaries in Medicare Advantage plans with drug coverage weren't included in the study. "It's important to include every single Medicare beneficiary experience if we're going to critique or enhance this program."

Mr. Pollack disagreed. "There isn't a significant number of Medicare Advantage plans that provides meaningful coverage in the doughnut hole," he said. "It would not have made an appreciable difference."

About 10.3 million Medicare beneficiaries are in stand-alone drug plans out of a total 38.2 million beneficiaries with drug coverage, according to the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services.

As to why meaningful coverage in the doughnut hole is becoming scarcer and premiums prices are rising in many places where there still is coverage, Mr. Pollack speculated several factors may contribute. First, plans may have found the people attracted to policies offering doughnut-hole coverage tended to be sicker and turned out to be more costly than expected, he said. Or Part D's first year may have brought intense competition that kept prices down as insurers battled for market share. Thirdly, plans could have decided doughnut-hole coverage of both brand and generic drugs simply wasn't profitable, Mr. Pollack said.

Playing Medi-scare Again (WT)

By Newt Gingrich

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

The liberal activist group Families USA issued a flawed study last week on the Medicare prescription drug benefit that simply does not reflect reality. The report says the drug benefit as currently designed endangers millions of seniors by imposing financial penalties and creating considerable anxiety.

By ignoring the overwhelming approval millions of beneficiaries give the Medicare prescription drug benefit, the radical left has shown again its sole strategy is to score political points -- particularly before the election -- by scaring seniors.

Consider the skewed study by Families USA. Though 90 percent of Medicare beneficiaries now have broad and affordable prescription drug coverage, when four years ago only a quarter did so, the report focuses on the narrow issue known as the "doughnut hole." This is the period in coverage where beneficiaries, having used $2,250 worth of medications, might not have their medications covered until they use $5,100 worth. During this time, they might pay for their drugs out of their own pocket.

Labeling the coverage gap as "bizarre" and "troublesome" is misleading, as their analysis is based on several fundamental flaws. It defines "meaningful coverage" as only 25 medications, which amount to 0.6 percent of about 4,000 drugs the typical Medicare drug plan covers. They also fail to note there are other generic drugs available to treat the same conditions as those in the 25 drugs they list.

DOJ_NMG_0091907

In fact, many of the high-priced blockbuster drugs listed have therapeutic alternatives not mentioned in the study. Also, four of the drugs are listed twice because they are prescribed in different doses. Such double-counting is a major analytic flaw that unfairly skews the results for the worse.

Beyond these flaws, the "doughnut hole" in general will not be an issue for 71 percent of Medicare beneficiaries. They either will not spend enough to hit the gap or will be covered under a low-income subsidy program, existing coverage, or Part D plan with partial or full gap coverage. Of the remaining 29 percent potentially subject to the gap, every beneficiary in every state can choose an affordable drug plan that offers gap coverage for both generic and brand-name drugs.

Most will find coverage. Only 8 percent of beneficiaries will actually hit the "doughnut hole" with no coverage, according to PricewaterhouseCoopers. For them, they will still be far better off than prior to the new benefit. The first $2,250 they will have spent on prescription drugs has been covered. And beyond that direct savings, competition among private insurers has dramatically reduced the prices of Medicare drug plans. Competition has saved the average beneficiary nearly $1,500 a year off of their drug costs, according to the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

The small minority that reaches the "doughnut hole" without gap coverage still has workable options. In 27 states, Wal-Mart now offers nearly 300 generic drugs for as low as $4 for a one-month supply, regardless of insurance status. Other major retailers have announced similar programs. Meijer pharmacies now offer leading generic antibiotics absolutely free. Other options include prescription drug assistance programs through national and community-based charities, pharmaceutical manufacturers, and many states. Medicare has a section on its Web site called "Bridging the Coverage Gap" that details many options.

By trotting out flawed studies on the "doughnut hole" days before the election and focusing campaign rhetoric on drug reimportation and federal negotiation with drug manufacturers, the left shows once again it would rather scare seniors and vilify pharmaceutical companies than discuss real structural improvements in Medicare -- ones that would undoubtedly cover the "doughnut hole."

For instance, creating a Travelocity model of drug purchasing, like that used in air travel pricing or on eBay, would empower seniors and dramatically reduce costs. Choice and open access to real-time information creates competition, and competition drives down price. Reduced drug prices in a Travelocity model, which some estimate to be between 20 percent and 40 percent, would more than cover the "doughnut hole."

Reimbursing physicians, hospitals and others based on the value or quality of care they deliver, rather than how many transactions they process, would dramatically improve the health of all seniors in Medicare. Healthier beneficiaries are cheaper beneficiaries. Incentivizing the adoption of health information technology, which undoubtedly improves care, would also reap dramatic savings.

Let's agree there are serious problems to solve in Medicare. But rather than exchanging ideas, the left would rather play "Medi-scare." This might have provided a good sound byte before Election Day, but it does nothing to transform the program to work for all beneficiaries -- and the taxpayers who fund it.

Newt Gingrich, former speaker of the House of Representatives, is founder of the Center for Health Transformation. David Merritt is a project director at the Center. PricewaterhouseCoopers is a member of the Center.

No Simple Formula For Understanding Lawmakers' Pay (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

The prickly issue of congressional pay showed up in a number of anti-incumbent, shake-up-the-establishment campaign ads that ran prior to yesterday's election. They usually included an assertion that the members of Congress had voted to give themselves pay raises.

Well, yes and no.

Since 1989, when members of Congress adopted a formula for adjusting their pay, they have turned down pay raises five times and accepted raises 11 times, according to a report by the Congressional Research Service, part of the Library of Congress.

The congressional pay formula is based on certain elements of the Labor Department's Employment Cost Index. The pay increase for 2007, for example, would be 0.5 percent less than the percentage change in private-sector wage growth for the fourth quarter of 2005 and the same quarter of 2004.

In theory, the formula would put members of Congress on track for a 2 percent pay raise in January.

But congressional pay is also linked to government salary scales. Under the rules, if white-collar federal employees get an annual base pay raise that is less than the formula's suggested increase for Congress, members are paid at the lower rate.

DOJ_NMG_0091908

Because Congress has not wrapped up negotiations on a 2007 federal employee raise, lawmakers probably won't know the size of their raise until late December, when the president issues pay scales for government workers, diplomats, Cabinet officials and others.

For example, if Congress and the president decide to give federal employees a 2.2 percent pay raise next year, members of Congress will probably end up with a 1.2 percent raise.

That's because the president will split the federal raise into two parts -- a base raise and a locality raise. In recent years, about one percentage point of the raise has been allocated for the locality raise. Such a split would limit the congressional pay raise to the federal employee base raise -- 1.2 percent in this scenario.

Members of Congress are paid $165,200 -- the same salary as federal district court judges, deputy Cabinet secretaries and federal executives in a number of agencies.

Critics have pointed out that Congress prefers to rely on an automatic formula and keep its pay tied to other government officials as a way to avoid annual debates on whether lawmakers deserve higher pay. Some members of Congress defend the automatic raises as cost-of-living adjustments that are modest and appropriate for a board of directors.

Citizens Against Government Waste, a nonprofit organization that tries to expose pork-barrel spending and bureaucratic mismanagement, would like Congress to take an up-or-down vote on its pay each year and justify the raise on meeting some goal, such as lowering a deficit or maintaining a budget surplus, said Tom Schatz , the group's president.

"There is no other evaluation, other than the voting booth, for whether members are doing a good job," he said.

Most organizations "do base pay on merit," Schatz added. "That has been the argument for teacher pay and other government worker pay. Why not Congress?"

The political debate over congressional pay, however, masks a more serious compensation problem in government, which is finding it more difficult to compete against large corporations for top-notch talent.

According to a recent study by the Government Accountability Office, salaries for the government's senior officials, including judges, have not kept pace with inflation or the growth of wages over the past 30 years. Some House members have expressed interest in rethinking federal executive compensation practices, but only one hearing on the issue was held this year.

Schatz said the campaign ads questioning congressional pay raises probably did not sway voters yesterday, but "at least in the ads, people are raising the issue," he said.

"I would be interested if the candidates who complained about the pay raise will deny themselves the pay raise when they get here," he added.Shifting Titles at the OMB

Robert Shea , who heads a White House initiative that seeks to gauge the effectiveness of federal programs, has been named associate director for management at the Office of Management and Budget.

Shea's previous title was counselor to the OMB deputy director for management. The new title appears to reflect Shea's expanding duties, which include administering the Program Assessment Rating Tool, an attempt to link budget recommendations to the performance of specific programs; overseeing key parts of the president's federal management agenda; and providing advice on personnel policy issues.

Two Books, Two Different Democratic Tones (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Sen. Dorgan told me yesterday that he found this an "interesting fact," and indicative of the sad state of our trade relations. But I find it baffling. Why should anyone care, in a world of microchips and nanotechnology, what our largest export by "volume" is? It's money that matters. The Commerce Department says waste- and scrap-paper exports have totaled $1.3 billion this year. That's a drop in the bucket compared with U.S. exports of more than $35 billion of semiconductors, $43 billion of food and $71 billion of automobiles and auto parts -- just to cite a few. So what's the point?

Not all Democrats, of course, buy into Sen. Dorgan's antitrade agenda. Indeed, as a group, the Democrats have managed to get through this election without buying into much of any agenda at all.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi even seems proud of that fact. On more than one occasion, she has noted that during the fight over President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security, she was "taking heat from everyone who said, 'Why don't you have a plan? You can't beat something with nothing.' And we said, 'Yes, we can.' "

That lack of an agenda distinguishes today's Democrats from the Republicans who rode to control of the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate 12 years ago on their explicit "Contract with America." It is far from clear that the contract had much to do with Republican victories that year. Still, it did provide a rough road map for governing once the election was over. (In subsequent years, the party wandered far from its map.)

DOJ_NMG_0091909

When it comes to economic policy, there seem to be only two discernible planks on which Democrats agree. One is raising the U.S. minimum wage -- a proposition on the ballot in a number of states with tight races yesterday. The other is allowing the government to negotiate drug prices directly with pharmaceutical companies.

Both would undercut the workings of the marketplace, but in limited ways. Economic research on the minimum-wage is mixed but suggests that while it may cause some teenagers to lose jobs, the effects are relatively small. The economic effects of allowing the government to negotiate drug prices -- which is just another way of imposing price controls -- could be more damaging but are limited to one intensely unpopular industry.

Sen. Dorgan's screed raises a much more dangerous specter of broad-brush, antimarket, antibusiness protectionism. He isn't alone, as anyone who has heard Sherrod Brown's pitch in Ohio or watched Bruce Braley's campaign in Iowa now knows. If there is one thing politicians are good at, it is sensing the public mood. If Messrs. Dorgan, Brown and Braley are correctly sensing that mood, business may be headed for a tough ride.

For now, though, there is one fact to provide comfort. Sen. Obama's book is No. 4 on the Amazon.com bestseller list. Sen. Dorgan's is No. 5,920. Big business had better hope book buyers have it right.

OTHER NEWS:

Borrowing By Consumers Eases, But Credit-Card Balances Jump (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

American consumers eased off on borrowing in September, though a persistent rise in credit-card balances suggests some are feeling the impact of the housing market's downturn.

The Federal Reserve reported U.S. consumer credit, which excludes mortgage debt, fell at an annualized rate of 0.6% in September to $2.366 trillion, or about $21,000 a household. That was up 3.7% from a year earlier, well below the average year-to-year rise of 7.1% over the past decade.

Nonrevolving credit -- mostly auto loans -- fell at an annualized rate of 3.2% in September, reflecting slow auto sales.

Credit-card balances and other so-called revolving credit, however, rose significantly, at a 4% annualized rate. That suggests that as housing prices fall, people are less able to extract cash through home-equity loans and cash-out refinancings, causing some financially stretched folks to turn to their credit cards.

"It's a pretty benign story, but it's one that we need to stay on top of," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital in Greenwich, Conn. He noted that consumers as a whole are doing pretty well: Personal income, which was up 6.8% in September from a year earlier, has outpaced growth in both credit-card and other consumer debt.

In recent years, rising home prices, easy credit and tax breaks on mortgages have motivated people to borrow against their homes instead of running up credit-card balances and taking out auto loans. As a result, total mortgage debt has almost doubled over the past five years, while consumer credit has risen by less than a third.

As of the second quarter, mortgage payments had reached 11.6% of disposable income, the highest level since at least 1980. Consumer-debt payments had fallen to 6.5% of disposable income, the lowest level since late 2000.

Orders For New Homes Tumble (LAT/BLOOM)

The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2006

Home builders Toll Bros. Inc. and Beazer Homes USA Inc. said Tuesday that orders for new homes declined and customer cancellations rose as the housing slump deepened.

Toll, the largest U.S. luxury home builder, said fiscal fourth-quarter home building revenue fell 10% and orders tumbled 58%. Beazer, the seventh-largest home builder by revenue, said orders dropped 58%.

"We continue to look for signs that a recovery is imminent but can't say that one is in sight," said Robert Toll, chief executive of Toll Bros. Buyers have lost confidence in the home market and are delaying purchases, convinced that prices will continue to fall, he said.

Toll's home building sales declined to $1.81 billion in the three months that ended Oct. 31 from $2.01 billion a year earlier, the Horsham, Pa.-based company said. Toll cut its forecast for the number of houses it plans to build in the next year and is also reevaluating plans to acquire additional land for subdivisions.

The home builders' reports coincided with a two-week, $1.3-million newspaper ad campaign by the National Assn. of Realtors to persuade people that now is a good time to buy a home.

DOJ_NMG_0091910

Toll, the sixth-largest home builder by revenue, said it would complete 6,300 to 7,300 homes in the current fiscal year, less than its previous forecast in August of 7,000 to 8,000, because of cancellations and fewer contracts.

The value of contracts signed fell 55% to $710 million in the quarter, down from a $1.59-billion record in the same period a year ago. The company said the contract signings were hurt by a "higher than normal 585 cancellations." Almost 25% of the cancellations came in the Orlando, Fla., and Northern California markets, Toll said.

During the quarter, Toll Bros. sold 2,502 homes, compared with 2,957 houses last year.

Net income at Atlanta-based Beazer fell to $91.9 million, or $2.19 a share, from $164.4 million, or $3.61, a year earlier. Revenue rose 3.8% to $1.9 billion in the quarter ended Sept. 30, the company said in a statement.

Also on Tuesday, Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., New Jersey's largest home builder, said new contracts for its fiscal fourth quarter dropped 36% to 3,100, reflecting a "continued high level of contract cancellations." Cancellations for the quarter were 35% of gross contracts, up from 25% a year earlier.

Shares of Toll Bros. fell a penny to $28.04 while Beazer rose 13 cents to $42.07 and Hovanian fell 57 cents to $29.04.

High-End Or Starter Homes, Builders Remain In A Slump (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

Two of the nation's major home builders reported dismal results in their most recent quarters yesterday, confirming that the slump in the once-hot housing market is far from over.

Toll Brothers, the country's largest builder of luxury homes, said revenue from home building fell 10 percent, to $1.81 billion in its fourth quarter, ended Oct. 31, compared with $2.01 billion in the period a year earlier. The results are preliminary; the company will report earnings on Dec. 5.

Toll Brothers' backlog of projects declined 25 percent and its signed contracts plunged 55 percent as the company suffered from a rash of cancellations concentrated in the formerly hot markets of Florida and Northern California.

"I don't think we can call where the floor is," said Joel Rassman, chief financial officer of Toll Brothers. "We have not seen a turnaround yet."

The decline was not limited to the luxury segment of the housing market. The Atlanta-based Beazer Homes USA, a smaller rival that builds many homes for first-time buyers, reported that net income fell 44 percent, to $91.9 million, or $2.19 a share, in the quarter ended Sept. 30, from $164.4 million, or $3.61 a share, in the period in 2005.

Revenue increased 4 percent, to $1.88 billion. But new orders plummeted 58 percent, and the company forecast a substantial decline in earnings for 2007.

More than a year into a housing market bust, the home builders' deteriorating fortunes are hardly a surprise. In September, sales of both new and existing homes were running around 14 percent below their level a year earlier.

Home prices have not fallen uniformly across the nation; in some areas, they have, however, declined steeply. By September, the average price of a newly built home was about 2 percent below the price of a year earlier, according to government figures.

Stuck with unsold inventory that is the equivalent of more than six months of sales, builders have slammed on the brakes. New-housing starts in September were running about 18 percent below their level in September 2005.

Toll Brothers, which is based in Horsham, Pa., cut its forecast for home deliveries in 2007 by 9 percent to 10 percent, compared with its previous forecast. And it trimmed its portfolio of land to 74,000 lots, 19 percent below its high in the fiscal second quarter, which ran from February through April.

James O'Leary, chief financial officer at Beazer Homes, said the company reduced its number of lots by 15 percent in the quarter. It also cut about 1,000 jobs in September and October, about 25 percent of the company head count.

The slump in construction has hurt the broader economy. Residential investment, which accounts for about 5 percent of the nation's total economic production, plummeted 17.4 percent in the third quarter of the year, according to government data. It was the biggest quarterly decline in more than 15 years, single-handedly reducing the growth in gross domestic product by roughly 1.1 percentage points.

Mr. Rassman at Toll Brothers argued that the housing market's chill is a question of confidence, "led by the consumer being afraid" that prices might fall. But he argued that still-low interest rates combined with continued employment growth should eventually feed through into growing demand for homes.

Economists, however, point out that it will take some time for builders to clear out their bloated inventory of unsold houses — a requisite for them to break their fall. With home prices still high by historical standards compared with potential buyers' incomes, this may be a protracted process, requiring more income gains or price declines.

DOJ_NMG_0091911

Richard DeKaser, chief economist at the National City Corporation, predicted that it would take about 9 to 12 months for the supply and demand of homes to come back into balance. “We are probably two-thirds of the way down the slope,” Mr. DeKaser said. “The bulk of the decline is behind us, but we are not yet out of the woods.”

Home Builders Report Declines (USAT/AP)

By Deborah Yao

USA Today, November 8, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — In a sign of a deepening housing slump, two major home builders reported steep declines Tuesday in new orders, and weaker fourth-quarter results.

Toll Bros., a luxury builder based in Horsham, Pa., said home-building revenue fell 10%, and signed contracts dropped 55% compared with a year ago. The company, which released its quarterly outlook ahead of earnings, also said it will incur a hefty charge against profits as it pares the number of lots it controls.

Beazer Homes USA of Atlanta reported a 44% decline in profit as higher revenue was offset by squeezed margins. The company said there was “significant” discounting in most markets.

New orders for Beazer fell 58% to 2,064 homes from 4,937 last year, as the housing market slowed further. It's cut 1,000 jobs, or 25% of its workforce.

Robert Toll, CEO of Toll Bros., said: “It's a loss of confidence in the buyers. Nobody wants to buy something that they think will cost less two weeks later.”

He said that at one point, he thought the housing market was nearing the bottom, but business continued to worsen. Toll noted that the company has absorbed two rounds of layoffs but didn't say how many people were let go.

“I am surprised,” Toll said, noting that the current low unemployment and interest rates would typically bolster the housing market.

The average rate on 30-year fixed-rate mortgages was 6.3% last week, according to Freddie Mac. The rate has fallen from 6.8% in July.

For the quarter, Toll Bros.' home-building revenue fell to $1.8 billion from last year's $2 billion. Signed contracts — a gauge of future business — fell to $710 million from last year's record $1.6 billion.

Toll Bros. said its fourth quarter was hurt by an above-average 585 cancellations. One-fourth of the quarter's cancellations came from Orlando and Northern California. The Southeast region saw the biggest drop in signed contracts, down 78%.

Toll Bros. now expects to deliver between 6,300 and 7,300 homes for fiscal 2007, off from its previous outlook of 7,000 to 8,000.

Beazer's fourth-quarter net income fell to $91.9 million, or $2.19 a share, from $164.4 million, or $3.61 a share, a year ago. Revenue rose 4% to $1.9 billion. On average, analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial had forecast profit of $1.65 a share on sales of $1.5 billion.

Dow Rises Again, Nearly A Record, On Boeing Rally Predictions Of A Divided Congress Gave Investors A Reason To Buy, Along With A Drop In Oil Futures By PETER A. MCKAY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Cheaper fuel and a big order for Boeing jets kept the stock market's ascent going for a second straight day.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average climbed 51.22 points, or 0.4%, to 12156.77. It is up 13.4% this year. The Dow during the day crossed its Oct. 26 record close but ended less than seven points shy of it.

Shares in Boeing, one of the Dow's 30 components, soared 5.4% after FedEx said it would cancel a $3.5 billion order for cargo planes from Airbus because of production delays. Instead, the shipper said it will buy aircraft from Boeing.

Although the outcome of congressional elections was still unclear at the end of Wall Street's regular trading hours, predictions that Democrats could gain control of the House (though not the Senate) probably motivated many investors to buy stocks, said strategist Ron Papanek of research firm RiskMetrics Group, one of several groups that have analyzed postelection gains in the stock market.

The studies have reached different conclusions. According to the RiskMetrics analysis, which goes back to 1900, the S&P 500-stock index gained 7.9% on average in the six months following an election that left at least one house of Congress controlled by a different party than the president's. The average gain was 3.8% following elections in which the presidency and both houses of Congress were in one party's hands.

"All you need is one house of Congress to go to a different party to reduce the likelihood of some dramatic piece of legislation going through that will affect companies," said Mr. Papanek. "That seems to decrease investors' worries about bad outcomes for the stocks that they buy."

DOJ_NMG_0091912

Yesterday, the S&P 500 gained 0.2%, or 3.06 points, to 1382.84, up 10.8% so far this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rallied 0.4%, or 9.93 points, to 2375.88, up 7.7% this year.

A pullback in several major energy investments also helped stocks. Crude-oil futures for December delivery slid 1.8%, or $1.09, to $58.93 a barrel, off 3.5% so far this year, after Kuwait's oil minister expressed doubt that the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will make a production cut next month. The crude-oil selloff pushed down prices of refined fuels like gasoline and heating oil. But natural-gas prices rose on forecasts of colder weather in Northeastern U.S.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks and bonds rose. The 10-year Treasury note gained 13/32 point, or $4.0625 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.661%. The 30-year bond rose 19/32 to yield 4.756%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 117.70 yen, compared with 118.29 yen. The euro rose to $1.2771 from $1.2723.

Stocks Climb On Gridlock Expectations (USAT)

USA Today, November 8, 2006

NEW YORK — This week's stock rebound gained traction Tuesday as growing optimism about potential gridlock in Congress nearly pushed the Dow Jones industrials to a record close.

The Dow Jones industrials gained 51.22 points, or 0.4%, to 12,156.77, just short of its record 12,163.66 close on Oct. 26. The Nasdaq composite index and Standard & Poor's 500 both nearly set 2006 highs. The Nasdaq rose 9.93 points, or 0.4%, to 2375.88, and the S&P added 3.06 points, or 0.2%, to 1382.84.

One index that did set a record was the USA TODAY Internet 50, as it rose 0.44 points, or 0.3%, to 137.02.

Stocks turned in their second-consecutive day of gains on belief that Tuesday's midterm elections will create legislative congestion and maintain the status quo for U.S. companies.

“Gridlock is good; Wall Street doesn't like change,” says Charles Gabriel, senior Washington analyst at Prudential Securities. “You're not going to have runaway spending increases, you won't have a repeal of (President Bush's) tax cuts, and there's no legislative change that will roil industries.”

Coming into the week, the Dow had fallen six-consecutive sessions. But the 201 points the Dow gained on Monday and Tuesday wiped out all but 7 of the points lost in what was its longest losing streak in more than a year.

Highlights:

Boeing rose $4.37 to $84.85 and was the single biggest gainer in the Dow, accounting for 34 points of its rise. The world's No. 2 aircraft maker signed a $2.3 billion contract to deliver freight airplanes to FedEx.

·Technical Olympic USA plunged $3.79, or 35%, to $7.00 and was the biggest loser on the New York Stock Exchange, on market speculation that the home builder might be forced to bail out of a foundering Florida joint venture and file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Meanwhile, Toll Bros. and Beazer Homes both reported disappointing quarterly results (story, 2B).

·Emerson Electric climbed $4.87 to $87.43. The diversified manufacturer posted 26% higher fiscal fourth-quarter earnings, raised its dividend 18% and announced a 2-for-1 stock split.

·EchoStar Communications rose 67 cents to $35.98. The satellite television provider reported lower third-quarter profit, but said that subscribers rose 295,000 to 12.8 million.

·Fuel Tech rallied $4.34, or 22%, to $23.68. The maker of industrial pollution reduction systems said third-quarter profit nearly doubled.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger Wins Reelection (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2006

A year after his crushing defeat in the special election, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger won a second term today in a landslide over Democrat Phil Angelides. Voters were also leaning toward approval of most - if not all - of a bond package that would launch California's biggest public construction boom in decades, according to early returns.

At a celebration in Beverly Hills, confetti rained on the governor and his family as Schwarzenegger thanked supporters.

"Wow, this is really exciting," he said. "What a fantastic evening. I love doing sequels, I love doing sequels, I tell you," Schwarzenegger said.

"But this without any doubt is my favorite sequel. What a great night and what a great victory."

The governor said he believed he had been given a mandate and pledged to move the state ahead in the next four years.

"I will protect your values and I will protect your dreams," he pledged.

DOJ_NMG_0091913

Schwarzenegger praised Angelides and said the Democrat had telephoned to concede. It was a gracious call, the governor said, adding that he looked forward to working with Angelides in the future.

The state expected 4.9 million Californians to vote at polling stations and another 3.8 million to cast absentee ballots, but the final turnout number - likely to be just over half of registered voters - is weeks away.

Overall, minimal disruptions occurred, most of them snafus such as paper jams and polling places that opened late, said Ashley Snee Giovannettone, a spokeswoman for the secretary of state's office.

For many Californians, the election's main draw was the national midterm vote, even if the state's political map offered few opportunities to influence which party controls Congress.

"I'm anti-Bush and wanted to stick it to him," said Santa Monica resident Sandy Jones, a woman in her 30s who voted a straight Democratic ticket.

But the highest profile race was the contest for governor.

Schwarzenegger's reelection caps a remarkable comeback from the political collapse he suffered last year, when he pursued a combative agenda that enraged organized labor and the Democrats who control the Legislature.

His moves to curb their clout and restrain state spending touched off a television ad assault that badly damaged his image. For months, teachers, nurses and firefighters told viewers that Schwarzenegger had broken his word - mainly his vow to champion public education. In the special election one year ago, voters roundly rejected his four ballot measures.

Chastened by defeat, Schwarzenegger launched his reelection drive with profuse public apologies that ultimately led many Californians to forgive him.

The governor also shook up his staff, hiring a tightly disciplined bipartisan team to chart his path to a second term. He named a no-nonsense Democrat, Susan Kennedy, to run his administration as chief of staff, a job she once held under Gov. Gray Davis. And he named two Republican veterans of President Bush's political operation to oversee his reelection team: chief strategist Matthew Dowd and campaign manager Steve Schmidt.

By all accounts, they ran a nearly flawless campaign. Schwarzenegger's communications shop choreographed virtually every moment he spent in public, whether in a cornfield with farmers outside Bakersfield or on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno."

Key to his winning formula was bipartisan cooperation with state lawmakers. For the first time in six years, California's governor and Legislature met the deadline for passing a budget. They agreed to put the historic $37-billion, public-works package on the November ballot. Together, they raised the state's minimum wage, approved prescription-drug discounts and agreed to mandatory cuts in greenhouse gas emissions, putting California in the vanguard of efforts to fight global warming.

The bipartisanship enabled Schwarzenegger to broaden his appeal to Democrats and independents, an essential task in a state where just over a third of registered voters are Republican.

Luck too played an important role in Schwarzenegger's recovery - most of all a brutal Democratic primary that crowned Angelides as his challenger. The treasurer was popular with liberals, a huge voting bloc in the primary. But he was poorly suited to compete on the broader terrain of a general election, given his long record of supporting tax hikes.

"All Democrats have to take stock of this devastating defeat," said Garry South, chief strategist for Angelides' more moderate primary rival, state Controller Steve Westly. "This is not an unremittingly liberal state."

The primary also sullied Angelides on the environment, with Westly's ads highlighting his background as a former developer with a history of run-ins with regulators over wetlands pollution. And the primary left him nearly broke, unable to respond effectively to Schwarzenegger ads that showed Angelides walking backward as an announcer mocked his record on taxes, the environment and crime.

Compounding the Democrat's troubles was his failure to articulate a coherent message or market a personality that Sacramento insiders of both major parties have long described as prickly and arrogant. To soften his image, his early ads featured testimonials from his three daughters, two of whom accompanied him Tuesday to a polling station near the family's Sacramento home.

"I'm so proud of my dad," Christina Angelides told reporters as the family arrived to cast ballots at an apartment complex for retirees.

As for the candidate, he said he was "immensely proud of the campaign we have waged."

"I have no regrets in this race," Angelides said. "I have nothing but fullness in my heart. I know we stood up for what is right. We stood up without retreat, without backing down, without looking at the polls. We stood up for the people who needed a voice."

Schwarzenegger struck a similar note of satisfaction after he and his wife, Maria Shriver, voted at a recreation center near their Brentwood compound.

"I think that the campaign was, in comparison to other campaigns, very positive, very upbeat," Schwarzenegger said.

DOJ_NMG_0091914

With polls showing him holding his wide lead to the end, Schwarzenegger spent much of the campaign's final weeks promoting the bond package. Its vast sweep of public construction projects offered him not just a platform for reelection, but also for his legacy.

What Schwarzenegger did not do was campaign in any visible way for fellow Republicans, many of whom would have welcomed the swarms of television cameras that he tended to draw. After voting, Schwarzenegger played down the importance of the distance he kept from the more conservative candidates who ran with him on the Republican ticket.

"They're all great candidates," he said, "and I'm very proud of them."

Schwarzenegger Easily Beats Angelides To Win Second Term (SFC)

By Bob Egelko

San Francisco Chronicle, November 8, 2006

(11-08) 00:45 PST -- (11-08) SACRAMENTO - Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has bucked a nationwide Democratic tide and routed challenger Phil Angelides to win a second term. Fellow Republicans, who were shut out of statewide offices four years ago, have won the insurance commissioner's post and trail narrowly in races for lieutenant governor and secretary of state. Californians also returned Democrat Jerry Brown to statewide office as attorney general.

In other statewide results, an initiative to require parental notification for minors' abortions -- similar to a measure that was defeated last November -- was trailing with two-thirds of the votes counted. Proposed tax increases on cigarettes and oil were also losing.

In a year of record campaign spending, Californians emphatically rejected a proposal to tighten limits on political contributions and provide public funding to candidates for state and legislative offices. Voters also turned down a statewide $50 parcel tax for school construction.

A property rights initiative that would restrict government authority to regulate land use was narrowly trailing. A series of public works bond measures was leading.

With 1 a.m. approaching, Schwarzenegger had received 57 percent of the vote to 38 percent for Angelides, the state treasurer. His victory caps a strong comeback by the governor, whose political future looked bleak last year when voters rejected all four measures he backed in a special election.

In his victory speech, the governor indicated he would continue to work with the Legislature's Democratic majority, an approach that helped to revive his political fortunes.

"Tonight the people have given us a mandate," Schwarzenegger said in Beverly Hills. "Not a mandate for me, not a mandate for any specific party - but a mandate to move the state ahead. A mandate for leadership, a mandate for a bigger and brighter future for California."

In the lieutenant governor's race, Democrat John Garamendi, the state insurance commissioner, led Republican state Sen. Tom McClintock by 48 to 46 percent.

In the race for secretary of state, the state's top elections officer, Democratic state Sen. Debra Bowen led incumbent Republican Bruce McPherson, who was appointed to the post by Schwarzenegger, by 47 to 56 percent, or 54,000 votes out of more than 4.6 million counted.

Republican Steve Poizner was headed for an easy victory in the insurance commissioner's race, leading his Democratic opponent, Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante, by 52 to 38 percent.

In the attorney general's race, Brown, the former governor now completing his second term as mayor of Oakland, held a 56 to 39 percent lead over Republican Assemblyman Chuck Poochigian.

Brown told reporters his experience as governor and mayor have prepared him well to become the state's top law enforcement officer.

"This gives me a unique perspective on the big picture of how laws are enacted in California, and it gives me a streetwise level of how laws that are formulated in Sacramento play out on the streets of our cities," he said.

Democrat Bill Lockyer, the outgoing attorney general, was headed for election as state treasurer, leading Republican Claude Parrish by 54 to 38 percent. Lockyer, a former lawmaker from San Leandro, said he plans to seek legislation to strengthen pension plans. He also plans to lobby for more federal funds for California with the help of Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who is in line to become speaker of the House.

"For years we have watched as California sends more money and taxes to Washington than we get back in spending," Lockyer said. "I'd like to see that change. I'm looking forward to working with Speaker Pelosi on that."

In the state controller's race, Democrat John Chiang led Republican Assemblyman Tony Strickland by 50 to 42 percent.

Among the ballot measures, Proposition 85, sponsored by anti-abortion groups, trailed by 54 to 46 percent. It would require unmarried minors to notify their parents or obtain approval from a judge to get an abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0091915

Prop. 86, a $2.60-a-pack cigarette tax increase to fund an assortment of health programs, trailed by 53 percent to 47 percent. Prop. 87, a $4 billion tax on oil producers to pay for research on alternative fuels and energy sources, was trailing by 56 to 44 percent.

The campaign finance measure, Prop. 89, was receiving only 25 percent of the vote. It would have set strict new ceilings for individual campaign donations -- $500 for legislative candidates and $500 for statewide officers -- and provided public funding for candidates who agreed to place additional limits on private contributions.

Prop. 88, which would have imposed a $50 tax on every real estate parcel in California to pay for a variety of school facilities and materials, was being buried with only 22 percent of the vote.

The property rights initiative, Prop. 90, was trailing by 52 to 48 percent. One of a string of state initiatives drafted in response to a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on eminent domain, it would prohibit state and local governments from condemning property for a private development, like a shopping center or hotel. Another, more far-reaching provision would prohibit any government regulation, such as zoning, that substantially reduces property values unless the government compensates the property owner.

The bond package, Props. 1B through 1E, held majorities of between 56 and 64 percent. Placed on the ballot by the Legislature and Schwarzenegger, they would raise $37 billion for transportation, housing, schools and levees. Prop. 1A, which would require gas tax funds to be spent on transportation, was getting 77 percent of the vote. A separate $5.4 billion clean-water bond initiative, Prop. 84, was receiving 53 percent.

Prop. 83, which would require registered sex offenders to move at least 2,000 feet away from any school or park, was headed for victory with 70 percent support. That measure would also require more than 100,000 sex offenders in California to carry global positioning devices with them for life so that officers could track their whereabouts.

In the governor's race, Schwarzenegger's victory seemed improbable a year ago, when state voters resoundingly rejected all four initiatives he backed in a special election -- measures aimed at curbing labor unions and increasing the governor's power at legislators' expense -- and his approval rating sank to 33 percent.

He responded by apologizing to the public and making peaceful overtures to Democratic lawmakers, whom he had previously dismissed as "girlie men" and "losers." The result was legislation increasing the minimum wage, which Schwarzenegger had previously opposed, as well as a bipartisan plan for emergency funding on prescription drugs and a landmark law to curb global warming.

The governor's newfound bipartisanship also produced the $37 billion bond package on the ballot, and left Democratic legislative leaders in the awkward position of campaigning side-by-side with Schwarzenegger to promote the bond measures in the middle of his re-election campaign.

Angelides, meanwhile, was wounded by a bruising primary battle with state Controller Steve Westly -- whose ads were gleefully quoted by the Schwarzenegger camp -- and entered the fall campaign with a cash shortage and a divided party.

The governor also faced skepticism within his own party as he swung toward the center. But he largely mollified conservatives by vetoing a same-sex marriage bill and by maintaining a hard line on taxes, crime and immigration, including praise for the armed border-watch group known as the Minutemen.

Angelides made taxes his central issue, saying the state should close its $5 billion budget deficit by repealing tax breaks for its wealthiest citizens. The two-term state treasurer sought to label Schwarzenegger a tool of the same special interests that the former film star had denounced while running against Gov. Gray Davis in the 2003 recall election.

But while Angelides insisted he would cut taxes for the middle class, Schwarzenegger portrayed his rival's plan as a $10 billion tax increase for all Californians, and hammered the message home in well-funded campaign commercials.

The governor's race was by no means the most expensive on the ballot, however. That distinction belonged to Prop. 87, the $4 billion tax on oil production to fund alternative energy research and development. Opponents, mainly oil companies, have reported raising over $90 million, while the Yes on 87 campaign has drawn $51 million from a single donor, Hollywood mogul Stephen Bing.

Tobacco companies and their allies poured $58 million into the campaign against Prop. 86, the tax increase on cigarettes to fund health programs.

Schwarzenegger Could Use Win To Take On Health Care Revisions (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, November 8, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's cruise to re-election confirms his bipartisan popularity in the nation's most populous state and positions him to tackle an issue that has long stymied national policymakers: health care reform.

DOJ_NMG_0091916

Political analysts and the governor's staff say a bid to provide coverage for some or all of California's estimated 6.5 million uninsured residents, particularly children, would be the early focus of a second term, which would be his last because of term limits.

However, his immediate attention is on a two-day trade mission to Mexico starting today.

"He's against universal health care. That won't be in the mix," says Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a University of Southern California political analyst. "But that sets him up for a confrontation with the Democratic legislature."

Schwarzenegger learned the hard way that partisan politics achieve little in this majority Democrat state when voters rejected his special election proposals last year. He'll seek consensus on health care, deputy chief of staff Adam Mendelsohn says.

"He's saying everyone needs to be at the table: unions, employers, health plans, hospitals, doctors, consumer advocates," Mendelsohn says.

Schwarzenegger says reform can't be based on old assumptions.

"The health care paradigm of the '50s and '60s doesn't fit the California of today," Mendelsohn says. "The governor is saying, 'Bring me new ideas. Find new solutions.' "

California's landmark law this year requiring businesses to reduce "greenhouse gases" came after Schwarzenegger and Democratic lawmakers compromised on key features. He has said a goal is to develop alternative energy sources and cut Californians' dependence on fossil fuels.

"There's been a green tint to his whole agenda, and I don't think he did that just for an election year," says Mark Baldassare, a senior fellow at the Public Policy Institute of California.

Much depends on the state's financial health and budget projections due in January, Baldassare says. A $16 billion deficit Schwarzenegger inherited has been cut to $4 billion.

The governor's staff avoids talk about his legacy this early. But Schwarzenegger has spoken approvingly of former governors Earl Warren and Pat Brown and the economic prosperity they fostered.

"My guess is he'd like to be seen as a future-oriented governor who laid the groundwork that 20, 30, 40 years from now, people look back and say, 'That happened during the Schwarzenegger era,' " Baldassare says.

Investment By Oil Industry Stalls (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

The world oil industry has barely increased its investment in oil and natural-gas production during the past five years after accounting for inflation, a new study finds, suggesting global energy prices are likely to encounter upward pressure in the years ahead.

Data compiled by the International Energy Agency show that investment in the oil-and-gas industry was $340 billion in 2005, up 70% from 2000. But cost inflation for goods and services used by the industry accounted for almost all of that increase, according to the IEA, the energy club of 26 of the world's major industrial nations. Adjusted for inflation, the oil industry's investment increased by 5% between 2000 and 2005, the IEA, based in Paris, said.

"That's almost nothing; it's inadequate," said Fatih Birol, the IEA's chief economist and principal author of the agency's latest annual World Economic Outlook.

The IEA's survey, published Tuesday, reflects the actual and planned investment of international oil companies, independent producers and national oil companies. Altogether, those companies plan to spend $470 billion in 2010, up 38% from 2005. Two-thirds of the industry's spending is expected to be directed into oil and gas production.

Because oil and gas projects take many years to complete, the results of any scrimping on investment during the first half of the decade will become evident only toward the end of the second half.

If world demand for oil rises faster than projected, or if production-capacity gains are less than expected, the result would be upward pressure on prices. But even if demand-and-supply trends conform to projections, which is unlikely, the oil industry's investments won't significantly add to the world's spare oil-production capacity, a buffer that is needed to offset supply disruptions that periodically occur because of political, natural or industrial upheaval.

Oil prices nearly doubled between 2000 and 2005, leading to a gusher of revenue and profits for oil-producing countries and companies. Among the reasons for the sharp price increase was the industry's inability to increase production capacity to match the surge in demand. That was the result of self-imposed investment restraints during the industry's lean years in previous decades, when oil prices crashed twice because of excess supply.

From 2000 to 2005, world oil consumption rose 9.3% to 83.6 million barrels a day, testing the world oil industry's ability to produce and refine so much petroleum.

DOJ_NMG_0091917

By the winter of 2004, the pumping and refining of oil was almost at capacity, raising fears the world would have to tap strategic stockpiles of oil, if not face actual shortages, if something went wrong in the complex system of producing and transporting huge volumes of oil.

Mr. Birol, the IEA economist, said in an interview that he expects the oil industry's production capacity will slightly outstrip demand through the end of this decade -- or by 1.3 million barrels a day -- "if all the projects see the light of day."

Even then, when added to current spare oil-production capacity of roughly two million barrels a day, the total reserve of 3.3 million barrels a day still would be well short of the five million barrels a day needed to put the world into the comfort zone, he said.

The industry has faced fierce inflation in recent years, with the cost of items from cement and steel to drilling rigs and services soaring because of global demand. Among oil projects taking a huge cost hit was Royal Dutch Shell PLC's massive undertaking in Sakhalin, in Russia's far east. Investment needed for this project rose to $85,000 per barrel of oil-production capacity from the originally planned outlay of $50,000 a barrel, Mr. Birol said.

The latest per-barrel development cost in Sakhalin is more than 10 times the cost in the oil-rich Middle East. But the Middle East's huge oil reserves are largely closed to international oil companies, forcing them to go elsewhere to develop much more expensive oil resources, such as deep offshore West Africa and the Gulf of Mexico, and oil sands and heavy-oil deposits in Canada and Venezuela.

Drilling Deep In The Gulf Of Mexico (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

ABOARD THE WESTERN NEPTUNE, Gulf of Mexico — Every 17 seconds, a small armada of ships trawling 130 miles from the Louisiana coast fire powerful air guns toward the bottom of the sea in a hunt for the next big oil discovery.

The Neptune and three other ships are on a three-month mission to map one of the most remote regions of the United States. The data they collect from the vibrations set off by the guns in the gulf's deepest waters will help engineers form a picture of some of the world's newest petroleum prospects.

As oil consumption grows and access to most oil-rich regions becomes increasingly restricted, companies are venturing farther out to sea, drilling deeper than ever in their quest for energy. The next oil frontier — and the next great challenge for oil explorers — lies below 10,000 feet of water, through five miles of hard rock, thick salt and tightly packed sands.

"It's not a place for the timid," said Paul K. Siegele, the vice president for deepwater exploration at Chevron, which commissioned a survey by the Neptune. "It's a place where a lot of people have lost their shirts."

To picture the challenge, imagine flying above New York City at 30,000 feet and aiming a drill tip the size of a coffee can at the pitcher's mound in Yankee Stadium. Then imagine doing it in the dark, at $100 million a go.

Even after hitting pay dirt, it will take another decade and billions of dollars to transform oil from these ultra-deep reserves into gasoline. Some of the technology to pump the sludge from these depths, at these pressures and temperatures, has not yet been developed; only about a dozen ships can drill wells that deep, and no one knows for sure how much oil is down there.

While most people regard affordable and abundant supplies as an essential element of the nation's prosperity, few realize how complex and costly the quest has become, even in the nation's own backyard. At the same time, some experts argue that the industry is nearing the limits of what it can do to maintain a growing supply of fossil fuels.

But for the geologists, scientists and explorers who work here in the Gulf of Mexico, the history of the deep water holds another lesson: technological breakthroughs have always breathed new life into the energy industry.

"This is as close as we get to the space age on earth," said Kenny Lang, BP's vice president for gulf production.

Thanks to advances in offshore technology, and tremendous leaps in supercomputers and three-dimensional imaging, this region's deepest waters have become the hottest exploration prospects in the nation.

Barely more than a decade ago, the area was called the Dead Sea and was nearly abandoned as the major energy companies left for better prospects in Russia and the Caspian Sea basin.

In fact, the region's output would have peaked and started slipping long ago without the leaps that have driven the search for offshore oil and natural gas. While production from the Gulf's shallow waters is declining, deepwater production is on an upswing. Altogether, the Gulf of Mexico accounts for more than 25 percent of the nation's oil production and 20 percent of its natural gas output.

According to the most optimistic estimates, there could be 40 billion barrels of undiscovered reserves in the deep water, which starts at about 1,500 feet, enough to satisfy American consumption for more than five years.

These reserves might lift the offshore output to 2.2 million barrels a day by 2012, up from 1.5 million barrels today.

DOJ_NMG_0091918

Still, that's a drop in the bucket. Even as the deepwater resources are developed, the nation is expected to continue to import more than two-thirds of the 20 million barrels of oil it consumes each day.

Since 2001, there have been 12 discoveries in waters 5,000 feet deep, drilling into older rock formations known as the Lower Tertiary. Those point to the presence of a region that might hold as much as 15 billion barrels of reserves.

The latest and largest find in the Lower Tertiary, about 250 miles south of New Orleans, was announced in August by BP. The find is a layer of 800 feet of oil-bearing sands, more than five miles under the ocean floor.

"The deep water in the Gulf of Mexico is a textbook application of where technology drove opportunity," said Barney Issen, a geologist with Chevron. "It's been known for quite some time that there were huge resources out there but we didn't have the seismic data to have the nerve to drill. And even if we did, we didn't have the drilling tools until recently."

Last month, Royal Dutch Shell announced that it would develop three ultradeep discoveries 200 miles south of the Texas coastline. The project, called Perdido, will tie together fields called Great White, Tobago and Silvertip, and is projected to have a daily capacity of the equivalent of 130,000 barrels of oil by the turn of the decade.

Some of the earlier doubts about production in the Lower Tertiary were recently lifted when Chevron successfully tested its Jack field. The test proved that oil could flow in commercial quantities from sediments deposited as long as 65 million years ago.

"The geology has been proven, the oil is present," said Renato Bertani, the chief executive of the American unit of Petrobras, Brazil's national oil company. His company plans to produce from Lower Tertiary discoveries in 2009.

"The result really encouraged us tremendously," he said. "There is nevertheless some level of uncertainty."

Part of the problem for deep exploration in the Gulf of Mexico is a thick layer of salt — 15,000 feet deep in some places — that extends unevenly under the Gulf's waters. The salt acts like frosted glass when geologists try to see through it, blurring their view of untapped oil reserves thought to lie below.

A clear image of the subsea salt can make the difference between a successful discovery and a dry well.

"This is an industry that has to manage risk," said Rocco Detomo Jr., a senior geophysicist at Shell. "And it's much too risky and too expensive to look for oil the old-fashioned way."

At BP's sprawling campus in a Houston suburb, geologists take many years looking for oil before drilling a single well. They are counting on huge leaps in processing power from computer networks that allow scientists to make sense of the complex seismic data acquired by ships like the Neptune.

The more sophisticated data is necessary because drilling costs have soared in recent years and can now reach as much as $800,000 a day, or up to $100 million for a single well. Those costs raise the risks when, on average, only one in every three to five wells turns up oil.

Chevron, for example, expects to spend $3.5 billion on its Tahiti project, which should start production in 2008. BP invests more than $2 billion a year in the Gulf and devotes 40 percent of its global exploration budget here.

"When you're living in that place where you're constantly on the edge, occasionally you're going to stub your toe," Mr. Lang of BP said.

That recently happened at BP's Thunder Horse, the world's largest offshore platform, with a planned oil capacity of 250,000 barrels a day. The platform, dwarfing anything else in the Gulf, was supposed to start production last year, but ran into problems, including being left listing after Hurricane Dennis passed in 2005. The latest mishap involves replacing critical pieces of equipment at the bottom of the ocean, a lengthy process that will delay production until 2008.

